Mischa Elman, the young Russian who makes his violin do everything but talk, will give his final program Sunday afternoon at Scottish Rite Auditorium. Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," Handel's "Sonata" D major, three transcriptions of old works by Elman, Franko and Kreisler, one of those entrancing old Vienese waltzes of Fritz Kreisler's, Schubert's "Ave Maria" transscribed by Wilhelmj and Paganini's difficult "I Palpiti" will comprise the offering.

Hotaling in "The Melting Pot"

Monday evening Richard M. Hotaling starts his third season with the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland. The opening play will be "The Melting Pot," the drama by Zangwill in which Walker Whiteside was seen here last winter and in which Hotaling will play David Quixano. It will be the first time the play has been presented by a stock company and Bishop promises an elaborate scenic production and a cast that will do the piece full justice. After one week of the Zangwill drama, Mr. Hotaling will be presented in "The House Next Door," J. E. Dodson's New York success of last season.

Von Warlich, Lieder Singer

Reinhold Von Warlich, the young Russian basso-cantante, will be introduced by Impressario Greenbaum next Thursday night at the Scottish Rite Hall. The program will consist of the complete cycle of sixteen beautiful songs known as "Dichterlibe," words by Heine and music by Robert Schumann; a group of early English songs and another of traditional Scotch and English ballads. The final group on the list will be four dramatic compositions of Loewe, including his setting of "The Erlking" which will be most interesting to hear, as Schubert's has been so often sung here. The second concert will be given Sunday afternoon, April 9, with an unusual and interesting program.

Claude Gillingwater at the Orpheum

Claude Gillingwater, recognized as one of the cleverest actors in vaudeville, will be at the Orpheum next week. His last engagement here was in the sketch "A Strenuous Rehearsal." His offering this time is a comedy sketch called "The Awakening of Minerva." Mademoiselle Bianci Froehlich and a company of dancers will appear. Mlle. Froehlich has contrived four new numbers. Burr McIntosh will appear in one of those burly western parts which made him famous before he deserted the stage. "The Ranchman" is a Wyoming tale which he presents with the aid of a good company. "Town Hall Minstrels" will be the contribution of Coakley, Hanvey and Dunlevy. The Four Konerz Brothers are called "The Boys with the Toys."

MISCHA ELMAN, THE VIOLIN GENIUS.

Music Festival by the Russian Orchestra

The programs for the big festival of music by the Russian Symphony Orchestra assisted by four eminent vocal artists, are now being prepared and new features are being secured daily. Manager Will Greenbaum who undertakes the responsibility shouldered in other cities by committees of citizens is now negotiating with one of the most popular pianists who ever played here to come out for these events. He has also received the promise of an orchestral number from the new opera "Natoma" by Victor Herbert and our own "Joe" Redding and the latter has promised to conduct the number. Seven fine programs will be given in this city and at one of them Richard Strauss' "Salome" music will be given for the first time here. Two special programs will be given at the Greek Theatre.

Warde, his son, will appear as Cassius. Marc Antony will be played by Edward D'Oize. Miss Frederica Going will be Calphurnia and Miss Helen Hilton will play Portia.

Familiar but Hard to Trace

Every once in a while those whose vocation it is to answer questions from the reading public find themselves at a loss to trace some familiar quotation to its source. Year in and year out these puzzlers turn up anew, if not regularly, yet with an irregularity that might almost be called regular. One of them relates to "pouring oil on troubled waters." "The Bible!" one exclaims, onhand; but search the Scriptures ne'er so diligently, you do not find the phrase. Bartlett quotes from Herodotus a question about the soothing effect of oil poured on "the sea"; but, in a literary sense, there is all the difference in the world between the "sea" and "troubled waters." For one is a mere word; the other a phrase usually employed in a figurative sense. Another relates to the "depravity of inanimate objects." This ought not to be so hard to find; and unless we mistake, it originally appeared in an essay in the Atlantic Monthly. Query editors receive every few months an inquiry as to the origin of the following quotation: "If a man can write a better book, preach a better sermon or make a better mouse-trap (some copies have "basket") than his neighbor, though he build his house in the woods, the world will make a beaten path to his door."

Everybody, with one accord, says "Emerson"; but ask them when and where Emerson said or wrote it, and they give it up. The question came to a query editor recently, and this time was referred to Mr. John H. Woods of Cambridge, Mass., who has indexed Emerson's writings, but even he could shed no light on the bothersome obscurity. Here is his confession:

"Dr. E. W. Emerson, son of Ralph Waldo Emerson, and literary executor, and also editor of the Centenary Edition of Emerson's Works, writes me: "I do not think the quotation you ask about can be found in any one of my father's works. I presume it may have been used in a lecture, and reported in a paper, and some one who heard of it used it, I am told, as an advertisement. Hence the queries on the subject which come to me again and again. The index (made at my suggestion, and by me, for the Riverside Edition of Emerson's works, and used later in the Centenary Edition) gives no clue to the matter. So I presume we must relegate the quotation to the same limbo to which are already consigned such immortal utterances as Lincoln's "You may fool all the people," etc., and the evasive "Consistency is a jewel," "Beautiful Snow" and a lot more."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The stocks market in the early part of the week was practically deadlocked with no business except traders' business on the floor of the exchange. This waiting attitude was broken later in the week when there was influential buying of some of the leading securities, such as Norfolk & Western, Atchison and Canadian Pacific in which accumulation has been in progress for some time. The movement in these issues spread to the rest of the list in rails and before the close of the week was a strong feature. There was absolutely no news in the financial district during the week, barring the worriment over Supreme Court decisions and the political uncertainty of the sold-out commission houses generally. Further improvement will be seen in the near future.

Wheat—The general situation in wheat continues to favor the bear side to a marked degree Developments which the bulls confidently expected have failed to materialize, while on the other hand the bearish features of the situation have in many instances become more pronounced than ever. As a result liquidation and a gradually declining price list have been the features of speculative trade the past week. Attempts to bull wheat have failed because the legitimate conditions governing prices have been against a higher range of quotations. Outside speculators have seen nothing in the outlook to warrant a belief in an appreciation of values and have refrained from making trades. Local sentiment in the main favors the selling side but speculators are cautious in pressing the declines as it is the general opinion that there is no extensive shortage outside of the hedges against cash wheat This makes the technical situation weak and the bulls, despairing of creating any active buying demand, have liquidated freely.

Corn—Bears in corn have been more aggressive, especially in the May option and have succeeded in making a much lower range of prices. Weakening factors were the declining prices in wheat, poor spot demand, a more bearish foreign outlook and continued fair receipts. The big discounts for cash corn form the most depressing feature and with No. 3 corn selling at a discount of 4 cents under May the prospects for bulling the futures are regarded as slim, despite the relative cheapness of corn from a feeding standpoint.

Cotton—Rain has fallen all through Texas and the eastern states. Planting of cotton will now become general all over Texas and will shortly begin east of the Mississippi River as a result of the recent breaking of the drouth. More rain is indicated for all sections of the cotton region and will be beneficial. The sustaining feature of the market in face of the more favorable prospects for the new crop, as the result of the breaking of the long dry spell, is the strong position of the staple in America. While the drouth scare was on, receipts were falling off. Exports continue large and stocks at all ports continue to decrease. Now the statistical position in the United States is so strong that the breaking of the drouth has little or no effect for the time being. There is no speculative interest in the market, however. This is due, most likely, to fear of adverse legislation, such as the revising downward of the tariff and the introduction of another anti-cotton future bill on the lines of the Scott bill. Another drawback to an active market is the indifference displayed in spots which are ruling quiet and featureless owing to consumers taking advantage of existing conditions by keeping out of the market

Speeding Up

There was a cow on the track. The shoe drummer, who had been cutting cards for the cigars, beckoned to the porter.

"Boy, is that cow still on the track?"

"Yeas, sah."

"How fast is the train moving?"

"'Bout fo' miles an houah while de cow am on de track."

"Well, here is a quarter. Take a few yards of rope up to the engineer and tell him to hitch the train to the cow. We might make better time."

Ignorance

Laura Jean Libbey, discussing in Brooklyn her appearance on the stage, said:

"I talk in my monologue about love, marriage and the other interests of the heart. On these subjects, women, especially young women, are strangely ignorant.

"They really make me think, you know, of the little girl who was asked by her teacher:

"What can you tell us of Solomon?"

"'Solomon,' replied the little girl, 'was very fond of animals.'

"'And how, my dear,' said the teacher, 'do you make that out?'

"'Because,' answered the little girl,' 'the Bible says he had five hundred porcupines.'"

Rooseveltian Fact and Fable

connection therewith the tendency of which is to reflect much discredit on Mr. Roosevelt.

The most interesting chapters of the book are those dealing with affairs behind the scenes in Washington. Mrs. Hale tells of several governmental transactions by which the men known as the "court favorites" were greatly advantaged in a pecuniary sense. She also tells of Roosevelt's relations with the press, and affords an insight into the methods by which as President he obtained a maximum of acclaim and a minimum of censure. She says:

"After his establishment in the White House, he selected about 40 out of the 200 or more newspaper correspondents to be his special messengers to the public, and these are known in the popular parlance of the Capital, as 'White-House cuckoos.' These are the birds which roost close to the Executive chamber, and give out to their editors for the benefit of an expectant public, the internal workings of the Executive mind. By means of these, the public is kept closely informed as to the President's views, purposes and plans"

Mrs. Hale quotes a veteran Washington newspaperman as follows:

"After careful and extended observation, it can be truthfully asserted that scarcely a publication in the United States of broad circulation and influence, but has upon its staff in an important capacity, a Roosevelt cuckoo. He has invited to Washington, and entertained at the White House, a larger number of men who write than have any half dozen of his predecessors. The list of those he has singled out for this distinction is a long one, and includes cartoonists as well as writers."

Mrs. Hale continues:

"President Roosevelt has put into the public service more newspaper men and other writers than can be easily enumerated, but the following partial list will convey a general idea of this phase of Rooseveltian activity: Whitelaw Reid, ambassador to England; Robt. J. Wynne, correspondent of a New York paper, and president of a Dining Club in Washington, composed almost exclusively of newspaper men, was successively advanced to the post of Assistant-Postmaster-General, then to the head of the Department, and finally to be Consul-General to London, the best paying post in the consular service. Of the three D. C. Commissioners who govern Washington under the direction of Congress and the President, two were active newspaper men when appointed by Roosevelt. Maj. John M. Carson, of the New York Times, was made chief of the Bureau of Manufactures; Francis E. Leupp, a newspaper man, was made Indian Commissioner; George Horton, appointed consul-general at Athens; Albert Halstead, Consul at Birmingham, England; J. Martin Miller is Consul somewhere in Europe; and Jos. Rucklin Bishop was taken from the editorship of a New York paper, and made the secretary of the Panama Canal Commission at a salary of $10,000 a year.

"It has passed into a proverb in Washington: 'Write a biography of Roosevelt, and pull out a consulship.'

"President Roosevelt's method of dealing with the Washington correspondents is thus described by one of them: 'When President Roosevelt gets ready to lodge a fresh impression in the public mind, or to contradict something displeasing to him which appeared in the public press, he assembles the Washington representatives—usually his 'cuckoo' flock, tho' sometimes an outsider gets in, too—and addresses them after this fashion: 'While you are on no account to quote me personally, yet these are the facts, which you can make such use of as you think proper, and they will not be contradicted.' In communicating 'the facts' the President makes a great show of frankness, and of taking the press representatives into his confidence, so that a general feeling of good fellowship pervades the interview."

Terrible was the indignation of Mr. Roosevelt when any journalist wrote what displeased him. One woman reporter in Washington lost her position for mentioning a matter of slight importance that occurred at a White House reception. She was an amiable, well-mannered woman, who never did anybody an injury, and she was the support of an aged mother.

Mrs. Hale devotes a chapter to Mr. Roosevelt's preaching habit, and she quotes Mr. Drummond, "The religious life of a great many people consists entirely of religious phraseology." Of Roosevelt she says, "Wherever he goes he sets up an impromptu pulpit." During his term Congress voted an additional $25,000 a year for his traveling expenses, that the public might not be deprived of the privilege of listening to his inspired words. Representative Underwood objected on the ground that it was in violation of the Constitution to allow the President "any other emolument" than his salary fixed by law. Senator Foraker expressed the opinion that Roosevelt would veto the measure on account of its unconstitutionality, but he signed it as soon as it reached him.

The Storer incident, the Harriman incident and many less known incidents are discussed by Mrs. Hale, and she gives her readers documentary evidence and excerpts from official records that throw considerable light on Mr. Roosevelt's methods and motives; and it must be confessed that they constitute a very severe, nay a most cruel arraignment of this popular man. The book is written in a spirit that is at once cynical and sarcastic. It was obviously designed to shock the Roosevelt worshipers, and to that end it was well conceived and executed. It is of value inasmuch as it will serve as a guide to the kind of treasures that those writers must have who will undertake to inform posterity of the character of Theodore Roosevelt.

Auto Notes

A letter just received from George P. Moore, Pacific Coast representative for Monogram Oils, who is now in Salt Lake City, states that he attended the recent Denver Automobile Show and that it had the most extensive display of motor cars ever shown outside of the big national shows at New York and Chicago. Moore also states that increasing sales and the establishment of new agencies in Utah promise that the Mormon state will be among the big consumers of automobiles this season.

The Pioneer Automobile Co. reports the following sales in the last few days, of Hudson and Chalmers cars: J. D. Crock, Sperry Flour Co., C. A. Ludy, American Ever Ready Co., Oakland Tribune, Dr. Chas. Pinkham, A. E. Splivalo, D. S. Kyser, Santa Rosa Garage, S. N. Phillips, T. I. C. Barr, Edgar A. Yelton, W. S. Bamburg, E. J. Weimar, Chas. J. Wood, Mrs. Louise Enslen and W. H. Girvin.

The latest advices from the Haynes Automobile factory officials at Kokomo, Indiana, state that full plans for the new factory building, to replace the one recently burned, have been completed and that actual construction is already under way. The plant is to be much larger than the former one and is to be a modern steel and reinforced concrete structure. For the present the construction of Haynes cars is proceeding without interruption in temporary quarters and the first shipment of two car loads is scheduled to start for San Francisco before the end of this month. The local agency report a sufficient number of cars now on hand to tide them over to that time.

Armed with important information about motor car sales conditions in every nook and corner of the country, gathered in a fifteen-thousand-mile-round-the-continent trip, George M. Berry, asistant manager of The Thomas B. Jeffery Company, has returned to the factory at Kenosha. On this trip Mr. Berry visited such widely separated points as Dallas, Los Angeles and Boston. Mr. Berry now has at his fingers' ends acurate knowledge of sales prospects in every territory from Florida to Vancouver and from Mexico to Maine. "Everywhere I have gone the demand is for the better class of cars," said Mr. Berry. "Cheaper cars are gradually being replaced by those costing more and giving better service. The one-year car or low value car is rapidly being replaced even on the farms of the Middle West. In California the average price paid is constantly increasing and there the business is exceptionally good. In the Southwest the average is going up, while in the Northwest, where $400,000 worth of Rambler cars were sold last year, the buyers are rapidly being educated to the value of quality and service."

As an indication of the increasing interest in the American cars abroad, one of the Royal Chief Engineers of Berlin, Germany, has requested from the Lozier Motor Co. a description of the American built Lozier car, with details of materials used and factory practice. He states that there is an increasing tendency to the use of American motor cars in Germany and Austria, especially of the better grade and quality.

Nat Messer, of this city, has driven a Republic tire on his Franklin car for over two years, having travelled over 25,000 miles. This was a plain tread casing. He also has two Republic Staggard Treads that have been on his car for 15,000 miles and are still in fine condition. The tires that are the most economical, insure safety and give longer and better service, are bound to make mileage records, and as proved efficiency is better than mere demonstration, the Republic tire people are rapidly establishing new agencies in localities where Republic Tires have never heretofore been sold.

An indulgent use of brakes is one of the factors, according to C. E. Mathewson of the Diamond Rubber Company, which enters very largely into the increase of tire expense. "The habit," says Mathewson, "of going full speed and then coming to a stop by jamming the brakes on is obviously an extravagant one. This causes the tire treads to grate along the ground and if the road be at all rough or even only hard, the injury done the tire is terrific. One stop such as this may be more injurious than many miles of ordinary traveling."

After having tried every other means the Fresno Republican managed to reach Coalinga last Friday with eleven hundred papers and a Chalmers "30" turned the trick. Coalinga, owing to the continuous rain of the past two weeks, has been shut off from the outside world for four days and when the Chalmers with her heavy load started for the oil town it was freely predicted that she wouldn't get ten miles from Fresno. The feat was just part of a day's work for a car that daily makes a run of ninety miles and which carries on every trip from seven to fourteen hundred pounds of dead weight.

Bits About Our Bettys

A winsome miss is generally able to win some mister.

Some girls are taken at their face value and some at their pa value.

A good deal depends on the dressing when it comes to girls and salads.

It only takes a "he" to convert an "artless" girl into a "heartless" one.

Ask a girl for a lock of her hair nowadays and she won't require any scissors.

When a young man's attention is arested by a girl he is generally brought to court.

A pretty girl and a philosopher are both apt to be enamoured of their own reflections.

The Early Worm

A father had been lecturing his young hopeful upon the evils of staying out late at night and getting up late in the morning. "You will never amount to anything," he continued, "unless you turn over a new leaf. Remember that the early bird catches the worm."

"How about the worm, father?" inquired the young man. "Wasn't he rather foolish to get up so early?"

"My son," said the father solemnly, "that worm hadn't been to bed all night; he was on his way home."

The Optimistic Ripley

A most interesting and instructive interview was the one with Mr. E. P. Ripley, President of the Santa Fe railroad system, which appeared in the Examiner last Sunday. Mr. Ripley was questioned with respect to the immediate future of the transportation business. His discussion of the matter was characterized by an amiable optimism. From the standpoint of his self-interest there is not much to worry about. As a result of the widespread agitation against railroads and the adverse legislation that has been enacted the railroads have been crippled and they must reduce expenses and abandon contemplated extensions and improvements. But eventually there will be a reaction. Of this of course there is no doubt. Mr. Ripley talks like a philosopher. He knows that in this world all things react and that the very extremity of any force is the nucleus of a counter-agency. Mr. Ripley believes that popular antipathy is to be assauged by appealing directly to the people and that common sense will finally assert itself. But he is under no delusion respecting popular sentiment. He says nothing about the spirit of fair play asserting itself. The direct appeal to be made to the people is the appeal not to their conscience but the appeal to their pockets, and in this materialistic age it is the most powerful of all appeals. The reporter observed that "the people appear to support the policy of Federal control," and Mr. Ripley remarked "I have not the slightest doubt that a bill providing for free transportation for everybody and for everything would be still more popular than even the recent refusal of the Interstate Commerce Commission to allow the railroads to raise rates." And he added, "we must wait for the inevitable results of arbitrary regulation." These inevitable results are already appearing. Of the three thousand men employed in the Southern Pacific shops at Sacramento six hundred were laid off last week. Retrenchment is the rule in the transportation business throughout the West. And for the present nor for some time to come will there be any enterprise shown in the development of new territory. It will soon be found that the regulation of railroad rates has greatly increased the vast army of unemployed. And the mercantile interests that have been fighting the railroads will soon find when there are not cars enough to accomodate commerce that they have plunged themselves into a very unpleasant situation. This undoubtedly is what Mr. Ripley means when he says that the railroads will appeal directly to the people. They are already appealing directly to the people by adjusting their business in accordance with the requirements imposed by our demagogic politicians at the instigation of a greedy press whose principal complaint against the interests is that the interests have ceased to "put up." So Mr. Ripley has reason to believe that in time the people will right any wrong that has been done.

Rostand's Play

The question whether a blasphemous play offensive to the feelings of religious people should be tolerated has been brought home to us by the announcement that Sara Bernhardt is soon to appear at the Columbia Theatre in Rostand's "La Samaritaine." This is a question upon which honest, and even religious, people may differ. For this question cannot be considered apart from certain other questions, among them being the question of freedom of conscience and freedom of speech. Incidentally there is to be considered the question of justice as between playwrights and other authors, and between theatrical managers and book publishers. Why, it may be asked, should a play that is accessible to readers be inaccessible to play-goers. Blasphemous plays are not kept out of the hands of the reading public. Then why should they be inhibited to the senses of people who support the theatres? Theatre-goers are as little under compulsion to sit through a blasphemous play as are the lovers of fiction to read a blasphemous novel. But while this may be true enough there is after all a vast difference between reading and seeing, between mental recreation in private and mental recreation in public; between study in solitude and observation in groups. There is also a difference between the character vaguely outlined on the printed page and the character distinctly visualized on the lighted stage. What in a book may offend one's taste in a play may revolt one's whole being. The book is impersonal, the drama is palpitant, vital, employing as it does flesh and blood to create its illusions; and that is why the idea of profanity is inseparable from the drama that presents upon the stage whatever is sacred—the practices of religion no less than saintly figures of religious tradition. This idea of profanity is instinctive among people of refined sensibilities, and it may be raised by an undue familiarity not alone with what is religious but also with anything for which we have a profound reverence. Even the things that we hold sacred in our daily lives may be profaned by the too flippant imaging of them on the stage, and it is because they have been thus profaned far too often that we have in a measure ceased to appreciate them. In this connection the question suggests itself, have we come to hold too lightly the things that we ought to hold sacred? Some twenty years ago there was produced in Washington, D. C. a play called "The Ensign," one of the protagonists of which was Abraham Lincoln. The vivid apparition of the martyred President was startling to many people, and that he should be made to utter as though they were his own, through the mouth of an actor, the sentiments of a playwright, was so repugnant to the popular sense of reverence that indignant protest compelled the re-writing of the whole play. In the new version Lincoln merely appeared in a tableau, at the fall of a curtain. Does it not appear, now that Sara Bernhardt is touring the country in "La Samaritaine," that public feeling has become somewhat callous since the days when "The Ensign" was produced? A few years ago there was much indignation in New York at the proposal of the Lambs Club to produce Clay Greene's Passion Play, in the whole course of which the figure of Jesus is never seen. Yet here we have a play in which Jesus is impersonated, in which he is represented as a man capable of carnal thoughts, who is fascinated by the physical charms of an abandoned woman. What the effect of this play is on the emotions of clean-minded people one can judge only by witnessing a performance; what the effect may be on the emotions of the vulgar is of no importance. That it is blasphemous from the Catholic standpoint cannot be questioned; nor that from the standpoint of all sincere Christians it is in a sense a profanation of a sacred character. But it appears to be equally certain that it is a sincere work of art. This is conceded even by the Jesuit journal "America," which says of Rostand, "In telling the story of the woman of Samaria he meant well. He meant, we believe, to do homage to the Saviour of the world." But according to Father Francou, editor of the official organ of the Catholic archdiocese of New Orleans, "It is absolutely shocking and sickening," and the Monitor of this city, which demands its suppression "in the name of common decency," pronounces it "revolting, blasphemous and curse-invoking."

He Admires Restraint in Art

What a piece of work is Colonel Roosevelt! What a confused chaos! How infinite in his ideals! In action, how elusive! In principle, how unstable! In most everything, how incomprehensible! The Colonel, we learned during his sojourn in this city, includes among his numerous talents that of an art critic. He admired out loud a beautiful painting, because, as he said, it showed "restraint." In most conceptions of the same subject, he explained, blood was among the details, and as there was no blood in this particular picture, he admired it greatly. Now who in all the world would have thought that Colonel Roosevelt was an admirer of restraint in anything? He, the incarnation of strenuosity! One finds it difficult to believe that he was reported accurately. How improbable that the Mighty Hunter whose itinerary in Africa was marked by a trail of blood really objects to the employment of the red fluid for realistic purposes in art! Perhaps the Colonel was really poking fun at the picture. Perhaps he considers the artist a mollycoddle. But you never can tell. The Colonel as we have said is infinite in his ideals, unstable in his principles. The fact is, however, that according to the popular concept of him, there is nothing that he so much disdains as restraint. He is famous for his impetuosity, his impulsiveness, his cross-grained ungentleness. So distinct is the impression that he gives of his being subject to the most wayward impulses, so at variance with his nature is serenity of aspect, that the figure of him might well serve as the symbol of impetuous energy. The man who has laid down so many precepts for the governing of our lives has yet to aspire to that greatest of all empires—command of self. If Colonel Roosevelt were to exemplify in himself the principle that he applies to art he might win the respect of men who now regard him with abhorrence. But the transformation while it would render him more acceptable to the few would alienate the affections of the many.

A Breach of Restraint

Mr. Roosevelt's want of restraint was evidenced quite often during his recent visit. Here, as everywhere, he assumed the role of spiritual director to the multitude, his conception of it being rather that of the scourge than of the indulgent guide. On several occasions he pointed with pride to his record for criminal prosecutions, and spoke exultingly of his success as betokened by "men in stripes." This is a curious record for a statesman, a former President of the United States, to preen himself on. Can anyone conceive of the divinely merciful Lincoln boasting of such triumphs as those that gladden the heart of the illustrious Rough Rider? No; the reason being that everybody's impression of the character of Lincoln is that it was marked by tenderness, by that matchless grace, "the gentleness of Christ." Restraint is the keynote of Lincoln's character. Now the subject of criminal prosecution is one that discretion would eschew. It is anything but an indication of restraint on Mr. Roosevelt's part that he exults at the misery of a man, however deserving a miserable man might be of his fate. Besides it is notorious that as implacable as Mr. Roosevelt was toward some men and some corporations he was fully as placable towards others, and while even guiltless men were prosecuted at his behest there were guilty ones shielded by him. But it is not with the question of his unfairness and his partiality that we now are dealing; it is with the question of his unrestraint, of the manifest indelicacy of his nature. Without a sense of delicacy there can be no restraint. That sense has been imperfectly developed in Mr. Roosevelt. It has been dwarfed by his egoism. Indelicacy exhibits itself most significantly in little things. Witness the exhibition of it that Mr. Roosevelt gave when he addressed the Spanish-American war veterans . "I've broken my rule as to accepting invitations in just one case," he said, "and that case was this case. You have a peculiar claim on me." Thus did Mr. Roosevelt assure the veterans that he was doing them a great favor in accepting their invitation to be received by them. Here we have egoism monumental, and delicacy not at all. It is this egoism that is chiefly responsible for Mr. Roosevelt's lack of restraint. From his egoism proceeds his habitual intolerance and his intolerable dogmatism. It is by reason of his egoism that nothing appears to him of any moment but the unrestrained indulgence of a domineering moral superiority. This moral superiority he postulates of himself because while he sets a high value on his virtues he is unconscious of the enormity of his vices. Greatly incensed against the immoral practices of unscrupulous business men by which the people are defrauded and the public service impaired, he lashes them incessantly, conceiving as he does that they are the ugliest of all sinners. Doubtless it would shock him greatly to learn that there are men not included among the objects of his execration who loathe his weaknesses much more than they loathe the weaknesses of malefactors of great wealth. Doubtless it would shock him greatly to be told that for his employment of the machinery of government to nominate his successor he is regarded as the greatest criminal that ever held office in this republic. These conceptions are probably incomprehensible to Mr. Roosevelt because of a contracted blear-eyed obliquity of mental vision by which he is denied the felicity of more than one viewpoint. He is one of those unfortunate individuals who regard fervor of purpose and passion as a sign of what is incontrovertible. Hence his headstrong manner when mounted on an abstract proposition, and his unrestrained hatred of the sins he is not inclined to.

Blind to the Beautiful

Mr. Roosevelt is really to be pitied. Every man is to pitied who is temperamentally inclined rather to lament the wickedness of the world than to rejoice at the world's goodness. A man has little of genuine sympathy in his heart who cannot see that there is much that is beautiful among the actions of mankind. And since there is none of us qualified to cast the first stone how greatly to be pitied is he who is so insensible to his own imperfections that he makes the lashing of sin a continuous performance! It is not to be disputed that the world is in need of reformers, or that militant righteousness is a good thing; but it is too bad that our greatest reformer loses sight of the fact that evil is immortal and necessary, that without it goodness would have no significance, life no meaning. It is too bad that Mr. Roosevelt has not that philosophic calm and mental serenity which are essential to clear thinking; for then he might realize that there are two ways of improving mankind, and that the less effective is the one he pursues. It is better to inspire appreciation of beautiful actions than to inveigh against ugly ones. It is better because it is more effective. Examples of heroism are beautiful and they induce emulation. And virtue has its heroes as well as war. Now if a man has any power of observation he cannot fail to perceive that virtue is everywhere. It consoles misery, it feeds the hungry, it comforts the sick. In the streets of every city the good Samaritan may be met every day. If there are women who abstain from the function of motherhood there are countless thousands that rejoice in its exquisite pangs. If there are malefactors of great wealth there are also philanthropists of little means. There are sublime exemplars of self-denial and devotion in every home, but nothing that Mr. Roosevelt has ever said would indicate that he was aware of their existence. He has been too busy quickening the civic conscience and keeping alive discord and distrust.

The Sedges

I whispered my great sorrow
To every listening sedge;
And they bent, bowed with my sorrow
Down to the water's edge.

But she stands and laughs lightly
To see me sorrow so,
Like the light winds that laughing
Across the water go.

If I could tell the bright ones
That quiet-hearted move,
They would bend down like the sedges
With the sorrow of love.

But she stands laughing lightly
Who all my sorrow knows,
Like the little wind that laughing
Across the water blows.

XVI—John D. Barry

By Edward F. O'Day

"You are also the author of 'The Confession of a Rebellious Wife?'"

It was a brutal question unkindly blurted, but I did not realize. I was not attuned to Mr. Barry. He was a stranger to me. His works were stranger still. His Bulletin essays I had not read; his novels I had never seen; his plays and playlets, quite naturally, I had never witnessed, for they are still virgin to the stage. Of his personality what could I know? I had just met him. And so, when I laid that ruthless question to his delicate soul, when I macerated his soft spirit with that uncouth query, I was shocked to see his pain. It was as though I had broken a butterfly on the wheel. Positively Mr. Barry's pinions drooped.

"How did you know that?" he gasped.

I grieved for Mr. Barry. It was patent that I had startled him. He stared at me, a blonde mask of misery. His soft yellow hair, his white brows, his eyes of discouraged blue, his close-cropped moustache, every feature of that fair face mirrored sudden uneasiness. A pearl baby-ribbon of smoke climbed upward from the cigarette in his hanging hand.

I was very uncomfortable. But what could I do? My cruel words were gone beyond recall. There was no plucking their barb from Mr. Barry's tender heart. So I refused to tell him how I knew. Sternly I resisted his coaxing—and he has a very coaxing way.

Finally, "It was a secret," he murmured in a voice that was almost sad. "Please don't give me away."

I was in a very embarrassing position. I didn't know what to say. Really and truly, I wouldn't give Mr. Barry away if he were in my possession, so to speak. But he isn't. His secret is out. It leaked through the pages of Town Talk several weeks ago. But I didn't dare tell Mr. Barry that. It would have been so awkward. In the first place it would have been tantamount to charging him with the heinous sin of not reading Town Talk and I wouldn't charge my worst enemy with that unpardonable omission. In the second place I knew that if I told him there would be a scene. He might have swooned at the news and then I would have had to dash water on his face or find smelling salts. Or his emotion might have expressed itself in tears. So I did not face the situation. I retreated and allowed Mr. Barry to suppose that the authorship of "The Confession of a Rebellious Wife" was a secret between us, instead of being known to the countless thousands who read Town Talk. If Mr. Barry had not been Mr. Barry but some rugged individual I might have told him the worst; as it was, I was cowardly and gentle. One cannot use the rake to a sensitive plant.

I intruded on Mr. Barry's domestic quietude because I had heard of his dramatic lectures and was interested. The spotlight is not merely for actors; it also beats upon dramatic lecturers and others. Mr. Barry accepts its radiance with becoming modesty. It is only when "The Confession of a Rebellious Wife" is mentioned that he dodges it. But there, there, Mr. Barry, we will try not to mention that again.

"I have always been interested in the stage," said Mr. Barry with a most engaging little hesitation of speech, a sort of stutter stunted in its growth. "Once I was dramatic critic for the Boston Post; and for Harper's Weekly and Collier's. I put on plays for a settlement in New York. I have made both professional and amateur Shakespearian productions. And I have written plays."

That last sentence seemed meaty to me. Playwrights are interesting folk—when their plays have been produced.' Very delicately I insinuated to Mr. Barry that it would please me to learn whether his plays had been produced. One must be careful in these matters. It is so easy to remain in ignorance of great playwrights on this edge of the continent.

"Mary Shaw once played my one-act drama 'The Preacher,'" replied Mr. Barry.

The accent was not placed on that word 'once,' but the word was there and it bothered me. Had not Mary Shaw played it twice or thrice? I dared not breathe the interrogation. But Mr. Barry saved the situation by talking on.

"It's bully to write plays," he trilled birdily; "especially on social and economic subjects. I am going to write a lot of plays on social and economic subjects. I have written a good many one-act plays and some longer ones. There's 'The Congressman;' it was founded on my novel 'The Congressman's Wife.' 'The Pharisee' is another of my plays. Really 'The Pharisee' is the best thing I've done, but it's on rather a terrible theme."

That intrigued my curiosity. I hardly associated terrible themes with Mr. Barry. Was it something socially or economically terrible? Mr. Barry could see that I was interested and being interested himself, he explained.

"You see, my Pharisee is supposed to be a great hero. He really isn't, you know, but everybody thinks he is. He is a vigorous man but his wife is passe and he has a secretary whom he seduces. Rather a terrible thing, isn't it? When the wife finds out about it she drops dead and that ends the first act. In the second act the Pharisee is tired of the secretary and he's after the hand of the rich widow whose acquaintance we made in the first act. When the secretary finds this out she's furious. 'If you try to marry her I'll tell all,' she says. 'Oh no, you wont,' he answers, 'because if you tell all you'll queer yourself.' He rather thinks he has her there. But in the third act she tells all."

There was a pause while we meditated the awkward position of the Pharisee.

"I don't look forward to an immediate production of 'The Pharisee,'" added Mr. Barry. Then he laughed musically. We both laughed.

"I have two lecture classes," continued Mr. Barry in answer to a question. "I have a class in stage managing with twenty pupils and a class in dramatic construction with fifteen pupils. Perhaps it is wrong to call them pupils. The class is really a sort of conference. We put our heads together, you know. We try to find out why the laws of the drama exist; why the spectators must see the significance of every scene. We try to understand the importance of keeping the play marching, of having a sound skeleton for it. It's bully work. It's bully to work with grown-ups. It's very stimulating to me. I get many suggestions. Really, some of the best things are said by the pupils."

Could modesty be more engaging than in Mr Barry? I would have liked to deprecate his self abasement, but I reminded myself that I had never attended the lectures.

"I like this lecturing because it will enable me to do a manual on playwriting," Mr. Barry explained. "I want to do a little book that will be easy to read."

"You know Price's Technique of the Drama?" I ventured.

"I read Price recently," Mr. Barry conceded, "and I liked the little book better than the big book. Hennequin is good too. I must say that Hennequin and Price have done very well. But I will try to get at the drama from a new angle when I do my manual."

What that angle will be one can only guess from Mr. Barry's obiter dicta.

"Men like Shaw are freeing the drama. We are getting away from the old ideas of form. Ibsen is splendid! And Sudermann! I like his 'Magda!' His 'Fires of St. John'—wonderful! bully! I don't like his 'Joy of Living.' And Hauptmann is splendid! His 'Hannele' and his 'Sunken Bell!' I don't know his 'Lonely Lives.' I can't say that I know much of Strindberg. Of course the Shakespearian tragedies are wonderful. But the comedies are marred by grossness, don't you think? Their humor is offensive, even the Falstaff humor."

I dared not disagree for fear of shocking Mr. Barry. I almost felt ashamed of my liking for the Shakespearian comedies. One does feel uncomfortable in the presence of a pure soul that refuses to sully itself with the Shakespearian humor. And yet, when Mr. Barry went to his book shelf to find one of his novels, I noticed a Boccaccio and a Rabelais.

Perspective Impressions

Man banquets on life; and the worms on him.

Bromide note: All the dramatic critics spoke of the "lean and hungry Cassius."

When a man with such a name as J. Stitt Wilson parts it in the middle the presumption is against him everywhere save in Berkeley.

"Systematic muckerism" sounds as though Doctor Jordan had been talking to Colonel Roosevelt.

President Jordan thinks that baseball is too rough for Stanford. He might recommend knitting.

"It was a great day for Chicago," says Mr. Hearst anent the victory of Carter Harrison. But after reading the front page of the Examiner one finds it difficult to get away from the impression that the illustrious journalist believes that it was a much greater day for William R.

There is no security against the arrogance of wealth except the acquisition of it.

Dave Stewart, the prize-fighter, has the distinction of having knocked out two men in one day. He knocked out his opponent in the mayoralty contest in La Salle, Colo., last Tuesday, and in the evening he knocked out Harry Smith in Omaha in the padded arena. It was a great day for La Salle and democracy.

Perhaps some of the people who voted for J. Stitt Wilson are of the opinion that as most of our politicians are practicing Socialism without having the courage to confess themselves Socialists it might be just as well to get behind one who disdains false colors.

The Plague of Locusts

According to the Bureau of Entomology of the Department of Agriculture, the United States will suffer this year from the worst plague of locusts since 1690. Nothing as bad in the insect line will be experienced again until 2132. The reason is that this year the seventeen and and thirteen year locusts will sweep over the land, a coincidence which takes place only every 221 years. The seventeen-year locust, or more properly cicada, is known in the North while the thirteen-year variety is indigenous to the South. The brood which is due to come forth this year was hatched from eggs deposited in 1894 and 1898 respectively. A few weeks after the eggs were laid in the twigs of trees they hatched, and the billions of baby cicadas dropped to the ground where they buried themselves. There they went through the transformations of growth and in due time began burrowing to the surface, the process in the North taking seventeen and in the South thirteen years. The plague is expected to be severest in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, the District of Columbia and the Mississippi Valley. Steps are being taken to combat the plague as soon as it appears.

Roasting the W. C. T. U. and the Preachers

Up in happy, wealthy Chico there is quite a tempest in a teapot over the lambasting which the wife of a wholesale and retail liquor dealer has administered to the W. C. T. U. and the preachers. The prohibition agitation has not unnaturally excited this woman's wrath. "Sift the matter down to a psychological basis," she writes, "and you will find that ignorance and agitators—ignorant agitators, if you will—are at the bottom of it." And again: "Attend the W. C. T. U. meeting of today and you will be struck by the paucity of likely working material." And still again: "We take exception to the present-day minister, not because he is often poor, but because he is a hypocrite. He sticks to his job, not because of loyalty, but because he doesn't know what else to do . After a man has put in even a few years at a business the chief requirements of which are soft hands, elegant manners and a gift with the ladies, he is necessarily a good deal handicapped when he steps out into the broad light of day and essays to measure up alongside of men. The average minister is not a man among men, but a diplomat among ladies." These are cruel words and have aroused great indignation among the ministers and the ladies of Chico.

Did the Doctor Slam "Chet?"

It is evident that Dr. Rowell and his nephew, Chester H. Rowell, do not agree on all things. The evidence is supplied by the Fresno Republican of which Chester H. is editor, in a report of a lecture given by the Doctor. In this lecture the Doctor said that as a result of his long legislative experience he had come to the conclusion that "all legislation is procured in three ways, by ignorance, accident or fraud." Now that is rather hard on "Chet" Rowell. "Chet" is one of the brightest lights of the Johnsonian dispensation and all the Johnsonians agree that the recent session of the Legislature was the greatest in the history, not only of California legislation but of the whole world's legislation. Does the Doctor mean to say that all the reform legislation recently enacted was procured "by ignorance, accident or fraud?" What does "Chet" think of the Doctor for talking like that? And especially after Governor Johnson gave the Doctor a ten thousand dollar a year plum! Was the legislation providing for the State World's Fair Commission procured "by ignorance, accident or fraud?"

Russia and the Jews

No less than 120,000 Jews were driven out of Russia during 1910 by systematic official persecution, according to the annual report of the Central German Jewish Relief Association, which acts in co-operation with the leading Jews of America and Great Britian in ameliorating the lot of their oppressed co-religionists in Russia .

Of the total mentioned, 93,107 emigrated to the United States, or 25 per cent more than during 1909. These figures, the report states, are more complete than the official American immigration statistics, because the latter are made up for the fiscal year ending with June, 1910.

The German association declares that the anti-Jewish propaganda in Russia is becoming more heartless, tyrannical, and widespread from hour to hour. The Czar's Government has now adopted the principle of limiting educational opportunities for Jewish children as the most practical and surest way of driving the Jews out of the country. The previous regulations by which Jewish children might attend the public schools at a ratio of 3 per cent of the total attendance in cities, 5 per cent in the smaller towns, and 10 per cent in various "Jewish settlement" regions, have now been extended so as to embrace private schools and business colleges.

A Promising Girl

Mere children have lately been discovered at the head of predatory gangs of Paris, and now the wilful conduct of a girl of fourteen is the topic of considerable comment. This promising child left her home recently to live with a group of apaches, and, as funds became low, she called on her mother. When the latter refused to give her money she pulled a revolver out of her pocket and threatened her parent with it. Happily, several neighbors interfered, and a policeman was sent for, but the girl showed fight, and injured his hand with a hat-pin before he could lead her off to the station, at the head of a procession in which many of her apache friends figured. When questioned by the inspector this unnatural juvenile coolly declared her determination to finish her parents off as soon as she was free.

"Sir," tartly says the lady of uncertain age to the floorwalker, "is there any way of getting one of these salemen to pay me some attention?" "Well, says the floorwalker, confidentially, "I'll introduce you to any one of them you fancy; but I'll tell you now that all of them have their 'steadies.' "

An Obsession

By Bernardo Couto Castillo (From the Spanish)

In a small piece of Louis XV furniture that I recently bought, I found, in the bottom of a drawer, the letter which you may here read:

My Dear Friend:

What I write you is going to move you profoundly; but you have no idea of the state of excitement and grief in which I find myself. You, the best comrade of my earlier days, who knew all my joys and all my sorrows—you are the only one who can hear and console me in my desolation. Come, come and live by my side, and be the same companion as you were in times past; only, now I shall not laugh, nor shall I be the noisy devil I then was. Come, my friend, I fear for my reason, which is even now trembling.

You will remember that, a little time after you had abandoned the wild and riotous life we lived together so long, to shut yourself up wisely in a den of peace and labor—you will remember I wrote you, saying:

"Friend, at last I have found what I wanted; the submissive and silent creature at whose side I can shelter myself, the being made for love, tolerant of my caprices, humble to my desires, who, from today, is going to be my companion." I spoke to you of her, of her peaceful face, of her look serene and receptive, of her hair parted in the center of the forehead and flowing straight over her temples, like that of a pre-Raphaelite virgin. I explained to you the "problem of conscience" in which I found myself involved, for, being an honest girl, duty demanded of me to give her my name, while my convictions, or should I say my stupid pre-occupations, opposed any kind of official and definite bond. I knew well that she asked nothing but to obey me; her mother, her house, all would be sacrificed to my least desire; with the same pleasure—what do I say?—with the same enthusiasm, she would have gone to the church as to the poorest of places designated by me. In her poor woman's life I was the hope, the unquestionable love, the welcome that she had awaited, soon to be delivered. With my habitual egoism and carelessness, I said: "Time enough yet!" and I made her mine.

Her mother died, and I had to bring her to live with me, without thinking to give her a position, preoccupied solely with the enchantment that emanated from the whole of her small body.

You cannat figure to yourself the two years of complete felicity that I passed by her side. I never before had believed in happiness, I had never believed that a man in any way refined could, without a great struggle, stand the same caresses, the same features, and the same things for two long years. Very well! I, the skeptical egoist you have known, even I have been happy by the side of one woman, happy as only a man can be who is destined to pay very dearly for it, as now happens to me.

During the two years' life of my passion I never dreamed of deceiving her. Do not be astonished, for you never knew her; she never had the same kiss twice, nor repeated a caress; never from her small lips came vulgar phrases; she engendered every seduction and every goodness; she was indulgent, and you know there is most desire to deceive, when the demon of perversity moves most, and when contrarieties and inopportune jealousies are aroused. While terrors awoke in her for the honor given, as with the true lover, while she did not know, while no one came to instill doubts in her conscience, there never passed through her mind the idea that I could be false; I was for her all that was loving, as she was for me all that was adorable.

You remember Charles? Well, to him and to him alone I owe my misfortune. He, the hidden black hand that wounds forever; he, the false friend born to sting like a viper, mortally, traitorously; he, the miserable Iago, entered into my house to torment me, to envenom my blood, and to bring down the night on our happiness. You know that I sought him, to provoke him to a duel, in which he had the good fortune to wound me; he whom I should have annihilated with the sheer force of my hatred.

One day, on arriving home, I found Julia all in tears. You can imagine my grief, when to my caresses she answered only with reproaches. I wanted to know, I demanded—and I knew. The wretch who had been seated daily at my table, smiling, had spoken to her of me; of my past; of the women that I had known, and of all that I had ever done. He had cited dates, given proofs, and had told her that my intention was to act in the like way with her. If I had not married, if up till now I had denied her my name, it was in order to be able to abandon her with impunity, once I got tired of her. The poor, loving creature was trembling with grief when, between her sobs, she murmured this declaration.

In vain I endeavored to console her. After the tears came angry reproaches; the fury of the woman who, confiding until then, beheld herself utterly deceived, had awakened in her. I was not what she had believed, nor he whom she loved. Then came the despair that wishes to wound, to avenge itself, and a new being was revealed before me; the weak, submissive, the good and loving creature was turned into the raging lioness that wished only to tear and destroy.

"You shall marry me," she kept saying. "I will not be as the others, no, you shall not deceive me. Oh, no, no! You shall marry me! You shall marry me!" And this cry burst continually from her rage, like froth from agitated water.

In her kindled look there was hatred and disdain; and my pride, my stupid man's pride, rose up against what I had loved most, against what I felt I loved still even in that moment in which I did not know her.

"Marry!" I cried. "And who shall oblige me? You, who came of your pleasure?"

On my words there followed a period of silence; I saw her terrified on her part at seeing my anger rise against hers, a force against her own just resentment. Then, after a brief pause, and taking some aimless steps, she moved to the nighttable at her side, and taking a revolver, she cried mechanically:

"You shall marry me—you shall; or I——"

I laughed, I made an effort to throw my irony into it, and pallid, without saying a word, she placed the muzzle against her forehead. She looked at me one instant, with a look that I have since been unable to forget, with an indescribable look that follows me in the shadows of the nights, and haunts me in my evil dreams. In the expression of that look there were determination and reproaches, but reproaches still full of love. I did not move a step; I did not make a gesture; I did not raise an arm to detain her—on the contrary, with a perverse curiosity, I waited, and even seemed to defy her with my attitude.

A report, and I threw myself forward; just in time to receive her in my arms—one last convulsive tremor, then a gush of blood covering her face and bathing her body.

Who can describe exactly and analyze all that I felt that night, watching over her who had loved me so tenderly, her whom I clearly felt I loved more and more, now that she was no more! I have only vague recollections. Her body, the lines of her perfect body, stood out against the blackness of the funeral pall spread upon the bed beneath her. The white of her hands, the corpse-like lividness of her face leaped up like life against the black, like the marbles of lacquer work. The wound in her forehead was bandaged, and only a small red point stained the silk scarf that bound it; her loose hair served as a pillow. On her small lips, so smiling before, a very nest of caresses, and now cold, insensible as those of a marble statue, there was a slight pitiful curve. The closed eyelids shut out her glance from me forever. Then I do not remember anything more. Gusts of air entered and flickered the flame of the candles, causing yellow splendors to pass over the face of the dead. I heard wailing notes, organ notes ironically joyous, the buzzing of flies and the strokes of the succeeding hours, resounding abruptly, heavily, inexorably in the silence of the night; and many thoughts, a great whirling in my head of fancies and memories.

I relived the scenes and the caresses of these two years and I saw her, unvarying, impassive, sunken in the depths of her sleep of death; I took her cold hand, I called to her, unable to admit that she was dead. Dead—and why? What had she done, and what had we done? She remained impassive, and the serious look on her face told me all that separated us; she was very far away; for her I existed no more! The thought of the solitude of the following day, and the certainty of her death, made me crazy; I was desperate against my powerlessness and the fate that creates beings only to annihilate them so swiftly.

I thought of my fault, of my criminal pride. One movement, one word, one request would have sufficed and she would have been living, prodigal in her caresses, and murmuring in my ear her loving words. I turned to look at her—the same curves in her face, the eyes always closed, the large candles shedding luminous splendors upon her and yellowing the long strands of her loosened hair.

I repented, I loathed myself, but all in vain, Absolutely no power could give sweetness to her smiles or light to her eyes. Days would follow days, and I would await her in vain. The world would continue its usual course, nothing would be changed, only she, she who ought to feel and move like the rest, would remain forever buried beneath the ground, and all through my silence, my pride. For me there was nothing but constant desolation. For her——

I saw her go forth, and I had not the strength to accompany her; strange hands sealed her up forever in her new habitation; the last words that were spoken to her issued from lips that had never kissed her; I remained stupified, a nonenity, as we are after irretrievable catastrophes.

When I grew resigned to the inevitability of her death, and began my long lone journey, the Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Charter Day in the Greek Theater was the occasion for mixed emotions in me. The glorious sight of those young people; the speech of President Wheeler when for once at least he spoke truth of the necessity of rich people in perpetuating and making possible the great institutions and enterprises of the present time everywhere over the earth. Then I heard Theodore Roosevelt try to be funny. On my way home on the ferry I wrote these enclosed verses. They are but a poor expression of my feelings for this man. If you can see your way clear to publish them in your valuable paper there may be merit enough in them to start a thought in the minds of your readers toward a proper estimation of this mountebank made possible by a hysteric people.

Who I am is of no moment—
Let me be in this but an impersonal thought.

Very truly yours,
—E. L. W.

Is it because the blood of the beasts
Is pumped by that thing you call your heart,
That to take the lives of the things you see
In your base perceptions you deem an Art.

When you were chosen to rule o'er men
Because in their error they deemed you wise,
You saw but the chance to paint blood red
The star of your fate that rose in the skies.

What did you do with your power? we ask.
Alas 'tis a grim review—
Prosperity's death; uncertainty; strife
And financial panics—all due to you.

Your actions attracted the jackals;
They followed along in your train,
But what you did for self glory
They readily turned to gain.

Your sight is along a gun barrel
And sees but the thing it would slay,
Can't you look with a wider vision
Can't you build for a future day?

Can you not let a live thing live
And crush your desire to slay
Or are you so festered in self-conceit
That you try to hasten decay?

Your name is great to your self-loved self,
Great to your perverse band,
But when time dims your fakir lights
Then men will understand.

Wherever you go, disasters spring
Alike for beasts and men,
And a mother's grief is fun to you
In houses, nest or den.

What of the man who is given to reign
And turns it into a curse,
Endowed by nature to know the right
Yet always choses the worse?

You have gone forth into foreign lands
Simply that you might kill;
Can you not joy in the things of the wild
Unless their blood you spill?

Your name is known to all our boys
And to them that name is great;
But what of the million lives they take
When your ways they imitate?

I pity you, sir, from my inmost soul,
From the depths of my dear heart's core.
Would heaven fulfill my prayer in you
Then go and sin no more.

Sly's Non-Union Project

In labor union circles there was much agitation early this week when the report was received that L. H. Sly, the non-union building contractor, had purchased the Stanford property on Nob Hill and proposed erecting on the site of the old Leland Stanford home a large Class A apartment house. Sly is the most active building contractor in the city. He has built several large apartment houses on the open shop plan, and he has fought organized labor to a standstill. But he has yet to enter the field of steel construction, and hence the agitation in labor circles when it was reported that he would soon employ non-union men to handle steel for his next building. What organized labor will do about it remains to be seen. In all probability Sly will follow the example of that ardent friend of the unions, Mr. William R. Hearst, whose building at Third and Market streets is built of what is known as "scab" steel. I have heard that President McCarthy of the Building Trades Council was inclined at first to boycott that big job, but that he changed his mind when Charles Schwab who supplied the steel threatened to give the Mayor the fight of his life. The probability is that the Mayor is in a conciliatory mood these days. A campaign is approaching, and besides the supply of labor at present exceeds the demand; so much so that work is divided up in some lines with a view of giving each man a share each week. So employers are becoming somewhat independent. This week ground was broken on Sutter street between Mason and Taylor for a big bachelor apartment house, which is to be built on the open-shop principle, and apparently nothing is to be done about it. Yet so many union men are out of work that delinquent union dues are accumulating and the treasury of the Building Trades Council is not so swollen as formerly. But good times are coming. The Fair will soon be a-building, and between the Mayor and the Governor good care will be taken of union men and organized labor will be flourishing once more.

American vs. Foreign Champagne

The Italian-Swiss Colony's choice white sparkling ASTI SPECIAL, SEC, which is naturally fermented in the bottle and not carbonated, was substituted for a foreign champagne at the Washington Hotel on Thursday when Colonel Theodore Roosevelt was Seattle's honored guest.

Trouble in Oakland

Over in Oakland the industrial situation is quite different from that which exists in this city. Mayor Mott has trouble on his hands, and the political prospect gives him uneasiness. The lumber men are defying the unions, and the unions are concentrating all their efforts against one firm which is believed to be the weakest. This firm employs a guard of seventy armed men, from which circumstance it is argued that violence is anticipated, as though the unions sanctioned violence! Doubtless the armed guard is maintained merely to create the impression that when union men are on a strike they are regarded as dangerous. Mayor Mott also has the strike of the milk drivers on his hands. Recently the non-union drivers provided themselves with clubs and revolvers as if to protect themselves from the strikers and it was said that they could not get the necessary protection from the police department. Under orders from the Chief of Police the wagons were searched and every driver with a weapon under his seat was arrested. Fifteen of them were thrown into jail. Thereupon the Milk Dealers' Association whined that it was being discriminated against by the authorities. It was charged that the strikers instigated the arrest that they might attack the "scabs" without danger to themselves. All nonsense, of course. The Oakland strikers are the most mild mannered of mortals. It would grieve them beyond expression if a "scab" driver were maimed by their militant sympathizers. The probability is that they are opposed to the disarming of the "scabs" knowing that there is danger of one of them being beaten by his employer just to provoke sentiment against the strikers. As to Mayor Mott he is by no means a disinterested looker-on in Oakland. It is no easy matter for a Mayor to keep his fences in repair during a strike.

The Silent Press

With two strikes on in Oakland it is evident that the model city across the bay bears something of the aspect of a storm-centre these days. Oakland is really passing through a very exciting period of her history, but you wouldn't think so from anything that you read in our parochial dailies. It's ticklish business, publishing strike news. Something might get into print offensive to the delicate sensibilities of the unions, and so it's deemed advisable to print as little as possible. This cautiousness on the part of the palladiums

The Demoralizing Masculine Garter

In an eastern paper I read: "Two hundred signers of a petition circulated at the Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., say a picture of a man's leg incased in a patented garter is demoralizing to the girl students." When I showed this to the Poetaster he dashed off the following:

Two hundred girls at college,
  Bespectacled and grim,
Have frowned upon the garter
  On the masculine nether limb.
But don't misunderstand me—
  Their modest soulful eyes
Have only seen this garter
  Where its makers advertise.
They are very proper coeds,
  So don't believe, I beg,
They ever set their eyes on
  The undraped manly leg.
Oh no! They saw the picture
  Of a snugly gartered shin
In the ad. part of a magazine
  And it gave them thoughts of sin.
Shall man in all the beauty
  Of his curved and fatted calf,
Be allowed to tempt these maidens
  From their virtue? Not by half!
As well allow the rah-rahs
  To attend a college dance
With stockings nicely gartered
  But without their proper pants.
As well permit the statues
  In a virtuous college town
To shed their modest fig leaves
  Or let their drap'ries down.
As well permit fair Venus,
  Fresh risen from the sea,
To attend a college lecture
  In her native nudity.
These things are very sinful,
  They repel the pure mind;
And gartered hose and manly calves
  Shock female souls refined.
So let's insure virtue
  By the very simple means
Of banishing the gartered leg
  From all the magazines.

Mr. Scrappington—Then stand off a little way from yourself and see how ridiculous you look!

Apologia pro Joe

That interesting gossip, "The Knave" of the Oakland Tribune, has thrown himself gallantly between Joe Redding and the critics of Joe's "Natoma" libretto. "Will we ever get over the delightful habit of knocking our own men and their best work?" demands The Knave. Far be it from me to rise up on behalf of San Francisco and attempt to answer so broad a question. But timidly and in all humility I will venture the statement that this town never will go into ecstacies over bad work simply because it was done by one of us. Heaven knows we are still carrying many ear-marks of provincialism, but I do not think we possess that particularly irritating one. We realize that genius knows no geography and that stupidity is limited by no residence qualification. Out in this neck of the woods we have always been pretty ready to admit that our poets, our musicians, our orators, our playwrights and so on are neither better nor worse for being San Franciscans or Californians. We are proud of the talent that springs here but not absurd enough to prefer our mediocrity to the excellence of aliens. If our Joe had written a good libretto we should have been proud of him. But because the author of a very bad libretto happens to be our Joe we are by no means blind to his bad work. We are magnanimous enough to gore our own ox when he deserves goring, even though his stable be the Bohemian or the Family Clubs out of which perchance may come less than genius.

Something Like Satire

On reflection I find myself in a quandary. I don't know whether my esteemed contemporary is sincere or satirical. For after analyzing what he has said I find that he doesn't defend Joe's libretto at all. One New York critic said that the libretto was a hack horse to carry a load of precious music, and it seems to be the opinion of The Knave that nothing more is expected of a libretto. He points out that the librettists of some of the popular operas are unknown to fame. So if we accept The Knave's premise and concur in his argument the conclusion is that Joe should not be criticised for writing a bad libretto. The same argument is advanced with reference to the lyrics. He says that lyrics never do amount to anything. If this is a defense and Joe can extract comfort from it then it is to be said of him that the celebrated versatility for which he is worshipped in Bohemia is crowned by genuine good nature.

The Knave on Shakespeare

In the course of his argument The Knave adverts to Shakespeare, thus becoming irrelevant and thereby doubly interesting. "When Shakespeare has a character burst into song," expounds The Knave, "it is not in the soliloquy of Hamlet, the address of Marc Antony or Falstaff's cynicism on honor." Which need not be denied. Only a stuttering Hamlet would think of singing "To be or not to be" and Falstaff only sang when he was drunk. But The Knave complains that when the fool in "Lear" sings he sings nonsense, thereby showing that he is a hard Knave to please. Should a fool sing like a wise man? Furthermore The Knave holds that "Under the Greenwood Tree" is not a lyric "to win the world's applause." I cannot agree with The Knave. Distrusting my own judgment I appeal to the anthologists. Most of them, not excepting Palgrave, the king of them all, have included this lyric in their compilations. Perhaps The Knave was thinking of the parody by melancholy Jacques. Even that is better than our Joe's serious efforts.

Roosevelt's Money Making

Colonel Roosevelt's engagement in California was the most profitable that he has had anywhere, and he went away with a feeling for us akin to that of the prima donna whose wallet tells her that we greatly appreciated her art. The Colonel's bank account was far more dropsical when he left us than before he came, and the Colonel is a benefactor of great wealth, of such great wealth indeed that we never need worry about the future of this particular ex-President. No other statesman in the history of this country ever made so much money honestly as Colonel Roosevelt has made. Out of his writings alone he has made a fortune. No other American worker in the literary art ever made so much money out of his books as Colonel Roosevelt has made, though the Colonel is far from being an artist. His books have sold for the same reason that any well advertised soap or hair restorer sells. Today our only ex-President ranks as a millionaire. The probability is that some day he will rank as a multi-millionaire, for while he is not to be tracked by the nickels he drops, being as thrifty as he is virtuous, he is constantly and rapidly increasing his income. Colonel Bryan made a large fortune as a lecturer. Consider the potentialities of the lecture platform for Teddy.

His California Engagement

As I have said the Colonel's engagement in California was the most profitable that he has had anywhere. Just how profitable it was we may never know. The average man probably takes it for granted that the Colonel goes about admonishing us to be good with no other incentive than that which inspired the voice in the wilderness. Indeed it might be painful for the average man who is something of an idealist to look upon the former President as a partisan political talker for hire; especially as he doesn't need the money. The idea of an ex-President acting as a guide for the public from sordid motives is one not in harmony with tradition. It was shocking to the sensibilities of some men to learn that on his previous tour the Colonel's traveling expenses were paid by the weekly paper from which he is drawing a very large salary. Of course from this circumstance it was inferred that though the Colonel was ostensibly actuated by concern for the public good in reality he was actuated by concern for his own purse. But it should be remembered that the Colonel is versed in all the principles of ethical conduct, and it is but just to him to assume that his conscience suffers none of the twinges that might afflict a man less sure of his ground. His critics however do not neglect their opportunity to cavil at his conduct. They are doing a lot of talking about the profits of his California engagement, which they say, amounted to $8,000. It is somewhat difficult to account for this sum. For his Charter Day address, I learn, he received $500, and for the Earl lectures, $2,400. Where did the balance of the money come from and what was it for? Perhaps Mr. Earl felt that so distinguished a lecturer as the former President was entitled to more than the ordinary stipend provided for by his very worthy Foundation. If so it is nobody's business.

His Comprehensive Praise

During his stay Mr. Roosevelt showed his appreciation of the Earl-Lissner machine by the several occasions which he took to boost all hands and the cook. He dispensed his tributes of approval with a most lavish tongue. It was regarded as remarkable that he knew of so many things that from the standpoint of his friends were in need of boosting. I have heard it suggested that perhaps they gave him a list of them as soon as he came over the Arizona border. By the time he reached San Francisco he was chock full of his main subject, and when he unloaded at the Coliseum nothing was omitted from the Legislature to Jimmy Phelan. He congratulated Jimmy on his wonderful administration of the Relief Fund. Now by whom do you suppose was he put wise on that subject? Not Jimmy of course. Nobody would suspect that shrinking violet of requesting helpful laudation from anybody.

With No Reporters Present

One speech delivered by Mr. Roosevelt in this city was not reported in the press. It was his speech at the Harvard Club. This was in the nature of a heart-to-heart-talk and was not at all characteristic. Perhaps this was because Mr. Roosevelt knew that he was not being reported for publication. Before beginning his talk he looked about furtively and asked if there were any reporters present. The candid impulsive moralist who is popularly believed to be absolutely free from restraint, ready to speak his mind on all occasions, was as cautious at the Harvard Club as a darkey approaching a chicken-house. Assured that no agents of publicity were present he unlimbered his tongue and behold! the rampageous Tribune of the people, the fearless, strenuous flamboyant idol of the masses, was bubbling over with the counsel of caution. For fully half an hour he exuded the precepts of temperance and prudence, he dangled before the eyes of his hearers "the silken string of moderation that runs through the pearl chain of all virtues." Many of those present were inclined to doubt their ears. The Colonel talked as though he had just been brooding over that precious line of Shakespeare's: "To climb steep hills requires slow pace at first." Fervently he warned the Harvard alumni against the folly of impetuous progressiveness. He pointed out the danger of reaction. He said that one must not try to accomplish too many reforms in a day, and above all we should refrain from inflicting hardship on those whose methods we wish to change. In his elaboration of this sentiment he talked as though he did not approve our Administration at Sacramento which on another occasion he warmly acclaimed. But the most astonishing part of his address was that in which he discussed the subject of prosecution. He said it should be remembered that the practices against which there had been so much complaint were the result of a system which the people had tacitly approved. Before punishing a man, he said, we should first make it clear that "the rules of the game" have been changed. If a man continues playing under the old rules then he should suffer the consequences. A just sentiment this, but how remarkable that it should emanate from the Colonel!

The Branding of Hodghead

At the close of the political campaign of last year the results of the election seemed to argue that a Roosevelt boost was in the nature of a knock. In several States the men whose cause had been most warmly espoused by the Colonel were beaten. And now in view of what happened in Berkeley last week it appears that the Roosevelt hoodoo has lost none of its vitality. Colonel Roosevelt took occasion while here to put his brand on Beverly Hodghead, Mayor of the College town, and the voters of Berkeley decided last Saturday to have a new deal, retiring Mr. Hodghead to private life and electing Mr. J. Stitt Wilson to the mayoralty job. Mr. Hodghead is very much incensed against the voters of Berkeley from whom he expected keen appreciation. Mr. Hodghead is a distinguished civic patriot, one of the founders of the Commonwealth Club of this city which gave Mr. Roosevelt a fine reception. As a resident of Berkeley naturally he sympathized greatly with the people of this city because of their inability to govern themselves properly, and he has spent much of his time over here nobly striving with disinterested zeal to correct public sentiment and to set right the disjointed times. Partly because of his neglect of his own home affairs the sly Socialists were able to sow the seeds of their faith among the intellectuals of our great university.

Self-Righteousness Rebuked

But let not the defeat of Beverly Hodghead be interpreted as a signal triumph of the principles of Socialism. As a matter of fact there are not many Socialists in Berkeley. Of the seven thousand Berkeley voters there were only six hundred last November when J. Stitt Wilson was a candidate for Governor. Wilson's election therefore is hardly to be accounted for on the hypothesis that he suddenly converted the town to Socialism. Equally untenable is the theory of Mr. Hodghead's friend of the Commonwealth Club who writes editorials for the Chronicle. This amiable gentleman is of the opinion that Wilson's election was a triumph of "the rankest kind of graft." This is most unkind. The sacrosanct town of Berkeley dominated by grafters! As well might it be said that the faculty of the university is composed of old women and libertines. No, the election of J. Stitt Wilson was not a triumph of graft. It was chiefly a rebuke to self-righteousness. Berkeley has long been governed by the goo-goos of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, the holier-than-thou brand of reformers. The psychology of the Berkeley election affords a very interesting study, for it is a fact of considerable significance that the cultured, moral town of Berkeley is the first in the State to revolt against the machine that now has control of the State government. The pendulum is swinging back.

Wheeler's Glad Hand

The first congratulations received by J. Stitt Wilson on his election were received from President Benjamin Ide Wheeler of the University of California, who made haste to get in touch with the distinguished Socialist over the telephone. But President Wheeler was not in sympathy with Mr. Wilson's candidacy. Several of the college professors were for the Socialist, but President Wheeler was the avowed supporter of Mr. Hodghead. No significance therefore is to be attached to the fact that the President felicitated the winner. Dr. Wheeler emulates the Apostle of the Gentiles. He is all things to all men. Even Ruef and Schmitz in the days of their ascendancy were not excluded from the comforts of Dr. Wheeler's society. He took a deep interest in their affairs, either out of curiosity or as a student of machine politics.

"What is it," asked the teacher, "that binds us together and makes us better than we are by nature?"

"Corsets, sir," piped a wise little girl of eight.

The Carmelites and the Mayor

The denizens of Carmel-by-the-Sea have nearly all a decided leaning toward Socialism, so it was natural that they should rejoice in the election of J. Stitt Wilson to the mayoralty of Berk-cley. Their rejoicing took the form of a celebration in the Latin Quarter on Monday night at which the new mayor of the college community played the host. It was a hilarious affair and Italy's red wine of wizardry flowed like a Pierian gusher. Toasts were drained many a time and oft to the cause of universal brotherhood and quotations from the prophetic periods of "Locksley Hall" were mingled with quotations from the works of the poets present. Among those who took part in this nox ambrosiana were George Sterling, sometimes irreverently dubbed "Kid Dante," Henry Anderson Lafler, occasionally called "Young Ibsen" and Porter Garnett who has earned the sobriquet of "Shakespeare the Second," all of these nicknames having their inspiration not so much in literary as in physical resemblances.

He's Tired of Carmel

There is a backslider among the Carmelites. One of the coterie has deserted the literary settlement by the sounding surf and vows he'll never return. In sorrow, not in anger, Fred Bechdolt, the short story writer, has moved his Smith Premier and his copy paper from Carmel-by-the-Sea to the classic town of Berkeley, declaring that the atmosphere of the settlement was bad for his literary health. Bechdolt was one of the "producers" at Carmel; that is to say, he was among those Carmelites who got their literary efforts into print. He collaborated with Jimmy Hopper on "9009" and has written a number of short stories and sketches for the Saturday Evening Post. So he was an asset of the place. He was pointed out to visitors. But Fred tired of intensive literary farming. He found it depressing to associate with men and women who sighed out their souls in aspirations toward immortality but never put pen to paper or finger to typewriter. He listened to manuscript poems and manuscript novels and manuscript plays till he lost his nerve. He exhausted his capacity for discreet laudation of impossible efforts. So he up and left. He is a Carmelite no more.

Sinclair's Shocker

Mr. Upton Sinclair has written another shocker. This is one way of attaining celebrity. Apparently none of the other ways in the Republic of Letters is open to the author of "The Jungle." His new shocker is a novel called "Love's Pilgrimage." I have not read it, but I have read a review of it by William Marion Reedy, who was favored with an advance copy, and from him I learn that there is a possibility of its being denied the mails because of the manner in which it discusses the sex question. He describes the novel as a plea for subordination of sex. The hero of it is a literary genius who marries but does not for a time consummate the marriage so absorbed is he in his literary labors. According to Sinclair love is a trap for genius. His heroine starves for love and finally gets it, the hero sacrificing himself to his wife's passion. "And here," says Reedy, "the book wins place among the erotica." I judge from the review that the novel also wins place among books that are coarse and brutal, and that Mr. Sinclair in emulating his model, Zola, shows, as that writer did in La Terre that he has no taste, which, according to Anatole France, is that mysterious sin of which the Scripture speaks, the greatest of sins, the only one which will not be forgiven.

Our Fair President

The selection of Mr. Charles C. Moore as president of our World's Fair Corporation ought to receive the unanimous indorsement of all San Franciscans. To those who know him it gave instant satisfaction; to those who have yet to savor the quality of the man it will undoubtedly bring the same pleasant sentiment. Mr. Moore is at the head of a large and thriving engineering concern and in his field no man is better known up and down California. To the general business and professional world of the State he commended himself when he was made president of our Chamber of Commerce, then in a moribund condition, and started that policy of cooperation with other Chambers of Commerce throughout the State which has been carried on by James McNab, Will Gerstle, and William Matson, his successors in the presidency. Under Moore's administration the Chamber of Commerce became a vital force which brought the interests of the State together, dispelled misunderstandings, dissipated jealousies and inaugurated a cordial entente which has continued ever since. The same policy has followed Mr. Moore's activities in other fields. He helped to make the Portola celebration the most successful public fete ever held in the West. The social graces are his and a personality that wins quickly. No man was more enthusiastic in the hard work of the early Fair campaign and in the hard work to come he will command the sympathy of the men who have placed him at the head of the corporation and of the citizens to whom he must make accounting. The director-general of the Fair, whoever he may be, will find in Mr. Moore a hearty helper.

Jordan the Transcendentalist

As a theorist David Starr Jordan is delightful. Like all transcendentalists the President of Sanford founds his theories rather on consciousness than on experience. He never gets out of himself. If he were a poet or historian we should find in his writings a series of portraits of himself. Thinking that he perceives the thoughts that float around him he perceives none but his own, and these he regards as unimpeachable as the multiplication table. To which reflection I was impelled when the other day I came across these utterances that articulate the wisdom of our distinguished pedant:

"The genius of our people is all for peace, the peace of strength and self-control, not that of cowardice or indifference. . . . It is for us to say we will not threaten, we will not fight, we will not prepare to fight. We will not load ourselves with weapons that tend to provoke a fight. We will not mortgage our future to the Invisible Empire which owns and controls militant Europe. We will leave all disputes to a tribunal of just men. The word war shall be erased from our national speech."

So, the genius of our people is all for peace! How strange then that we should have done so much fighting! Was the genius of our people for peace when we rushed into war with Spain? And what an easy way to avoid war! All we have to do, says Jordan, is to throw away our guns. How long, think you, would the principle of the Monroe Doctrine be respected on the continent to the south of us were we to assure Europe that we had determined not to fight? Dr. Jordan is as practical a man today as when he solved the seal problem in Behring Sea by cleaning an island and fencing it with barbed wire. He thought he knew what the seals thought. If he really did the seals suddenly changed their minds.

table. As the party of four arose after dinner Clark's sleeve brushed a wine glass from the table and it was shattered to bits on the marble floor. With a twinkle in her expressive eyes Miss Dressler leaned toward him and said: "I beg your pardon, you've dropped the stone out of your ring."

Ed Price Goes to Brummagem

Whom do you think I have just heard from? None other than our old friend Ed Price, who used to preside over the destinies of the Alcazar. It is a long time since I have heard from E. D. Price, a longer time still since I have seen his suave countenance. In the larger sphere of New York theatrical activity he has made good and acquired a wife. No doubt he has the same insinuating way with the public in general and dramatic critics in particular which distinguished him in the good old days. The communication which has reached me from Price will tell some of his later story. It is worth quoting in full: "My dear old father," he writes, "was a native of England, who came to this country in a sailing ship when six years of age. I had always promised myself that during some one of my trips abroad I would visit the city of his birth. Last year while in Scotland with Cathrine Countiss we looked over the railway guides and found that by making a slight detour on our way to Stratford-upon-Avon we could pass through Birmingham, famed for its cutlery and of sentimental interest to me as father's birthplace. To sweep away the slightest suspicion of scandal it should be explained that it was perfectly all right for Miss Countiss to be traveling with me unchaperoned. I had previously seen to that, and had bestowed a portion of my hard earnings upon a regularly ordained clergyman of Mount Vernon, who had performed a very binding ceremony, guaranteed to be unassailable, legally or morally. In fact I was so delighted with his work that I enclosed in his envelope a sum considerably in excess of what I had been in the custom of paying for similar service. Later, with one foot upon the step of the bridal automobile, I had turned back and handed him another gold certificate, explaining that the first payment was to be regarded in the light of a retainer. Altogether it proved to be a good investment—the wisest I had ever made."

Father Was a Doctor

"I do not think that Miss Countiss was very keen about going to Birmingham," Price rattles on. "You see she had never known father. He had rounded out his eighty years of usefulness as a country doctor—the most philanthropic and self-sacrificing of professions—and had gone to his reward before her term of administration began. But, like a dutiful wife and exceedingly gifted actress, she successfully simulated the most sympathetic interest in my pilgrimage and declared that we must, by all means, pass through Birmingham. There was no need to do more. The family archives of almost a century ago are vague and uncertain. We could not seek any specific site in Birmingham. The obligation of filial regard would be quite fulfilled if we merely passed through the city. Indeed we could not attempt more and reach Stratford that night. Miss Countiss naturally felt more interest in Shakespeare's birthplace than in father's. She had played Juliet in the immortal bard's most popular melodrama. Father was not a dramatist, and, being simply a man of strong religious sentiments he had slight interest in the stage. His mission in life was to heal the sick for slender compensation in a small town. Doctors in his day did not operate for appendicitis and were not much on the specializing or fancy cutting, but were strong on general practice. Father charged his patients two dollars a visit and some times he would ride half the night over a treacherous corduroy road (rough-hewn logs thrown into the mire) to reach a poor sufferer. But there was one peculiarity about father's patients—they usually got well. If overwhelmed with gatitude they might, in time, bring in a load of green cordwood or a bag of specked apples. There was not much real money in circulation in rural Michigan in the pioneer days at the beginning of the Civil War when father doctored the widows and orphans, and I was a very small legislative page in the old frame Statehouse at Lansing."

A Sad Discovery

"It needed sharp work to pass through Birmingham and make the Stratford connection," continues Ed. "The railway stations were on opposite sides of the city and there was but a quarter of an hour in which to effect the transfer. Of course we pulled in eight minutes late, and that cut the time to seven minutes. His avarice aroused by the tender of five shillings, and stirred to unwonted excitement, a cabman undertook the contract. Providence had intended him to be a taxi driver in New York. Unkind fate had made him a Birmingham cabbie. But he rose magnificently to the emergency. Lashing his horses into a frenzy of surprise and indignation, we dashed through the cabble-paved streets at a gallop in utter defiance of the speed limit. We couldn't have done much better if we had had a 100-horsepower Bleriot biplane. At the outgoing station there were six seconds to spare. A humane guard, for and in consideration of the sum of one shilling in hand paid, hastily unlocked the door of a vacant compartment. I violently hurled Miss Countiss inside and fired a gatling-gun volley of hand luggage on top of her. A silly whistle shrieked and we steamed away for Stratford, cool, composed, triumphant, but somewhat disheveled in appearance. Our recollections of Birmingham were fleeting and obscure, as one might remember the scenery while falling off the top of the Call Building. But we had been there. A great duty had been performed and we had given the pop-eyed populace of Birmingham an object lesson in the fine art of American hustling. Frequently on the homeward ocean voyage I thrilled a little with the consciousness of well doing. I wondered if my boy would ever take the same trouble to visit my birthplace. When we reached home in New York it occurred to me to look over some old family papers. I was positively annoyed to find that father was born in Manchester. Miss Countiss was quite put out about it. She manifested a disposition to hold me responsible. Of course that was wholly absurd. I had nothing to do with where father was born."

The Miller Graham Puzzle

There are interesting but bewildering doings in the domestic circle of William Miller Graham and his wife. Rumors of disagreement between the celebrated hostess and her hubby float up from Santa Barbara, but they are elusive, tenuous and incomplete. The Chronicle tried to capture one of them and translate it to black and white, but with indifferent success. The story only pricked curiosity. Evidently the purveyors of news are groping in the dark of this Miller Graham mystery and are fearful of making a misstep. Below the Tehachapi the rumors have more body and are repeated with more circumstance, but are still a puzzle to the bavardes. Five important personages figure in the affair, but it is impossible at this time to rate them according to their influence upon the drama that seems still to be in process of enactment. From the Los Angeles Times I have obtained a detailed but guarded scenario which I may as well place before my readers.

Discords and a Note of Joy

The irrepressible Puck, I read in the Times, has cast a large-sized pebble into the placid waters of the social colony at classy Montecito, adjoining Santa Barbara, and produced a condition bordering on chaos. And it is stirring society on the other side of the world. The immediate and concrete results total two lawsuits, and the transfer of over $1,500,000 worth of property. The lawsuits are between Mrs. Louise M. Timson, a dashing young widow from Paris, and William Brownell, a wealthy resident of Santa Barbara, and the transfer of property was from William Miller Graham, the multi-millionaire oil magnate to his wife, Mrs. Eleanor Lee Graham, the social leader who was presented at King Edward's court about a year and a half ago, and whose beauty has often made a sensation in San Francisco. In the midst of the discords which are emanating from Montecito there is but one note of joy heard, and that comes faintly from across the Atlantic in Lunnon town, where a gentleman known as Lord Henry Charles Keith Petty-Fitzmaurice, Marquis of Lansdowne, twenty-sixth Baron of Kerry and Lixnaw, throws his hat in the air and gives three cheers for Montecito and its mix-up.

The European Campaign

The incidents leading up to the chaotic condition date back to the memorable campaign which Mrs. Graham conducted in Paris and London, when she met and conquered French and English society, and succeeded in winning her way to the very Court of St. James, where she was presented to the King. During this dashing campaign, perhaps the most brilliant ever conducted by an American against the social circles of the Old World, the person of Lord Lansdowne appeared constantly, at first in the background, and finally at the side of Mrs. Graham, to whom he was very attentive. Also a dashing widow by the name of Mrs. Louise Timson, whose beauty was remarkable, was a frequent visitor to the salon which Mrs. Graham conducted along the old French idea in Paris. Mr. Graham, bluff and hearty, had his oil and land schemes to work out, and dropped around only long enough to write checks and say "Go it, My Dear, and do not mind expenses." Then there was William Brownell of Santa Barbara, who is well known in Paris, London and New York. He was a regular patron at the Graham salon, and there met Mrs. Timson, the irresistible. When Mrs. Graham moved her entourage to London, of course Brownell and Mrs. Timson went along, and the leaders of the country social set of London are still gasping and speaking in awed voices of the splendor of Mrs. Graham's campaign against their bulwarks. Mrs. Graham subdued them in time, and with Lord Lansdowne at her beck and call continued her triumphal march straight up to the zenith. This was the culmination of the social campaign, and wearing her laurels modestly, and with her bluff husband beaming on all the world, Mrs. Graham returned to rest at Santa Barbara.

The Coming of the Widow

Brownell, continues my authority, remained a short time in London, and then came to Santa Barbara. Shortly afterward, lo and behold, a dainty, dashing young thing stepped off the Southern Pacific train at Santa Barbara, and the social lions of Montecito growled a welcome to Mrs. Louise Timson, sometime of Paris, and more recently of London and New York. Mrs. Timson was welcomed with open arms and Brownell only smiled in a superior sort of way and seemed not to be surprised at all. The placid ways of Montecito society became slightly agitated by the addition of Mrs. Timson, the charming young widow. There were tears, luncheons, dinners and suppers galore at the Country Club. Mrs. Timson was voted quite an addition to the set, as things had livened up materially. Mrs. Timson, with her Parisian training, instituted a salon, which became the rage. She kept open house to a certain extent and everyone dropped in to tea, luncheon or dinner as it might be and always or nearly always, Brownell was present and smiling in a sort of proprietary manner. One day, so the story runs, Mrs. Timson confidentially informed her knight Brownell that she was temporarily short of ready money and hinted that a trifle like $8,000 would be very handy. Brownell rushed home to his mother, who holds the purse strings, obtained the $8,000, went swiftly back to Mrs. Timson and dropped it in her lap. After this there was little doubt that Brownell and Mrs. Timson had an understanding, if they were not actually engaged, as rumor insists they were. William Miller Graham, who as a rule has deals on which require the greater part of his time in New York, suddenly found that he could remain in Santa Barbara without injuring his business to any great extent. He was seen quite often at the salon conducted by Mrs. Timson, and also occasionally at the Country Club.

Knuckles and Clouds

Several months ago, the story continues, Brownell met Graham at the club and words passed between the two. Brownell evidently accused Graham of something that the latter resented. The result was, according to witnesses of the affair, a one-round contest with bare knuckles which required four waiters and the steward to stop. Right here the clouds began to gather. Brownell walked on the other side of the street when he passed Mrs. Timson's house. He stormed around and theatened dire things. Suddenly he appeared before the Superior Court of Santa Barbara county and entered suit against Mrs. Timson for $8,000, which he had loaned her. The doughty little widow rushed into the breach without a moment's hesitation. She secured a lawyer herself and entered suit against Brownell, in which she asked that an automobile, a baby grand piano, and some household furniture be returned to her. She asserts that she bought it, and that Brownell had possession of it, and that it was to have been used to furnish a cosy little nest for herself and Brownell. Neither of the cases has ever come to trial. They have been continued on one pretext or another, and it is expected that they never will come up, but will be allowed to die out. At this juncture, Mrs. Graham, who had fully recovered from her fatiguing social campaign in England, arose and shook herself. She listened to the echoes of Montecito, forthwith walked up to Mr. Graham, took him by the ear, in a figurative sense, and led him into the library, where he would have privacy and lots of time to explain himself.

Deeds and Conferences

The next day, so runs the tale, the Recorder of Santa Barbara county put on record three deeds of property from William Miller Graham to Mrs. Eleanor Lee Graham. They covered valuable property at Montecito and a tract of thirty-three acres fronting on the ocean and running back to the Southern Pacific Company's right of way, a piece of perhaps the most valuable land in Santa Barbara county for residence purposes. Then the white marble palace, Belasgardo, one of the most sumptuous residences in California, exceeded in magnificence only by the recently completed home of H. E. Huntington at Oak Knoll, Pasadena, was deeded over to Mrs. Graham. The recording of the deeds made society sit up and take notice. Graham leaped aboard the first train leaving Santa Barbara and went to New York on urgent business matters. He is supposedly still there. Mrs. Graham went to Los Angeles last week to see her mother, Mrs. Thomas H. Pollock of Franklin avenue, Hollywood, where she held a length family conference. At the same time William Brownell went to Hollywood and registered at the Hotel Hollywood. He went to see Mrs. Graham when he was sent for, and joined in the conference. Mrs. Graham denied herself to reporters. After a week's stay with her mother, Mrs. Graham returned to Santa Barbara with her mind made up. So I get the news. But made up to what? We can only guess. A number of foreign-looking letters and a number of long cablegrams from London were received by Mrs. Graham during the past week. Now Santa Barbara society, London society and Paris society are sitting up at night with every nerve tense awaiting the explosion. What explosion? We will know when it detonates; meanwhile we must sit and puzzle over it.

The Gracious Mrs. Roosevelt

Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt possesses a manner of easy and assured graciousness which should serve as a rebuke to some of our ladies who wear their toplofty dignity with too obviously labored an air. Extreme form and solemn ceremony are obnoxious to Mrs. Roosevelt. She manifests in her social intercourse an independence which speaks of perfect poise. While visiting her son in Pacific avenue she seemed thoroughly to enjoy herself. She was much taken with the garden that her charming young daughter-in-law tends with her own fair hands. On the occasion of a recent tea Mrs. Roosevelt was seen to accompany several of her guests from the door to the gate where she lingered, chatting in animated tones. Miss Ethel shares the informality of her mother. She has frequently been seen, unhatted, tripping across the lawn from her brother's home to that of Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels which adjoins.

Mrs. Wheeler Annoyed

According to the Sacramento Weekly Mrs. Benjamin Ide Wheeler suffered great annoyance when Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt and her daughter Ethel failed to attend the Wheeler reception which followed the Charter Day address. It seems that the Wheelers had sent out a thousand invitations and there were few regrets, everybody been keenly anxious to meet the distinguished guests. But when they decided that they were too fatigued from travel to attend there was much disappointment. "Mrs. Wheeler managed to look fairly pleasant," I read, "but the smile has since come off and whenever the subject is mentioned a tiny frown puckers her brow. Mrs. Roosevelt has since had luncheon with the Wheelers en famille, which would mollify most hostesses."

Mrs. Atherton's Plans

Gertrude Atherton is comfortably established in London in the fashionable St. James' Park section, but does not intend to wait for the coronation. Mrs. Atherton is always subjected to the lionizing process in London, but this time has resisted it more or less successfully and spends most of her time with some choice literary spirits, among them the Baroness von Hindenberg who writes under the pseudonym of Marie Hay, Mrs. W. K. Clifford whose latest novel, "Sir George's Objection" has quite a vogue and others whom she finds more interesting than the women of purely social achievement. Mrs. Atherton writes me that she is about to shut herself up in Germany, probably at Frankfort, where her friend Miss Marcia Van Dresser is, for the purpose of writing a novel. As usual she is reticent about the subject, but the fact that she has been devoting a great deal of attention to the suffragettes and has met Miss Sylvia Pankhurst may be significant in this connection. Mrs. Atherton will reach Chicago at the end of October to superintend rehearsals of her play in conjunction with Mrs. Fiske who is to appear in the principal role.

D. M. Carman, who returned recently from Manila, is a guest at the Hotel Victoria.

An Exchange of Secrets

There is an interesting story being told apropos the engagement of pretty Mollie Merle to William Regan, the former football star of Santa Clara College who is now a banker in Boise, Idaho. Last November Miss Merle went East with her brother Martin Merle, the playwright, stopping at Boise to visit the Regans. Merle and Regan were pals at college but their friendship was speedily transcended by the romantic attachment which sprang up between the youth and the maid. Before the Merles left Boise to continue on to New York Miss Merle and Mr. Regan were engaged. They arrived in New York on Thanksgiving Day and among the first friends they met there were Ernest Glendenning, formerly of the Alcazar but now of Broadway, and Theodore Murphy, the son of Mrs. Eugene Murphy of this city. The four dined together, attended the theater and afterwards supped at Jack's. Over their midnight demitasses Merle and Glendenning fell a-talking shop while Miss Merle and young Murphy put their heads together and waxed confidential. "I have a secret to tell you, Mollie," confessed Murphy; "I am engaged to Marie Garneau of St. Louis and we're going to be married in June." "And I have a secret to tell you, Theo," was the girl's reply; "I am engaged to Will Regan of Boise and we're going to be married in June too." Then they vowed to keep each other's secret and preserved their vows inviolate till the two engagements were announced recently.

In Honor of Mrs. Boalt

Mrs. Charles Stetson Wheeler has been entertaining Mrs. John H. Boalt, the widow of Judge Boalt with whom Mr. Wheeler was formerly associated in the practice of law. Mrs. Boalt has made her home in Paris for a number of years and will only remain here for a month or so. There has been a great deal of entertaining in her honor by members of the old exclusive set which practices hospitality in a quiet way. Many of these attended an informal tea and musicale which Mrs. Wheeler gave for her guest. It will be remembered that the first wife of Hugh Tevis was beautiful Alice Boalt who died when her baby was born. Judge and Mrs. Boalt took the child and devoted themselves passionately to it. During a visit to the East they left it with the Tevis family and in their absence the baby took sick and died. It is said that Judge Boalt never recovered from the shock. After the Judge's death Mrs. Boalt went abroad to live.

A Lenten Retreat

Very different from the glittering functions of society was the affair to which a number of well known women were invited during the week. This was a spiritual retreat given by the Ladies of the Sacred Heart. It began on Monday and lasted till Friday. Only those who received the engraved cards were permitted to participate in this Lenten exercise. These included Mrs. A. H Loughborough, Mrs. Frances McKinstry, Mrs Eleanor Martin, Mrs. J. J. Driscoll, Mrs. Andrew Welch, Mrs. Eugene Lent, Mrs. Walter Dean, Mrs. Augustus Bray, Miss Casserly, Mrs Jack Casserly and Mrs. Adrian Von Behrens.

He Passed the Cigarettes

Major Ned Carrington of Providence, Rhode Island, is at the St. Francis with his wife and his two charming daughters. In Providence Major Carrington is a very great man, on account of his wealth and his entertainments, and in San Francisco he has many friends. These will not be surprised to hear that the Major and his family approve of the European custom which allows women to smoke in public. A few evenings ago the Major dined with his family in the electric grill of the St. Francis and when the coffee was served he very nonchalantly passed his cigarette case around the table, the ladies with equal nonchalance helping themselves to the weed. In contrast with the perfect serenity of the Major and his family was the amazement of a fair diner who sat nearby and who was so shocked that knife and fork dropped from her nerveless fingers.

The Peninsula Opens

On April 19 the Peninsula Hotel at San Mateo opens to the public for the season 1911. This hostelry is one of the most delightful places between San Francisco and San Jose and is so recognized by the great number of San Francisco people who make the Peninsula their summer home. Mr. Jas. H. Doolittle, as in the past, will have full management of the hotel the coming season. During the few months past, many improvements have been made about the house and grounds. The appointments are splendid, the service unsurpassed and the cuisine leaves nothing to be desired. With San Francisco but a few minutes' ride away, it will be a favorite place for many families to spend their summer days. Business man can easily reach their families by wire or telephone. Train and trolley service are the best in the State.

Dubois' sublime Oratorio, "The Seven Words of Christ," will be sung at St. Dominic's Church on the evening of Palm Sunday, April 9, at 7:30 o'clock. The choir has been augmented for the occasion. The soloists are Miss Hortense Gilmore, Mrs. Charles F. Fletter, Mr. Chester Rosekranz and Mr. J. Hillman. For the Offertory, a new "Ave Verum," specially composed for the occasion by Dr. H. J. Society and many hotel guests took advantage of the concert of Mischa Elman at the St. Francis to break the monotony of the Lenten season. The affair was made the motive for a number of dinners. Mrs. Eleanor Martin shared her box with Baron and Baroness von Schroeder and Mrs. Garret McEnerney. Mrs. Frederick Tillman chaperoned her daughter Agnes, Miss Amalia Simpson, Miss Lillian van Vorst, Melville Brown, Joe King and William Hough. Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott took their guests, Mr. and Mrs. Mayre and Miss Moreland, to dinner in the white and gold room.

Mrs. David Powell and her daughter Miss Margaret Powell are down from their home in Marysville for a few days in town. They are guests at the Hotel Victoria. Mrs. Devlin is registered from Sacramento during a short stay here.

One of the smartest affairs given in honor of Miss Erna St. Goar during the season was the tea party at which Miss Marcia Fee was hostess at the Palace. A score of girls and young matrons were present to bid farewell to Miss St. Goar.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis H. Bean of Tacoma have returned to Del Monte after a short visit in the South and are again devoting themselves to golf.

Gossip of the Theatre

Ruth St. Denis' Dancing

Far be it from me to attempt to dogmatize or theorize about any member of the new school of dancing. It is too early in the game to lay down rules and make measurements. If the new school lasts long enough, a debatable proposition, some scientist may come along to reduce the various exponents of this art, if it is an art, to a common denominator or to extract the cube root of their importance. Then we will either acquiesce in his findings and range the dancers in the order of their merit or refuse to acquiesce and judge them, as we judge them now, according to purely individual likes and dislikes. Examining my conscience concerning Miss St. Denis I find that I have no particular desire to see her again unless she transfers her activities to the vaudeville stage and shares the evening's entertainment with other "artists" of that entrancing milieu. A very bad vaudeville program which contained Miss St. Denis' cobra dance I should unhesitatingly consider good, for there is enough merit in that cobra dance to lift the average of a show weighted with prosy monologists, poor singers and stupid skits. But to watch Miss St. Denis contorting through an entire evening would cease to be a diversion after a single experience. Miss St. Denis is painstaking, elaborate, picturesque, but she lacks spirit. Ginger is not in her. She doesn't pepper her feast and next to the salt that preserves the pepper that spices is the most important of all theatrical condiments. This deficiency, it seemed to me, was least lacking in the cobra dance. The cobra dance was an intelligible interlude in a rather mystifying evening. It carried an illusion of what those of us who have never been east of Suez sometimes dream that the East is like. It was fugitive, tantalizing, an episode of the bazaars, long enough to delight and short enough to leave the craving for more. There was no symbolism to be deciphered, as in the other dances. One needed no reference to the program to ease the interpretation of its movements. There stood the snake charmer and there were the snakes, writhing, sliding, darting their evil heads this way and that. There is no hidden meaning in snake charming—or if there is, it is unimportant to the mere spectator; but there is fascination in its suggestion of danger and in the repugnance which the reptiles excite. The fact that Miss St. Denis made her arms do duty for the snakes accentuated the interest of the dance. They are the most wonderful part of her, those arms, sinuous, supple and full of grace. Yes, that cobra dance is fine. The other offerings bewildered; all except the nautch which disappointed. Miss St. Denis is the soul of propriety, so she expurgated her nautch. She could give it at a Sunday school entertainment without scandal. Not that she ever scandalizes the most shockable. Her undress is a most discreet undress. There is no danger of her catching cold She bares only her beautiful arms and her sturdy legs. Maud Allen or Athmore Grey or Thamara de Swirsky would sniff at the abundant clothing on the rest of her. The scenic investiture is like nothing we have seen for a long time. It is beyond carping. Every dance is set in a beautiful picture and it would be less than justice to ignore the charm of face, figure and attire which Miss St. Denis adds to every picture. Too bad, however, that she does not dispense with the picture man who takes the audience on little journeys to Egypt and India. His eloquence is of a peculiar kind. "Egypt's columns have crumbled —almost; her temples are half-gone, I may say," was a characteristic flight. A very conservative man, even in his broodings on antiquity. His only valuable contribution to the evening's program was the pronunciation of the dancer's name. He made it rhyme to Pendennis. One wondered whether he was sure, even on that point. —Edward F. O'Day.

MRS. SIDNEY DREW

The famous authoress and comedian who will appear this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum.

Henri Bataille's Latest Play

Paris is eagerly discussing the merits of Henri Bataille's latest play, "L'enfante de l'Amour," in which Rejane and Brule are appearing. Even by "adaptation" it could hardly be fitted for England or the United States, say the critics. A correspondent sends me this racy account of the plot:

Liane Orland is a demi-mondaine who once lived as "they" all live; but for the last seventeen years she has been faithful to a certain Pierre Rantz, a political personage who has by his influence placed Liane on a semi-honourable footing in the "milieu" that lies between society and —Bohemia. Liane has a son, a boy of twenty, who adores his mother, and when Pierre Rantz, after seventeen years of menage, decides to abandon her (with a cheque for 500,000 francs, s'il vous plait, as a parting gift,) the boy is revolted (and so are we by his revolt) at the sight of his mother's distress. He blackmails Rantz, making him not only return to Liane, but marry her! You see, it is rather an unpleasant play, isn't it? You can imagine how we squirmed in our seats and grew hot internally when Liane poured forth in a torrent of abject words her hatred of man. . . . You can understand how loathely it was to hear the boy first blackmail Rantz and then beg him to return to his mother! You know I can stand a good deal when it is written in French, but this was a little too crude, a little too real . . too utterly horrible. I really am not over-sensitive or thin-skinned, but I was glad when the curtain fell on the last act. The audience stood and yelled for Bataille, but he wouldn't appear. The enthusiasm was great, for it is a magnificently written play, even if it does make one feel that there are very terrible things that happen in this world. In the second act, when young Maurice, the son, remarkably acted by Brule, speaks of his mother, he says: "I'm not the only one who is lonely; there's a crowd of us. . . There's Jack, Diane de Changy's son, and Gustave. . . When we go to see our mothers we creep into the house by the trademen's entrance, and the butler gives us stolen cigars. But we're proud of our mothers; we like to see their names in the papers, we admire them from afar at the races, and sometimes, when they notice us, even bow discreetly, and they know how glad we are that they are happy." Well, everyone nearly cried then, and suddenly a slight, fair-haired boy got up from his seat and rushed out of the theatre. I recognized him, but I can't tell you his name. His mother is one of the most beautiful women that ever lived, and a year ago she married a prince, a mere boy, only a year or so older than her own son. Do you wonder that we were glad when the play ended? It ends sadly! Diane is about to be married to Rantz, but he cannot forgive the boy for having forced his hand, and so he sends him to America as overseer in some mines. Diane protests, and begs that he shall be allowed to remain in France. Rantz is inflexible, and Diane gives way. The curtain falls as Maurice leaves the room; on the threshold he stands aside a moment to let Rantz's own son enter, a schoolboy who comes to visit his future stepmother, and Maurice understands that his place is taken for ever. I cried like a silly idiot! And yet I say I enjoyed myself. Well, I did, really. I was glad to be there, for it was one of the smartest "first nights" we've had for ages, barring Bernstein's "Apres-Moi" at the Comedie Francaise

LEW DOCKSTADER

Lew Dockstader Coming

This Saturday afternoon and evening Marie Dressler will make her farewell appearances at the Savoy in "Tillie's Nightmare" and commencing on Sunday evening, Lew Dockstader and his "Twentieth Century Minstrels" will begin an engagement limited to eight nights. Lew is introducing a real aeroplane in the playhouse. He uses it in connection with his latest monologue, during the course of which he sings three new songs. Among the large numbers may be mentioned "Louisiana," introduced by Carroll Johnson, "The Shanticlair" and a spectacular burlesque on the comic opera "Pinafore."

REINHOLD VON WARLICH

The Russian basso-cantante who will appear at Scottish Rite Auditorium this Sunday afternoon.

Last Week of Figman

A brilliant comedy, "The Marriage of Kitty," is to be given its first presentation here at the Alcazar next week, with Max Figman in the leading role. It was adapted from the French for Marie Tempest, the famous English comedienne and so closely did the principal character fit Figman's personality that he added it to his repertoire. In the cast will be the principal members of the Alcazar company. A costly and artistic scenic production is promised. As these will be the farewell appearances of Mr. Figman at the Alcazar a series of crowded audiences may be looked for.

The Follies Are Coming

The second and final week of the Ruth St. Denis engagement at the Columbia will commence Monday night. She will offer a program comprising the best numbers seen during the past week and others not as yet seen here. Musical director Meyrowitz and the orchestra under his baton will be heard in two big orchestral numbers. They will be played during the intermission. The Ziegfeld Revue Follies of 1910 is to open on Easter Sunday night, April 16, instead of Monday, April 17, as first announced. This will be the first presentation of a Ziegfeld Revue in the West. So massive are these productions and so much in demand by theatergoers of the East that Ziegfeld has heretofore refused all offers to come West. Bickel and Watson, Bert Williams, Bobby North, Lillian Lorraine, Shirley Kellogg, Fanny Grice, numerous others and seventy-five Anna Held girls will be in the Revue.

Elman to Play Once More

Manager Greenbaum has arranged to have Mischa Elman return from the South and give one more concert at Scottish Rite Auditorium on Easter Sunday afternoon, April 16. He will play an entirely new program which will include Bruch's rare "Concerto" in D minor, Saint-Saens' "Rondo Capriccioso," Wieniawski's "Souvenir de Moscow" and a Mozart "Sonata."

The Hotaling Season at Ye Liberty

Richard M. Hotaling's third season with the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, was launched with "The Melting Pot" this week, and judging from the interest and enthusiasm displayed it will be the most successful he has had. "The Melting Pot" will be given for the final times this Saturday and Sunday and on Monday evening "The House Next Door" will be staged. It is the comedy by J. Hartley Manners in which J. E. Dodson all last season in New York and has never been presented in the West. Hotaling has an excellent role and will be surrounded by a strong cast that will include all of the Oakland stock favorites. For Easter week Mr. Hotaling will be presented in a farce-comedy, "Mr. Hopkinson," which will be followed by revivals of "Hamlet" and "The Merchant of Venice."

The Von Warlich Concert

An interesting program of songs will be given by Reinhold Von Warlich, the young Russian basso, at Scottish Rite Auditorium this Sunday afternoon with the assistance of the talented pianist, Uda Waldrop. It will consist of folk-songs of five nations sung in their respective languages. The first part will be devoted to old German, Russian and Italian classics; part two will include old French and Breton chansons with Welsh, Scotch, English and Irish ballads; part three will consist of four modern songs by Emanuel Moor whose works for orchestra are now attracting the attention of the musical world.

Sidney Drew at the Orpheum

Sidney Drew and his charming wife, "George Cameron," will present a one-act play entitled "The Yellow Dragon" at the Orpheum next week. Dick, the penman, said to be the most marvelous dog in the world, will make his first appearance here. Miss Irene Romain's pianologue should be a fascinating offering. Elsie Faye assisted by Joe Miller and Sam Weston will present "The Act Dainty." They are immense favorites in this city. Next week will be the last of Mlle. Bianci Froehlich, Coakley, Hanvey and Dunlevy, The Four Konerz Brothers and Claude Gillingwater.

The Russian Symphony Festival

The Russian Symphony Orchestra which is to give a festival of seven concerts in this city and two at the Greek Theater, will number fifty-one instrumental artists, many of whom are famous soloists. Mr. Modest Altschuler will wield the baton and three splendid vocal artists will add variety and charm to the programs. These are Mme. Joel-Hulse, Mr. Frank Ormsby and Mr. Bertram Schwahn. Some beautiful Russian vocal quartettes and duets will be heard for the first time in this city. As many requests are being made for the list of symphonies to be given, we print the list: Beethoven's Number 5, Schumann's Number 1, Schubert's "Unfinished," Rachmaninoff's Number 2, Tschaikowsky's Number 4 and Number 6 and Dvorak's "The New World."

UDA WALDROP

Pianist with Von Warlich, the Russian singer at Scottish Rite Hall next Thursdays evening and Sunday afternoon.

In the Limelight

Having achieved success with his "The Deep Purple," which is a dramatization of the "badger game," Wilson Mizner is now writing another thriller entitled "Gordon Laylock, Killer" in which Emmett Corrigan will star.

The latest hit in New York vaudeville is a serious sketch called "The Doctor" which is being given by our old townsman Hall McAllister.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—In view of the reassembling of the Supreme Court early next week it is generally believed that one or more opinions in the big trust suits have been prepared and will be given to the public soon. A general relaxation in commerical lines has occurred throughout the country in anticipation of these important events and Wall Street has been in a condition of stagnation. Inflation in most commodity prices has disappeared and heavy exports of staples and securities from this country to Europe have left us with a tremendous trade balance in our favor. As a result of these conditions banks are glutted with idle money. Hence we find ourselves in the strongest position as concerns fundamentals to meet tariff and corporation adjustments.

Wheat—Impending May deliveries and the prospect of the ratification of the Canadian treaty are at present the main factors deterring purchases of wheat on the part of millers, investors, warehousemen or speculators. Pending the discovery of sound resting places for present available supplies of cash wheat there is little ground for hope of a material improvement in values. Speculators or others will be called upon to take the wheat that will be delivered next month on May contract. It is to be hoped that the long deferred milling demand will have developed by that time and that May will see a rapid eating into the surplus so that warehouse room may be provided for the new crop that will be harvested a month later. Nature's factory will be ready with her winter wheat output in about ninety days and it will require almost a calamity to reduce the acreage to as small a total as was harvested last year.

Corn—Owners of corn have shown some indications of tiring during the past week. Cash corn prices have not changed much but futures have shown a disposition to get down to the neighborhood of the actual property value. There is a big supply of corn afloat, mostly unsold, and there is a liberal stock in the elevators. In fact, about all the sales of cash corn made in the last two or three weeks have been at sacrifice prices and mainly to make room in the elevators.

Cotton—Trading in cotton the past week has been in a narrow range and the market is beginning to come under the influence of the usual dull Easter period when business is generally unfavorably affected, particularly in England and on the coast of Europe. Therefore it is natural to find operators gradually wedging from the market pending further developments, especially as Congress has convened in extra session and the reciprocity and tariff questions will be taken up for consideration, particularly in their relations to the import duty on cotton goods. Spinners' takings last week for the first time in many months were below the same week a year ago, indicating that the great disparity between raw cotton and manufactured goods is at last beginning to have its effect. On account of the nearness to maturity we would not sell May cotton except against actual cotton but we favor sales of July and distant months on all advances.

An Amazing Discovery

To Newbury Steeplechases on Saturday a certain Knight of the Burning Pestle esquired a lovely little chick of a Chorus Kid, whose main desire was to absorb sport thoroughly in a single afternoon, says the London Sporting Times.

"Now," she said, "I wish to learn how to back a horse without having to get it done for me. How should I proceed?"

The gallant knight drew a brace of thick 'uns from his case, and dropped them in her palm.

"Do you see a good-looking man in gold spectacles just down by those railings? He is crying out, "Seven to one, bar three."

"Oh, yes!"

"Go to him and say, 'Fourteen to two, Wavespray, Mr. Schlesinger,' give him the money, take the ticket which he gives you, and—return to me."

Promptly the little lady did as she was told. Then a field of nine horses contested the United Services Hurdle Handicap and—Major Erward's Wavespray lobbed in.

"Now," said the knight to his punting pupil, "go to Mr. Schlesinger, give him back his ticket, draw sixteen of the very best, and—put 'em in your pocket!"

But alas! for the inordinate cupidity of women! When she returned with three fivers and a quidlet gripped in her little fist, it was not gratitude but resentment over missed opportunities that possessed her soul.

"Gee-whittaker-whizz!" she exclaimed, quite angrily. "How long has this sort of thing been going on?"

sight of the objects that she had gathered together and lived familiarly with became frightful to me. Then began my long agony, in which I reconstructed detail by detail, the whole of my former happiness. Everything reminded me of her; I met her in everything, and all was still full of her presence. The looking glasses had not forgotten her image, the gloves had not yet lost the mould of her hands, there were pillows that retained the hollowed impress of her head, and the stain, the fatal darkened stain, presented itself to me at every moment, bringing up the scene afresh.

Unable to fight against all this, I abandoned the house where we had known so many joys together, and where, alone, I had passed such bitter moments. Then began long tedious days of continuous wandering, fleeing from her memory like an ingrate; days in which I struggled against revisiting the reliquary wherein her image floats. I came to the house, I saw the closed doors, the empty balconies, everything speaking of abandonment and death; and feeling myself weak, I went and drank, to drive away my sorrow. But the vision of her body as it fell into my arms, and that expression of loving reproach which came from her eyes as she retreated from life, the blood covering her, so tormented me that I suffered the most frightful grief.

After some time I returned, determined to work. I passed many days and many nights bent over the table, nervously filling page after page, endeavoring by my imagination and labor to draw myself out of my thought. Frequently the very words that I wrote touched and lacerated my wound; and at times, forgetting for a moment, I turned and sought her at my side, as I had done when she used to sit by me at my work. Not finding her, I would hurl the pen away and sink again more deeply into my sorrow.

But it is here that darkest part of my story begins, and fills me, always egoistical, more than the whole of this drama with grief. Do not smile!

One night, after several hours of work,I felt a light noise behind me. I was nervous and turned abruptly. You will forgive my saying that I saw nobody. I continued working, somewhat troubled, and mistrusting the shadows that flocked outside the luminous radius of my lamp. In a little whileI felt, or seemed to feel, a light touch on my shoulder; I sat rigid, remembering that she used to call me in this way when she wished to interrupt me in my work; and I experienced a horrible, anxious feeling. I did not dare to turn my face, I almost stopped breathing, dreading to find something behind me. After a moment of effort I at last turned my face, slowly, making a noise in my effort. Nothing—only the half shadows, and the gilded glittering of the picture frames. I took long breaths, feeling consoled; but still frightened. I let the pen fall, and without turning again, with a clamminess on my brow, I went straight to my bed.

It is needless to say to you that I could not sleep. The least noise, the strokes of the hours, the creak of a piece of furniture, the scurry of a rat, all produced in me cold sweats and sudden starts, in spite of all my stern reasoning.

But since then, my friend, it is always the same; I start at every sound; I work always with my ear alert, anxious to catch each noise. In a word, I am afraid, afraid, of the poor suicide whom I loved so much. I am afraid that she may return; afraid, above all, of the expression in her last look, which I cannot, nor ever shall be able to forget. I am not mad, no, but I feel her wandering invisibly around me, and I am afraid, afraid of her; but in such a way that never, not for anything, would I have dared to write this by night, fearful of feeling her touch on my shoulder, or her silent steps advancing cautiously – I am afraid!

I am afraid, yes, and of her. Come, come and free me from this terror, from this constant, insupportable anguish. Feeling someone at my side, I shall be strong. I have thought of marrying to bring to my side someone who would shield me from her, but no! She would be jealous, and I could never kiss my wife or clasp her without feeling her coming invisibly between us two.

It is not that I have ceased to love her. No; I love her and I long for her, for my days would not be so black, were she at my side. But, you see, I loved her greatly; she loved me greatly; I was very happy,and now it is fated that I pay the price by this worst of punishments—fearing her, desiring to hide myself from her.

You see! Now, at this moment, as I write to you, the creaking sound of a door being moved inwards by the wind—is it by the wind?—has made me tremble and my brow is clammy, and I cannot, I dare not turn my face.

I am afraid! I am afraid! Come, my friend, come, or I do not know what will become of me!

The Monterey Packing Company

Monterey's largest and most important manufacturing enterprise—the fish cannery of the Monterey Packing Co.,—is now at the height of its busy season, and from present indications the pack this year will amount to 50,000 cases of sardines, valued at $300,000. During the busy season—from August to December—the cannery handles about 40,000 pounds of sardines a day, and employes 175 people, whose wages range from $2.25 to $3.00 a day. In addition a crew of 24 fishermen are employed to catch the fish, and they receive about $6,000 a month for the fish they bring in. Four launches, with tenders, are kept in commission for this work. The payroll of the cannery (exclusive of the fishermen) runs from $10,000 to $12,000 a month, and about $1,000 a month more is spent for miscellaneous supplies. Fifteen thousand dollars was spent this year in remodeling and enlarging the plant and buildings, and the cannery is now one of the most up-to-date in the country. Eight years ago the cannery was started, and the initial pack amounted to but 200 cases. By making every effort to put out an extra good product, and by means of extensive (and expensive) advertising, a market was created, and now Booth's Crescent Brand Sardines are known throughout the length and breadth of the country. California is the largest purchaser. New York and Chicago buy much of the product, and the eastern, central and Pacific Coast states absorb the balance of the pack. F. E. Booth who organized the Monterey Packing Company, is president of the concern, and general agent for its output. K. Hovden, an expert in the handling and packing of fish, is the manager of the cannery.

Norah—Oim sorry to say, sorr, that Miss Giddy isn't in.

Mr. Caller (facetiously)—Why are you sorry, Norah.

Norah—Because, sorr, it's the biggest sthory Oi ever told.

R. C. Hupp of the Hupp-Yeats Electric Car Company while on a pleasure jaunt to California, decided to "try out" the Hupp-Yeats on Los Angeles' steep hills, and he was far from disappointed with its showing. For four days Mr. Hupp's party, which included Mrs. Hupp and sister and Mr. Harris of the Hupp-Yeats Company, visited the various towns surrounding Los Angeles, Pasadena, Santa Monica, San Pedro and other points of interest. In the four days the car covered 200 miles over the picturesque but steep hills, and the car averaged 60 miles to one charge of the batteries.

The S. and A. Film Company of this city have just removed a Republic Staggard Tread Tire from the rear wheel of their seventy horsepower Thomas Flyer which has done 8,000 miles of service. The Thomas Flyer is used for visiting the moving picture theatres throughout the country, and has traveled 8,000 miles over all sorts of roads, summer and winter, regardless of weather conditions. When the Thomas car was ordered it was equipped with Republic Tires and these have given absolute satisfaction during their use.

Expert engineers in the leading universities of the country frequently draw upon the Rambler factory organization for ideas in the instruction of students in advanced automobile engineering methods. Sixty students of the University of Wisconsin and a body of men from the Central Y. M. C. C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of the Diamond Rubber Company, declares that Wyoming is fast coming into prominence as an automobile touring ground. The mountains are difficult but the motor car has proven its ability to negotiate their grades. An interesting tour was made last season by Elmer Lovejoy of Laramie, Wyoming, during which the snowy range with an elevation of 12,000 feet was topped in a Franklin car. The machine wore Diamond tires.

A good deal has been said recently about a switch in automobile manufacturing affairs whereby we find the European looking to the American engineers for ideas, rather than the American looking to the European, as was formerly the case. An illustration of this is given in a report recently received by E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Co. from the Lozier factory. One of the Royal engineers of Berlin has requested from the Lozier Motor Co. a description of the American built Lozier car, with details of materials used and factory practice. He states that there is an increasing tendency to the use of American motor cars in Germany and Austria, especially of the better grade and quality.

A letter received by the Pioneer Automobile Company from the Chalmers factory claims that the champion miniature automobile driver of this country is Master Gabriel who operates a Chalmers "30" car. Master Gabriel is also America's greatest midget actor and stage creator of "Buster Brown," "Little Nemo" and "Tommy Tucker." Although scarcely four feet in height he controls the Chalmers "30" with greatest ease. He has already placed his order for a 1912 Chalmers car.

A Louis XI Romance

Here is another historical novel, "The Justice of the King." Historical romances are, as a matter of course, more romantic than historical, but Hamilton Drummond has succeeded in subordinating the love-making, leaving the chief interest to center upon the political plotting. The scenes are laid in the later years of the reign of Louis XI and the action moves between the royal chateau at Valmy, and Amboise where the Dauphin was in residence. The plot concerns the abnormal suspicion of Louis who was distrustful alike of friends and foes and jealous of his own power. It suited his purpose to assume, now that Charles was nearing his thirteenth year, at which age he could have ascended the throne, that the child was the center of a plot to depose his majesty, and Philip de Comines, his chamberlain, was dispatched to Amboise ostensibly to investigate but actually to create the semblance of a conspiracy which would provide an excuse for the king to punish with due severity the thirteen-year-old traitor and thus pose to all the world as the ruler so just that in him the father could forget the son. Mr. Drummond has chosen to represent Charles as a naturally frank, bright boy, but owing to the neglect and unnatural suspicion of his father, the boy's good qualities were overlaid with a sullen distrustfulness. While history presents him as a backward youth, given to childish amusements, we now have a picture of a healthy, normal lad, fond of playing at siege and battle and personating the great characters of history and romance. There are plots within plots, escapes by the narrowest of margins, quick thinking and quicker action which keep the reader interested and excited from the first page, where the decrpit king receives the dispatuch which sets the wheels in motion to the last where, with a quick changing of his whims and plans, he presides over a marriage. One does not go to romances for history, or at least one should not. The best that can be asked or expected is that they present a fairly correct background and that the characters are not entirely at variance with the probabilities. Judged by this standard "The Justice of the King" belongs well up towards the head of the list. From the Macmillan Co.

An Old Fashioned Thriller

Robert Louis Stevenson used to say of a certain class of books that if they were only bad enough they were good. "Dropped from the Fast Express," a product of the pen of one Fred M. White, just misses the badness which would have proved its salvation. Most of the old stock characters, Beauty in Distress, the Wicked Villain, the Avenging Nemesis, and Unfortunate-Suitor-True-and-Tried, are present, with a background of Dishonorable Father, Weak Brother and Titled Ladies and Gentlemen, as plentiful as the traditional June blackberries. There are crime and mystery and escapes by half-hair-bredths. The infamous intrigues concern race course frauds and bridge gambling, so the che-ild, the mutilated marriage certificate, the graveyard scene and the stor-r-rm have been eliminated per force. Yarns of this brand, it used to be assumed, found popularity in the servant's hall and amongst factory hands. If it ever were so, the "best-seller" has long since displaced them, and where "Dropped from the Fast Express" is to find readers passes power of conjecture unless, to refer again to Stevenson, it falls into the hands of those who will find it bad enough to be at least passably good. More surprising than the yarn itself is the discovery that it bears the imprint of that old publishing firm, Laird and Lee of Chicago.

A Wholesome Story

For "The Honor of the Big Snows" James Oliver Curwood has taken us once more into the far north, to the trading posts up under the Arctic Circle where life is rough and primitive, but the few conventions are rigidly observed and the Ten Commandments are kept literally, as the practical working rule of life. The special question of honor is the respect with which womankind is regarded and every man constitutes himself the guardian of every woman who requites the service by conducting herself in seemly fashion. Amongst these Indians and mixed breeds, where the man of pure white blood is the rare exception and the woman of pure white blood virtually unknown, the so-called "unwritten law" is the only law, but in order to have it invoked on her behalf the woman must be innocent of offence. Amongst the men of the posts, whatever their station, the code is so well defined and so universally accepted that it needs no advertisement, but when men from "civilization" penetrate into the big snows for sport they are apt to bring with them their civilized idea that anything is fair game for the hunter, and then there is trouble. Knowing nothing of the institution of divorce, whereby wives and husbands are disposed of at the dictation of any trifling whim, the child born out of lawful wedlock becomes a pariah, a literal outcast. "If the winds had whispered the secret nothing would have come near him—the Indian women would sooner have touched the plague—he would have been an outcast, despised as he grew older, pointed at and taunted, called names which are worse than those called to the lowest and meanest dogs. That is what it means to be born under that curse—up here," said Jan Thoreau, dissuading a man from "the South" from his purpose of deserting an uncongenial wife in the United States to unite himself to a girl at one of the posts, abandoning everything for her but keeping the secret of his bondage. Jan is the hero of the story, a moral as well as a physical hero and one of the few leading characters in bookland to whom we cannot grudge the title. We are indebted to Mr. Curwood for a clean, wholesome story, a healthy contrast to the sex-problems in which the edges of morality are nibbled at until they are consumed and for a good dog which is never transformed into a "lamb-person" or any other hybrid monstrosity. Bobbs-Merrill are the publishers. Illustrations in color by Charles Livingstone Bull.

Why the Ohio is Termed "MONARCH OF MOUNTAIN AND DESERT"

When the chief official of one of the biggest and best known automobile concerns in the country comes to us and says as he did: "Gentlemen, if you are making the OhiO one-half as good as you say, you have the greatest automobile proposition on the face of the earth,"—then it only remains for us to prove that it is just as good as we say it is, and we have done our duty to the public. Therefore, the OhiO Sales Company, to prove the OhiO is as good as claimed, are going to put a limited quantity of them on the market on their merits.

PERFORMANCE OF CAR STANDS BURDEN OF PROOF

Among other notable victories an Ohio was the FIRST CAR to make the run across desert and Rockies from New York to San Francisco over the Southern Route—the ONLY CAR ever to cross the great American desert without refilling the radiator. The OhiO accomplished this feat with a load of over 2½ tons, covering the entire distance—4,577 miles—without a single mishap or breakdown. With an average daily upkeep cost of $3.15, the OhiO made another record on this trip—one of economy and endurance never approached by any other automobile.

An OhiO was one of the eight Glidden Tour Contestants in the 1910 event to reach Chicago with original motor and all parts intact.

An OhiO took first place with a perfect score in the "Round-State-of-Georgia" Tour. Although competing with cars costing twice as much, the OhiO ably defeated all cars in speed and hill climbing.

Ability to meet such exacting conditions without flinching proves the superiority of the OhiO and its tremendous desirability for Universal use.

The best materials that money can buy go into its construction throughout. But instead of spreading money over non-essentials, we have it into the vital parts—the parts to which every automobile owner must inevitably look for the greater returns on his investment. In most cases these parts are identical with those found in the highest-priced cars—in many cases they are better, as may be seen from catalogued specifications.

We can't begin to tell you here about the infinite care that has gone into the perfection of details. Yet they contribute so heavily to human comfort and safety that you must know them. You might never consider their absence in other cars until suddenly brought face to face with their vital necessity.

OAKLAND, APRIL 9, 1911

The public auction of sixty-eight lots in Piedmont Terrace-by-the-Lake, one of the most exclusive residence tracts in Oakland, which was held on the property yesterday afternoon, was the most complete success of any public sale of residence property ever held in this city. The sale was held under the auspices of the Laymance Real Estate Company. Although the auction had been advertised only two weeks in advance of the day of sale, there were present on the grounds a large gathering of buyers from San Francisco and other counties, as well as residents of Oakland and outside districts in Alameda County. $69,510.00 worth of property was sold up to the time of the suspension of the auction which had to be called at 7:15 p. m., owing to the lateness of the hour. Subsequently, several of the lots remaining unsold when the auctioneer stopped the public offering, were disposed of on private terms to buyers who had not secured the desired opportunity of bidding.

The buyers included builders, physicians, judges and high-class homesite seekers, many of whom are planning to make improvements on the lots bought without delay. Inasmuch as well-defined restrictions on the value of improvements to be made on the lots sold are included in every deed, the high-class residential character of the tract is perpetually assured.

The results of the sale are significant, because they establish positively the high appreciation under which first class residence property in Oakland is held, not only by its own people, but by the shrewdest outside realty investors. The bidding for the property was lively and the buyers expressed the most perfect satisfaction with the bargains they secured.

The Lorimer Case

Because Senator Lorimer was elected by bribery we are told that his case affords an illustration of the peril of the Constitutional method of electing Senators. The illustration might be of some value if we knew that any other method could be devised to prevent men from getting into the Senate by corruption. We know that an electorate may be debauched as well as a legislature. We know there are men in the House as well as in the Senate who were elected by direct vote of the people not because of their fitness but because of the money corruptly employed to procure their election. The case of Lorimer, if it illustrates anything, illustrates the futility of trying to purify politics by machinery; for some of the members of the Illinois legislature who were bribed to vote for Lorimer were re-elected notwithstanding their record for dishonesty. But it is not the purification of the Senate that is sought by the leading agitators of the direct method of election. Take William R. Hearst for example. He is under no delusion respecting the consequences of abandoning the Constitutional method of electing Senators. Honest Senators capable of doing their own thinking and courageous enough to follow the dictates of their own conscience and their own common sense are not the kind of statesmen that Mr. Hearst is in favor of electing. His ideal Senator is the man with his ear to the ground on the alert for tips from the Hearst papers. And nearly every man so far elected by direct vote approximates the Hearst ideal.

Political Metaphysics

Mr. Hearst has such a fine sense of metaphysical distinctions that he does a great deal of his talking in what appear to be pardoxes. As, for example, when he explains the difference between a man who purchases a seat in the Senate and one who has his seat purchased for him. It is better, according to Mr. Hearst, to have a bribe-giver in the Senate than to have there a man whose election was procured by bribery without the use of his money. In two well remembered instances of men who purchased their seats, says Mr. Hearst, the offense was grave only "in a personal sense," because the act of corruption sprang "from personal vanity, the desire to win political distinction." These men, Mr. Hearst argues, were "not very dangerous because they owned themselves" and it was "at least possible that they would act in freedom." Vastly different is the case of Mr. Lorimer, says our distinguished authority on ethics and the metaphysics of politics: "everything he touches in the Senate is smeared by the taint of bribe money" because he didn't put up his own cash, and because he votes for private interests. Presumably in Mr. Hearst's philosophy if the Senate were composed exclusively of men who paid for their seats with their own checks no act of that body would be "smeared by the taint of bribe money," the members being their own masters. Apparently it hasn't occurred to Mr. Hearst that the bribe-giver though he own himself may not be the owner of anything worth boasting about. The man who bribes his way to the Senate is a criminal, and it is hard to perceive how any of his official acts can be free from the taint of criminality. There can be no question as to whether he is dangerous. If he corrupted a Legislature to gratify his vanity he might corrupt the whole Senate from the same motive. Being vain enough to buy honor at the sacrifice of decency the principal element of danger in him is self-ownership. Greater mischiefs have followed from vanity than from avarice. It is under the disguises of vanity that the worst deceptions are practiced on mankind. Now it does not follow that the man whose seat in the Senate has been bought for him is dangerous. He may be an honest man. The politicians of this State know of the case of a Senator elected without his knowledge by bribery from motives of hostility to his principal opponent. Not infrequently men have been elected to office in this country with the aid of money put up not from love of them but from fear that some less desirable man might be clothed with authority. Not all of them have been the tools of the interests that financed their campaigns. Now it is not to be contended that Lorimer was unconscious of the wrongdoing by which he profited, or that he does not believe himself to be under obligations to special interests. His political past and present affiliations argue to the contrary, but so far as Mr. Hearst knows Lorimer is not to be controlled by anybody. So far as Mr. Hearst knows Lorimer may be just as independent as the former candidate of the Independence League would have been in the event of his election to the gubernatorial office in New York after conciliating Tammany and spending a fortune to conciliate voters. It is not to be gainsaid, however, that it would have been better for Lorimer and his friends and the whole country had he resigned from the Senate when the fact that his election was tainted with bribery was first made public.

The Geary Street Road

The Examiner complains that there's "nothing doing" on Geary street though one year and three months have elapsed since the people voted two million dollars for the building of the municipal road. "The prediction made a year ago," says the Examiner, "that we should see no men working on the Geary street road till the next municipal campaign became hot is in a fair way to be realized." And the Examiner adds, "And this is one more reason why the people are reconciled to frequent elections; while the campaign is on they get something done." It is interesting to learn from so high and unimpeachable authority that the people are reconciled to frequent elections. If this be the case then one of the objections to government ownership is eliminated. For one of the objections is that public servants are not inclined to render good service, and of course this inherent defect in public servants may be cured by holding an election once a month or so. But the objection on the score of service is really a minor objection. The graver ones will be recognized very shortly after we build the Geary street road, and the Examiner will complain about them just as it now complains about dilatoriness. One of the grave objections is that government ownership is conducive to the centralizing and perpetuating of political power. How this comes to be so we may perceive if we apprehend the reason why the Examiner's prophecy is to be fulfilled. Work is to be started on the Geary street road not because the Administration fears the consequences of dilatoriness but because many voters will be given employment.

The Bryan Policy

The perennial incubus of the Democracy, the Hon. William J. Bryan, is again asserting himself in the role of dictator. He is taking a hand in affairs in Washington, and he is telling the Democracy what must be done by way of preparation for the campaign of 1912. Above all things, says the Peerless One, the party must be progressive; that is it must prevent the ascendancy of the Harmon faction in national politics. Mr. Bryan will never consent to the nomination of Judson Harmon of Ohio. Indeed it is very unlikely that Mr. Bryan will ever consent to the nomination of anybody but himself. It has never been his policy to do so. It has always been his policy in the year preceding that of a national campaign to designate as unfit for party leadership the men whose qualifications for leadership were attracting to them more than ordinary attention. By persistently following this policy of elimination Mr. Bryan has succeeded in keeping himself well to the front and rendering competition negligible. This is the policy that has brought repeated disaster on the Democratic party and great pecuniary benefit to the most successful of all our political agitators. But it must be admitted that Mr. Bryan in opposing Judson Harmon is true to the principles of his political creed. The Governor of Ohio does not stand for the principles that were once peculiar to Bryanism but which are now the principles of all statesmen who have become dissatisfied with the fundamentals of our government. The line of cleavage between Harmon and Bryan is well defined. It is the eternal line of demarcation between conservatives and radicals, between statesmen and demagogues. Of the leaders of Democracy whose ideas are akin to those of Mr. Bryan the most conspicuous at this moment is Governor Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey, once upon a time a conservative college professor but as a politician very susceptible to the emotions of the multitude. If not fertile in new-fangled notions of government Governor Wilson is not prejudiced against any that find favor with the crowd. Though once an educator he is not disposed to teach. Apparently since emerging from the atmosphere of Princeton he has locked his apprehensions up that he might not discover anything to deter him from acquiescing in the absurdities of the hour. And this seems to be characteristic of the man. Read his "History of the American People" in five volumes and you will find that it is the work of a literary drudge who read authorities built on authorities with his senses, his heart and his understanding under lock and key. It may remind you of what Hazlitt said: that you may hear more good things on the outside of a stagecoach from London to Oxford than if you were to pass a twelvemonth with the heads of colleges of that famous university. There are not many good things to be found on the inside of Wilson's history. However, as Governor of New Jersey Woodrow Wilson by conscientiously striving to do what the people in their present mood wish him to do, is achieving great popularity. He is an obedient servant. If the people were to change their mind and decide upon abandoning all the principles to which they are now wedded, which, of course, they are quite likely to do, they could find no man so quick to fall in with the complexion of their impulses as the ex-President of Princeton. Nor need they ever fear that he will bore them with homilies on the folly of their prepossessions. An ideal man for President is Wilson if the nation be committed to Progressiveness. But let this notion become widespread, and the Hon. William J. Bryan in all probability will turn against him with the same earnestness which now characterizes his opposition to Harmon.

A Tirade Against Hamilton

Some men are so constituted that they seldom get hold of a truth with scientific precision. They get hold of one side of it, and never think of bringing all sides into their due relation. When men thus constituted unite their defect with the spirit of intolerance they become bitter partisans, thorough-paced sticklers for their passions and prejudices. A man of this character has been brought to our notice by the Neale Publishing Company of Washington, D. C., from whose press has emanated "A Study in Alexander Hamilton," by Fontaine T. Fox "of the Louisville bar." By this book Mr. Fox affords us a more interesting study of himself than of Hamilton. It is an interesting study that Mr. Fox affords because in him we have the type of man who is incapable of getting hold of more than one side of a truth. Even through the perspective of years he cannot view Hamilton's activities from more than one viewpoint, and he can account for them on none but the same hypothesis on which they were accounted for by his most bitter enemies. He tells us that all men read with their eyes and only a few men read with their mind. Mr. Fox, it is evident, reads chiefly with his heart which is rather a curious organ since there appears to be cherished therein an inveterate hatred of a man who has been dead more than one hundred years. Here is a hater for whom old Sam Johnson would have had prodigious respect. Mr. Fox's hatred is a passion grounded rather in pastisan zeal than any personal grievance that might have been inherited from an ancestor. Indeed, he tells us that from his earliest years he was taught by his father to idealize Alexander Hamilton. It was only after he studied Hamilton's life that his admiration was changed to "contempt for his life, for his conduct and for his motives." And now at this late day Mr. Fox has taken up the old quarrel of the anti-Federalists against the Federalists, the noise of which sounded through the early years of the nation's history, when the debates of the Congress were embittered by factional differences that produced discord in domestic life and bequeathed prejudices to the minds of posterity. Into that ancient quarrel he has thrown himself with all the passion and fury that characterized some of the adherents of Thomas Jefferson when the question of State rights was first raised, and his arraignment of Hamilton could not be more spirited, more envenomed were the "monarchist in disguise" again on life's stage fighting for the principles which were once regarded as evidence of a desire to strangle the infant liberties of his country in the cradle and to restore the emancipated colonies to their dependence upon Great Britain. But Attorney Fox does not confine himself to the discussion of political questions. He scrutinizes Hamilton's private life, and tells the story of the Reynold's scandal which grew out of the malicious charge that the great statesman and soldier had been speculating in treasury warrants. Attorney Fox is terribly incensed against Hamilton for having confessed his relations with a woman who blackmailed him, and he asks, "Is the charge of speculation in Treasury warrants a more heinous charge than treachery to his conjugal vow?" Also he asks, "Suppose his wife had been false to her conjugal vow would he have considered her offense less heinous than that charged against him?" And he adds, "Taking his own estimate of his honor as a man, a husband and as a father you have the clew to this creature's despicable character." From all of which we get Mr. Fox's viewpoint. Alexander Hamilton had one weakness. He was susceptible to the fascinations of women. He was trapped by a blackmailer. To prove his innocence of an infamous crime, to prove that he had not robbed the government which he had fought to establish, he told the story of his adulterous intrigue to a committee of three men appointed by Congress. They proclaimed his innocence of the crime against the government and promised to keep secret the story of his relations with Mrs. Reynolds. One of the members of that committee, Monroe, to revenge himself on Hamilton, divulged the secret, and now Attorney Fox argues that Hamilton was a monster who did not scruple at bringing shame on his wife or telling of a disgraceful intrigue. "Even Aaron Burr," he says, "was never accused by his bitterest enemy of kissing and then telling." Apparently Attorney Fox is oblivious of the fact that the woman kissed by Hamilton was a blackmailer who had no reputation to lose and who made capital out of her relations with him and caused him to be involved in a scandal that threatened his family with disgrace and himself with eternal infamy, and from which he could not extrcate himself without telling the truth, which he did, believing that it would never be divulged to the world. And seeing only one side of this affair Attorney Fox is unable to see anything good in Hamilton's career as a soldier and statesman. He regards him as a man of talent who applied his talent to nothing but political trickery. He fails utterly to appreciate Hamilton's extraordinary genius or the inestimable services that he rendered to his country. The temperament of the man who guided Washington, who directed all the policies of the country in its infancy and whose principles are imbedded in the very groundwork of the government is absolutely beyond his comprehension. Mr. Fox is a very harsh judge of men. He has yet to learn that there are too many anomalies, too many defects, too many redeeming qualities in human nature to arrive at any just estimate of any individual. All character is made up of innumerable qualities, and when judging of the worst of men if we pronounce on one act a hundred others rise up to contradict it. Alexander Hamilton was a statesman of the Edmund Burke school of philosophy. The horrors of the French Revolution, which, by the way, he predicted in a letter to his friend Lafayette, were ever before his eyes, and he was obsessed with the importance of the principles of stability. Trained in camps, distrustful of the vacillating masses, keenly appreciative of the fundamentals of Anglo-Saxon liberty, and accustomed to the rigor of military rule, he was disposed to insure stability by strengthening the arm of government. In temperament he was the antithesis of the wavering Jefferson who had lived and been feted in Paris and who came back to this country with great enthusiasm for the principles of democracy. Thus there was a pressure of tendencies separating the two men, the same pressure of tendencies that separate political leaders today. In their day both were regarded as dangerous. Undoubtedly each was sincere in his distrust of the other, but as to their devotion to the interests of the government there is no longer any doubt in the minds of men of intelligence. And today Alexander Hamilton is regarded by many impartial and learned students as the most brilliant patriot, the most remarkable man in American history. Of one thing we can be certain, he was one of the few men of his day who were able to dispense with favor and scorn popularity. He accepted the odium of unpopular laws knowing that posterity would reap the fruit of those rude days of conflict, of hatreds and resentments.

Varied Types

XVII—GEORGE STERLING

By Edward F. O'Day

He told me many arresting things about Carmel-by-the-Sea, heightening its natural charms by the vividness of his descriptions and glamoring its commonplaces with the magic of his poetic phrases. He deprecated the growing Carmel Myth which makes the little seaside settlement the abode of "weird and wonderful creatures of crankishness" who go about with their hair hanging down their backs, gushing out their souls and demanding admiration. He thinks that Carmel's "writers have been overrated and its scenery underrated," yet he points out that most of Carmel's writers are veteran writers "who are making good money and who seldom talk shop." He mentioned Michael Williams, John Fleming Wilson, Grace MacGowan Cook, Alice MacGowan, Mary Austin and Jimmy Hopper as Carmelites who find a ready market for all they write.

"Outside of these there are not more than three in Carmel who try to write," he told me, "and Carmel is a town of a thousand or so."

Characteristically enough, George Sterling did not mention himself in this list of Carmel writers and yet I inferred that he was the pioneer of the place, or almost so. I believe that Mary Austin was already there when Charles Rollo Peters pointed out the beauty of the place to Sterling and inspired him with the idea of making it his permanent abode.

There could be no doubt about his desire to discourage the popular notion of Carmel as a high-brow community.

"There is no reading of manuscripts," he said; "our sense of humor is too strong for that. I think the only thing of the sort was when Jimmy Hopper read us his '9009.' Perhaps it would be better if we got together oftener, provided of course that we had the courage for destructive criticism as well as for the other kind."

I wish I could reproduce the poetry of his references to the natural beauty of the place, but I am not a poet. One expression, however, sticks in my mind.

"You get so used to this pea soup bay," he said with a glance toward the window, "that you forget what blue water is like."

But I would much rather hear George Sterling talk about his poetry and himself. The two themes are not interchangeable and they are by no means the readiest to his tongue. Yet he can be induced to discuss them. He can be induced, for instance, to tell the story of how he nailed the Irish flag to the steeple of the Presbyterian Church in Sag Harbor.

At the age of fifteen Sterling became a Catholic and developed a prejudice against Presbyterianism. To give this prejudice visible form he and another boy who is today a prominent citizen of San Francisco, climbed at midnight to the top of the steeple of the Presbyterian Church, one hundred and fifteen feet in the air, and fastened an Irish flag to the lightning rod above the weather vane. In the morning however the flag had blown away.

Nothing daunted the lads tried again, this time with a pirate flag. It was a piece of bunting nine feet by twelve with the skull and cross bones on one side and the cross on the other.

"When we were two blocks away from the church," said Sterling, "we could still hear that flag flapping in the wind."

Next morning Sag Harbor was in an uproar.

"There wasn't a member of the church who would dare to go up to the top of that steeple and take the flag down. It stayed there for three days and then they had to bring a steeple jack from Brooklyn who charged them two hundred dollars for taking it down. The New York papers were full of the affair and I was a hero. But the Presbyterians got ahead of me. They made a crazy quilt out of the flag and raffled it for five hundred dollars. I saw I couldn't beat Presbyterian commercialism, so I left Sag Harbor."

About his poetry Sterling is simply, unaffectedly modest.

"There was a time when I had the big head," he confesses; "the time that Ambrose Bierce praised my 'Wine of Wizardry'; but I got over it."

And then, in answer to a direct question:

"'The Testimony of the Suns' is incomparably the best thing I've written. Compared to it all the rest is nowhere. In it I laid down a cosmic philosophy which I don't think can be refuted. If any of my poetry should have the good fortune to live it will be that. The poem says something and the world seems to demand poems which say something."

GEORGE STERLING

But Sterling is not over-enthusiastic about the world's demand for poetry.

"I do very well with the magazines, but I have never tried to make a cent out of my books. However I have an income and don't expect to live by my poetry. Perhaps the reason why poetry is not profitable is because the publishers don't have to pay much for it. There is competition for short stories, but not for poetry."

Then he told of the recently organized Poetry Society of America of which he is a charter member, one of fifty.

"Every poet of importance in America belongs," he said. "Its object is to awaken a more general interest in poetry."

But quite frankly he admitted that he didn't know how this was to be done.

I asked him how he ranked the living poets of America and he named the four whom he considers at the top: Edwin Markham, Anna Hempstead Branch, Bliss Carman and Cale Young Rice.

"I am speaking now of poets' poetry," he explained. "I measure a poet by his greatest height, not by his average. I put Markham first for his 'Wharf of Dreams' and his 'Semiramis,' not for his 'Man with the Hoe' which is great in individual lines but not as a whole."

He talked of these poets in a detached way, as though neither himself nor anyone else would think of naming George Sterling among them. Perhaps poetry does not entirely satisfy his ambition.

"Now that I have got what has been called 'the poison of art' out of my system," he confessed, "I shall try some prose, some short stories. I have tried the drama, but while I can do poetry without its being excessively rotten, I don't think I can write a play. I finished one act of a medieval drama called 'Lilith,' but I don't think I'll go on with it. All my characters talk alike; they talk like me."

It was not said out of compliment to the characters; but it must be recorded that George Sterling talks uncommonly well, alternating flashes of poetry with colloquialisms and never getting too far from the saving presence of humor.

And let me not forget his enthusiasm. It flamed out suddenly when he thought of an eighteen-year old boy in Auburn who had sent him some verses for criticism. Poets, it has always seemed to me, are not often enamored of another's muse; they are more anxious to carp than to appreciate. I must either revise that judgment or count Sterling an exception, for he displayed an interest in Clark Ashton Smith of Auburn which he had not shown when his own verses, his own ambitions were under discussion. And when it was suggested that I give the readers of Town Talk an opportunity to savor this youngster's poetry, he was sincerely delighted.

"I owe a great deal to one man," he said; "to Ambrose Bierce; and I would be glad to do something for a youngster who is worth while. This boy has a wonderful gift, if I know anything about such things."

And as George Sterling handed me these verses by eighteen-year old Clark Ashton Smith of Auburn, I realized that there was at least one member of the Poetry Society of America who was trying unselfishly to do something for the future of poetry in America:

The Last Night

I dreamed a dream: I stood upon a height,
A mountain's utmost eminence of snow,
Whence I beheld the plain outstretched below
To a far sea-horizon, dim and white.
Beneath the sun's expiring, ghastly light
The dead world lay, phantasmally aglow;
Its last fear-stricken voice, a wind, came low;
The distant sea lay hushed, as with affright.

I watched, and lo! the pale and flickering sun,
In agony and fierce despair, flamed high,
And shadow-slain, went out upon the gloom.
Then Night, that grim, gigantic struggle won,
Impended for a breath on wings of doom
And through the air fell like a falling sky.

German View of New York Fire

The terrible loss of life in the shirtwaist factory fire in New York has been made the subject of severe censure by the newspapers of Berlin. Our skyscrapers or "cloud scratchers," as they are called in Berlin, come in for a good deal of hostile criticism. The tartest comment is made by a writer for the Lokal-Anzeiger who was for many years in New York as a correspondent. He swings a prejudiced pen in this fashion:

"In view of the incessant, murderous catastrophes in America, people with sound common sense may well ask why Messrs. Taft, Roosevelt, and Carnegie are wasting their love for humanity on Europe. They are chiefly concerned for our lives. It is us they would preserve from the horrors and savagery of war, while their railway Moloch alone kills annually three times as many people as fell at Mukden. How would it be if these philanthropists turned their attention to an amelioration of the horrors of the struggle for existence before their own doors. Some scheme of pensioning the dependents of the victims or the cripples of American catastrophes would perhaps satisfy humanity more than the erection of a peace temple at The Hague."

A Cure for Peritonitis?

Dr. Eugene Doyen of Paris claims to have discovered a new remedy for peritonitis, and, in a lecture delivered at a meeting of the Academy of Medicine, explained the beneficial effects of his new method, at the same time giving illustrations of many cases treated and cured by him during the last few months. According to Dr. Doyen's statement an injection of a few cubic centimetres of his new solution twenty-four hours before performing laparotomy is enough to prevent any danger of subsequent peritonitis. An intravenous injection can be made in the case of immediate danger. Another advantage claimed by the doctor for his preparation, and perhaps the most interesting, is that the solution, when mixed with isotonic saltwater, becomes a sort of artificial serum, which has the double quality of assuring immunity against practically all infectious diseases, and, at the same time, providing hyperdermically complete nutrition for the whole system. In the course of his experiments, Dr. Doyen said that he had achieved immediate and complete results where infections had not advanced very far and had found it the best remedy in all cases of advanced infection and even in some reputed cases such as rheumatism and gout.

No World's Fair for Paris

There is to be no World's Fair in Paris in 1920. After a good deal of agitation and discussion the project has been definitely abandoned by the Municipal Council. Although no reason has been officially announced the explanation offered by the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Paris is accepted. It is a significant explanation. Says this official: "It is the common experience of Paris to see laborers in general and navvies in particular suddenly stop work, with the result that contractors can neither tell how much a job will cost nor how long they may be kept waiting before it is finished. This state of uncertainty is so pronounced that employers of labor, whose co-operation would be indispensable, are unanimous in stating that they could not undertake to have any building grounds ready at any given date."

"Chickens Who Have Missed Their Way"

Those of us who delight in slang have long been used to the designation "chicken" as applied to certain youthful feminines. A "chicken" is a little older, though not necessarily more sophisticated than the girl who is variously called a "squab," a "broiler," a "cluck-cluck," or a "flapper," but obviously much younger than an "old hen." It remains, however, for a distinguished and serious French prelate to apply the word "chicken" to young women in a scientific spirit. According to Mgr. Henry Bolo, a well known Parisian pulpit orator, the girl author or the girl student is a "chicken who has missed her way." Apparently the girl who does not devote herself to study or authorship is a "chicken who has not missed her way," and the "chickens" of American slang do not always miss their way. But perhaps the Parisian pulpiteer was making a subtle reference to "Chantecler." That he is an optimist may be inferred from his statement that the girl of today is avid of mental cultivation. He also said that some modern girls know altogether too much. That has frequently been said of the San Francisco "chicken."

Socialists Beaten

Just as the Socialists of this State were in the midst of their felicitations over the election of J. Stitt Wilson came the news from Milwaukee, where a year ago, the Socialists carried practically every city office. After one year's experience of Socialist government the people revolted and on Tuesday of last week the Socialists were defeated all along the line. An issue was raised between the Socialists and the Catholics, the former objecting to the participation of the Catholics in politics. The Catholics elected every one of their candidates, and their candidates were representatives of all creeds. One of them was Mrs. S. M. Cantrovity, a Jewess, who was supported by the Catholic women with great enthusiasm. She was elected to the school board. People who regard the Socialist victory in Berkeley as significant should consider the Socialist defeat in Milwaukee, the great American hotbed of Socialism

Birth Figures for France

France is once more worrying about the declining birth rate. Figures presented by a member of the Chamber of Deputies have caused widespread discussion. In 1870 the number of births was 1,000,000, in 1895 they amounted to only 850,000, and since that year a rapid fall has set in, until in 1909 they numbered only 770,000, of which 393,000 were males. In the meantime the population of the German empire has risen from 40,000,000 to 60,000,000 inhabitants. France would find it easier to be reconciled to the decline of births in the republic if her enemy Germany did not show such a wonderful increase.

Rhymes Wanted

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Do you know of a series of verses that rhyme with "Tipperary?" If not will you please permit me the use of your columns to inquire whether the "poem" is known to any of your readers? My recollection of it is that it was written by way of retort to a versifier who said that the Town of Tipperary could not be celebrated to any great extent in song because of the impossibility of finding rhymes for its name. Yours truly,

The Conversion of Harvard

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I enjoyed very much your paragraph about the Roosevelt speech at the Harvard Club because I have found several members of that club who heard the speech and were converted. Yes, strange as it may seem, there are graduates of Harvard who changed their estimate of Roosevelt after hearing that speech. They concluded that they had been doing him injustice in regarding him as a wild-eyed purveyor of firebrands. He was so mild, so moderate, so conservative, so rational in his exposition of his attitude toward public affairs that several above-the-average men were convinced that he was a very much misunderstood man. How easy it is to soft-soap the educated! My Harvard friends flatter themselves that they are intelligent men and are not to be hoodwinked. Yet they turned their minds over completely to Teddy on this occasion and even after the spell had been withdrawn they did not reflect that they had been listening to the flamboyant politician who for years has been sowing dragons' teeth all over the country. They took him at his word (which he was afraid to utter until he received the assurance that no reporters were present) that he was really conservative and didn't believe in revolutionizing things all of a sudden or in punishing men who had been following rules that had been universally accepted as in accordance with prevailing principle. Yet this is the man, who, everybody knows, has been going about with the loud pedal on wholesale denunciation and the soft pedal on the plea for honest discrimination in favor of the good in all classes. This is the man who, while professing to love the Constitution, has undermined it with mischievous precedents; who enforced laws against capitalistic trusts and winked at violations of them by the labor trusts; who has abused the courts in the language of a blatherskite, and when censured had the impudence to assert that he only had been indulging in criticism after the manner of Lincoln; who has gone about expressing his disapproval of muckraking one day and on the next supplying the muckrakers with material by the yard. Yes, this is the man who, while preaching conservatism behind doors barred against the press made a tremendous hit with the representatives of Harvard of his alma mater. Very truly yours, —Old Eli.

The Ingenious Reporter

By Pontsevrez (From the French)

"You see, gentlemen, this office is American; this typewriter, near me, is American, as well as the stand that holds it; this system of electric lighting is imported from America; even the pens that we use are of American make, and I propose to deal with politics and with advertising in the American manner. Yes, gentlemen, the sole method of being original, today, in Parisian journalism, is to run a paper on the American plan! No articles of literary value! The public does not understand literature, and it becomes irritated when we offer it material that it cannot comprehend and could never have conceived. It wishes to be informed of facts, of positive facts, gentlemen, for it has nerves and sentiments, and upon them we must play. Each day bring me a sensational fact! Let us be Americans!"

A group of editors sat in a large and beautifully appointed office, listening to the directions which fell from the lips of the proprietor of the Voice of the People, the most up-to-date and best informed journal of the day—'Special telephone connection with all parts of the world!'—'Special telephone connection with all parts of the world!' —this assertion appeared and reappeared in all its advertisements.

And when the proprietor had voiced his sentiments, standing erect at the corner of his American desk, his elbow posed on the top, he smiled in self-approval. He was proud of his powers of oratory, and thought to himself, "Bonaparte, at the foot of the Pyramids, may possibly have been more laconic, he cannot have been more eloquent, for true eloquence is the power of putting truths convincingly."

A few days later, one of his most modest reporters, Gaston Longouy by name, sent in a request to see the proprietor on urgent business. Monsieur Longouy was a young fellow neither handsome nor ugly, neither tall nor short, neither fat nor thin, neither dark nor fair, neither clever nor stupid: in another office where he had worked previous to this, a colleague who passed as a wit nicknamed him "The Midway."

In the eyes of the American proprietor of the Voice of the People, Longouy had one great merit. It was he who, at the time of the massacre in Belgrade, had conceived these thrilling headlines, which so impressed the populace:

SENSATIONAL INTERVIEW WITH PRINCE KARA-GEORGEVICH!

He Refuses to Say Anything.

"He is capable of exhibiting real American genius," said the proprietor.

Consequently, he prepared himself to listen with interest and curiosity to the communication of his reporter. Assuming what he considered a very American air—hurried, cold and brusk, he greeted the reporter with:

"Well, you idiot, let us have it at once! Nothing but facts, if you please!"

"Sir," replied the reporter, copying the manner as nearly as possible; "at the entrance of Courgeville, principal town of Oise-et-Somme, thirty-eight miles from Paris, near the railway station in a little woods, a crime has just been committed."

"Crimes are committed every day," observed the proprietor phlegmatically.

"But this is not an ordinary crime. We can find material in it for a great sensation which will keep the public stirred up for many days and increase the sale of your paper ten-fold. It has points particularly favorable to a plan which I have conceived."

"And what is your plan? Let us get to the point!"

"The victim is naked and mutilated beyond the possibility of recognition; the hands, the feet and the head have disappeared. Up to now, it has been impossible to establish the identity. The only thing that can be definitely known is that it is a woman, probably a young one. There is not the faintest clue to the assassin, and the police either can't find him, or don't want to."

"And your idea?"

"I will go to Courgeville; I will act suspiciously. I will make compromising remarks, as though they escaped me accidentally. They will suspect me, arrest me, imprison me and put me on trial. I will allow myself to be taken for the murderer, and each day, thanks to a fee paid to my keeper, I shall send to the Voice of the People an article on the impressions of a man accused of murder, without allowing the mystery to be cleared up. And you can open a great contest in the paper—a hundred thousand frances in prizes to those who will guess whether I am guilty or innocent, giving sensible reasons for their conclusions. Of course, it is understood that the prize-winners will be a half-dozen of our own people who will undertake the work for a few dollars apiece. That is American enough, don't you think so?"

"Longouy," cried the proprietor, "you are an ingenious reporter! Go to your adventure. During your detention, prior to the trial, the office will assume the expenses necessary for a private room and all the comforts that can be procured for you. Good luck to the scheme!"

Longouy was not an entire stranger to the country around Courgeville; he was in love with a young and pretty woman of the middle class, who had originally come from there.

The preceding summer she had passed several weeks in her native town and had permitted him to visit her there several times, all in the most honorable way. Her husband had deserted her two years before, and none knew whether he was living or dead; and she had promised Longouy to be his wife when either a decree of divorce or a certainty of widowhood should make her free.

Less than a day after his arrival the reporter carried out his plans so well that he was seized by two detectives and dragged before the justice of the peace, who had been summoned in great haste.

Longouy was so delighted at this speedy success that he appeared before the magistrate with a malicious smile on his lips. The only thing that was really important was to prevent the mistake being manifested too soon, so that he should not quickly be discharged and sent back to the duties of a commonplace reporter. Accordingly, he assumed before the justice the English attitude—that every man is innocent until he is proven guilty.

"Monsieur," said he, "I shall not attempt to clear myself. You accuse me, and it is for you to prove your accusations."

"Still," insinuated the judge, "you would aid me very much with your explanations in discovering whether the accusations are true or false."

"Not an explanation!" said Longouy firmly. "When you have collected all your information and all your proofs, I shall see what I have to say. If you have accused me rightly, I shall have nothing to reply. But if you are unable to find sufficient evidence to convict me, I should be very clever, shouldn't I, to furnish you with it?"

"That is equivalent to a confession!" said the judge.

"Not in the least," returned Longouy. "It is a simple precaution. Often perfectly innocent people may be harassed and worried under the strain of an examination until they let fall a remark which may cost them their lives. I shall be silent.

For three consecutive days Longouy preserved a stubborn silence in the face of all questioning. During this time the inquest had been in progress.

The moment he glanced at the judge, on the fourth day, Longouy felt sure that something new had transpired. "The judge looks very much pleased," he thought. "He has discovered my trick and is going to discharge me. It is too soon! What a nuisance!"

"Today, Longouy," began the judge, "speak or not, just as you please; it no longer matters We have now all our information in regard to you, the proofs are ready and I am about to propose your transfer in the court of assizes."

"You see," continued the judge, "one point alone has been holding me back, and that is the identity of the victim. It is difficult to accuse a man of killing a person when you don't know who that person was."

"It must be," smiled Longouy.

"And the identity of the victim is now known to us for the first time."

"So much the better. Would you be willing to confide it to me?"

"Presently; first I want to describe to you exactly what passed."

"I am extremely anxious to know," replied Longouy, assured and convinced that, at any moment, he could knock over this elaborate structure of evidence with the simple declaration: "This is all farce; I have never killed anyone. If you don't believe me, ask the proprietor of the Voice of the People."

"The unfortunate woman who found death where she looked for love—a guilty love, for which she was cruelly punished——"

"Ah," interrupted Longouy, "it was her lover, then, who murdered her?"

"Yes, Longouy, her lover. She was murdered on the evening of the tenth of October."

"I thought it was the evening of the twelfth."

"The body was discovered on the twelfth. The crime had been committed forty-eight hours earlier."

"And how do you know all this?" asked the accused man in the light inconsequent tone of one who interests himself in a matter from pure dilettanteism.

"Because on the night of the tenth you disappeared secretly from Paris, and since that same night no one has ever seen the woman who was your victim. The coincidence is convincing and insurmountable."

Longouy seemed to be thinking of something that had not hitherto occurred to him. Suddenly the judge asked him:

"What did you do on the night of the tenth of October?"

Apparently the question embarrassed the accused man.

Perspective Impressions

Joe Cannon is said to be thinking of writing a book. How would "The Acts of the Apostates" go for a title?

How appropriate that those two impartial jurists, Frank H. Dunne and William P. Lawlor, should have been among Rudolph Spreckels' guests at the luncheon given to Joe Folk!

An individual of the name of Taylor says that he and fifteen other Taylors will move to this city from across the bay if A. W. Scott Jr. is nominated for mayor. They all probably belong in Tooley Street.

Mr. J. Lawrence Toole of the Examiner complains that the minstrels are telling old stories. Does Mr. Toole know of a modern story the prototype of which cannot be found in Homer, Herodotus or the Bible?

King George wants to become popular.—Examiner headline. Nothing easier. Anybody can become popular by hitting the Chautauqua circuit in this country and espousing the recall, the initiative, the referendum, government ownership, the direct primary for everything from poundkeeper to President and denouncing at the same time everybody who has more money than he needs.

"Among American parents," says Prexy Wheeler, "there is an intense, although unformulated, aversion to any crystallization of local population into castes." The prexy is talking sesquipedalian nonsense through his mortarboard.

The common laborer today knows more about social justice than did the immortal Socrates.—Professor Reed, formerly of Berkeley, now Secretary to Governor Johnson. The common laborer today also has more common sense than the average college professor.

That profound thinker and distinctly modern philosopher, Mr. John D. Barry, who scintillates on the Boughten Bulletin's editorial page every day, tells us that the Socialist victories in Berkeley, Cal., and Butte, Mont., are chiefly significant as a sign of the times. Let us now await with feverish anxiety the news from Agnews, for it will be fat with fate that all men must needs abide.

President Taft's traducers are no longer intimating that he sent the troops to the border to intimidate the oppressed people and give left-handed aid to Diaz the tyrant. Neither are they humbly apologizing. They are merely directing the flighty perversity of a disordered imagination into other channels.

Asked at a suffrage meeting in this city why French mothers kept their daughters off the boulevards Baron de Constant answered that it was because the French mothers were afraid of the cosmopolitan mobs one meets on the boulevards. Which was a pertinent answer to an impertinent question.

The Washington correspondent of the Hearst papers tells us that La Follette made a mistake in not putting O'Gorman on his committee of Lorimer investigators and adds, "but it is a mistake that may be repaired." It is by taking note of such items that one is enabled to discover the independent statesmen in the Senate who scorn all the interests with the exception of those personal interests that may be advanced by servile deference to the tyrants of the press.

The Hill tribe of Sausalito hanged Justice of the Peace Renner in effigy to express its sense of the injustice done when the man who swore that he bribed him was sent to the penitentiary while he, the recipient of the bribe, was not even indicted. How confused in their ethics are the members of the Hill tribe! Was it not decided for all time by the divinely appointed regenerators of San Francisco that stripes must be the portion of the bribe-giver and immunity with the swag for him that was tempted?

The Fair Site

At this writing the Fair site problem appears to be as far from solution as it was a month ago. The men by whom the question is to be solved have been able to approximate agreement on only one of the several sites which they have had under consideration, and that is the Harbor View site. This site the majority would have selected long ago had the property owners been able to agree on a proposition at once feasible and reasonable. The Magees have been trying to put through this deal, and they have been conducting negotiations with Mrs. Oelrichs and Mrs. Vanderbilt who inherited several blocks of property near Harbor View from their father James G. Fair. This is property which Fair was reclaiming at the time of his death when he was looking forward to the realization of his fondest dream, that of inducing Eastern capital to join with him in building a transcontinental road with a terminal on the shores of Marin and a ferry service across the bay to his North Beach holdings. The development of this section of the city is a matter of but a short time. The transport docks are to be built at North Beach and also a big Federal warehouse, and it is believed that in the very near future there will be greater demand for dockage facilities along the shore than along the present water front. All North Beach property owners are of course eager to have the Fair at their doors, not that it may be easy of access but that it may hasten the expected boom and long projected improvements. The building of the Fair at North Beach would necessitate the increase of street railroad facilities, and the probability is that both Fillmore and California street hills would be bored by tunnels.

Hearst's Star Rises

One of William R. Hearst's intimate friends recently returned from the East informs me that the illustrious Proteus of politics is at present filled with great expectations anent the roseate prospect that has unfolded for the Democracy. After turning flip-flops at random for several years Mr. Hearst has dropped into the very centre of the middle ring, and his self-applause is deafening. He is right in the midst of the party leaders, and they are much elated at his presence. The other day Senator McLean printed a whole column about Hearst in the Washington Post, the burden of which was that the prodigal son had returned to the paternal roof-tree and that the happy event should be signalized by a barbecue with the fatted calf as the piece de resistance. This article was reprinted in all the Hearst papers. And of course the average reader of the Hearst papers doesn't dream that this was a case of reciprocity. The average reader of the Hearst papers doesn't know that Senator McLean is the owner of the Washington Post, or that McLean is under obligations to Hearst and that each has been patting the other on the back at brief intervals. It was but a short time ago that the McLeans gave a great social function in Washington in honor of the Hearsts. It is only such persons as know all these things and kindred matters that apprehend the significance of the trivial phenomena of public life.

The Coddling of Clark

Mr. Hearst is now in a more advantageous position than he has enjoyed for many years. He is now admitted to the councils of the party. He is on friendly terms with the new Senator from New York, and he is coddling Speaker J. Beauchamp Clark to beat the band, making him think that he is for him for President. According to my informant Hearst's friends are saying that he will be content with a Cabinet job, but the wise politicians are saying that he is booming Clark because he knows that Beauchamp is impossible. The theory of the wise politicians is that Hearst's plan is to put Clark and all his friends under obligations which he will be able to capitalize at the psychological moment when the man from Missouri learns that the plum is just beyond his reach. Apropos of Clark's ambition a story is told that illustrates his temperament. During a debate at New Albany, Ind., on August 13, 1904, Clark declared that former Governor Taylor of Kentucky was "a murderer who ought to be hanged." A man near the platform challenged the statement and Clark walked to the edge of the platform and shouted to the man, "If you will walk outside the tent and call me a liar I will cut your throat." The logic of this irrefutable argument ended the controversy.

Why Kent Opposes Mann

The Hon. Bill Kent of Marin has taken considerable credit to himself for opposing Congressman Mann, the Republican minority leader of the House of Representatives. Kent has let it be known that he scorns the light of Mann's leading because Mann is an "obstructionist," a reactionary, one of those lost souls who see less than millennial possibilities in the program of the progressives. This is all very fine, but some of the Washington correspondents with good memories and much political erudition pretend to know another reason for Kent's opposition to the Illinois congressman. According to these scoffers the Hon. Bill Kent formerly lived in Mann's congressional district and coveted his seat in the House. That was before Bill came West to grow up with the progressive movement in California. The designs which Kent had upon Mann's constituency engendered an unfriendly feeling, 'tis said, and that feeling still persists. So it would seem, say these cynical Washington correspondents, that Kent can expect nothing from Mann and is therefore risking nothing by openly opposing and denouncing him.

The Sulking of Older

Colonel Roosevelt left behind him when he departed from San Francisco one very sore progressive. I refer to Fremont Older, chieftain of the Boughten Bulletin forces of reform. No editor was more enthusiastic than Older in acclaiming the coming of the prophet of strenuosity. No man in this city felt that he had a better right to bask in the sunshine of the colonel's presence and absorb the reflected rays of his glory. So Older preened himself when the colonel appeared on the horizon. The colonel's days in San Francisco were to be great days for Older and for the Bulletin. But alas for fond hopes! Older's great expectations were disappointed. To put the truth coldly and brutally, the colonel passed Older up. He did not seek his counsel; he did not summon him to his side; he did not insist that wherever he went thither Older should accompany him. And Older waxed sore. Like Achilles of old he sulked in his tent; but his situation differed from that of the Greek hero because nobody was trying to coax Older out. 'Tis said that for two days Older was terrible in his wrath and horrible in his peevishness, also that none dared approach him for fear of being made a vicarious victim of his rage against the colonel. However, Older smoothed his ruffled front a bit when Governor Johnson invited him to the luncheon with which he regaled the colonel in Sacramento. Thus at the fag-end of the Roosevelt festivitity Older was partially appeased.

Teddy Jr. Conservative

In this connection it is interesting to learn that Teddy Junior, the heir apparent of the colonel, who is engaged here in the respectable business of carpet selling, shows signs of waxing conservative. When the younger Roosevelt arrived here with his charming bride he was taken at once to the bosom of the graft prosecution. Mr. Rudolph Spreckels and Mr. Fremont Older thoroughly approved of the people whom he met socially. His salvation was assured when he took a house in Pacific avenue right next door to the Rudolph Spreckels' home. It was natural that young Roosevelt's stock of brand new ideas should assume the color of the mind from which they were borrowed. He showed an enthusiastic admiration for the men with whom he associated, as well as for their local achievements. But now that enthusiasm seems to be waning. Young Roosevelt has discovered that there may be two sides to the graft prosecution, as to every other story. He has been studying the other side. He has been cultivating the men who could assist him in these studies. In consequence his intimates have noticed a decided change in his tone. His erstwhile progressive sympathies have been sicklied o'er by the pale cast of conservatism. He is learning to take many of the things he regarded as gospel with a grain of salt.

A Little Speculation

Which inevitably suggests an interrogation to the mind inclined to speculate. Did Teddy Junior put a flea in the ear of Teddy Senior and thereby cool the latter's ardor toward Fremont Older? Was the conservatism of the colonel's speech at the Harvard Club dinner prompted by the same filial counsels? It would be interesting to know. If our ex-President was robbed of his enthusiasm for Older and the extremes of progressiveness as those extremes are Bulletined in San Francisco by the data quietly gathered by Teddy Junior, then indeed has Older cause for bitterness of spirit. It may be, however, that the colonel absorbed his prejudice before he arrived in this city. It has been rumored more than once that that sterling progressive, the Hon. Bill Kent, cherishes no kindlier feeling toward Older than Older toward Kent. When Governor Johnson was banqueted by the patriots after his election, Kent raised a mighty roar when somebody suggested that Older should be among the speakers. That was the outward sign of a mutual antipathy which had developed during the campaign. It would not be surprising if Kent told Roosevelt what he thought about Older, for these reformers are wondrous frank in talking behind one another's backs. So it may have been Kent who caused the colonel to neglect Older.

Two Dramas

Henri Stuart, the aged and penniless minstrel, now figuring in the Fox divorce suit has played more prominent parts in real life than ever he was permitted to play in his professional capacity. The dailies have told the story of the revenge wreaked on Anna Kellar Fox, the "champion woman banjoist," by this old-time minstrel; how he transported himself with vengeance because of a fancied wrong, telling a lie to blacken a woman's character, and then repenting and recanting on the advice of a priest to whom he had made confession. Here we have the minstrel playing the part of the heavy villain in a Sardou drama. Years ago before we made the acquaintance of Ibsen we had Henri Stuart as the central figure in a drama that might have been written by the great Norwegian. This drama was played before Judge Coffey. In substance it was a will contest. An estate valued at about one hundred thousand dollars left by a Scotchman by the name of MacDonald, a drill master, was the subject of the contest. The principal claimant was a boy whose mother swore that he was MacDonald's son. This woman was Claude Lee, once upon a time a song-and-dance performer, famous for her beauty in the days when the Pioneers were gay young blades and the old town was wide open and not only glad of it but proud of it. The difficulty of establishing the claim of Claude's son was due to the circumstance that when he was born his mother was married but not to MacDonald. Her husband was Henri Stuart. Now Henri was not less eager than Claude for the boy to inherit the estate, and he was a witness for the claimant. The complications which had to be straightened out are apparent enough. As the presumption is that a child born in wedlock is the offspring of the mother's husband, if she has one, it was necessary to convince the court that in this particular case the presumption was not to be justly indulged. Almost any lawyer would consider such a job a tough one; but the lawyer for the claimant in this case was Colonel Henry Kowalsky, a gentleman to whom proof of anything is possible in a court of justice. If an ourang-outang should die intestate tomorrow with a clear title to a cocoanut grove and no heirs-at-law in sight the Colonel would like nothing better than the job of establishing the claim of an illegitimate son newly arrived from the heart of Africa. Kowalsky proved to the satisfaction of Judge Coffey that Henri Stuart was a husband only in name; that even with the best intention and the greatest enthusiasm for the Roosevelt propaganda his most conscientious endeavor would be in vain. And Claude's boy got the bank-roll—all that the Colonel didn't want.

The Patter of the Prophets

The itinerant prophets of reform who come to us from foreign parts appear to be laboring under the delusion that we are both purblind and ungrateful. In some mysterious way they get the impression that we are unable to perceive the merits of our best citizens and that we are insensible of our profoundest obligations. So at every opportunity they tell us of all that has been done for us and by whom it has been done. The echoes of T. R's patter had hardly died away when along came Joe Folk of Missouri, and speaking under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. he said: "You have done a great work here in battling against graft. Mr. Phelan was a mighty soldier in the cause. Rudolph Spreckels gave encouragement to lovers of good government everywhere. Fremont Older rendered invaluable service in the cause of civic righteousness, and Francis J. Heney is entitled to the thanks of all good citizens." Just as if we didn't know! Joe Folk talks as if he knew more about us than we know about ourselves. If Joe were in Alaska he wouldn't hesitate to indict a whole community in South Africa on a vagrant wireless telegram. Because we haven't erected the statues of our most beloved heroes in public places Joe fancies that we don't appreciate them. Come to think of it St. Louis hasn't been showing much enthusiasm for her erstwhile foremost citizen. Can it be that prosecutors don't wear well?

The Embarrassment of Jimmy

Joe Folk's patter at the Y. M. C. A. caused great embarrassment to our most distinguished, pure and popular citizen. Having thus described him it is hardly necessary to add that I allude to the Hon. James Duval Phelan. Mr. Phelan was performing one of his most agreeable functions, that of chairman of the occasion, and we are told by his longest leased journal the Boughten Bulletin that the applause which "greeted his appearance" before the assembled members of the Y. M. C. A. "lasted for over a minute." He introduced Mr. Folk "as one of the most fearless and public spirited of the men who have opposed graft." And immediately up spoke Mr. Folk, telling the people how great a man was Phelan. The modest Phelan's whiskers were at once threatened with combustion, his face being aglow with the blushes of conscious merit.

A Police Reporter's Mot

In the room sacred to the police reporters at the Hall of Justice the newsgatherers were discussing the action of Judge Treadwell in sending Jack Johnson, the conqueror of Jeffries, to the county jail for speeding. All the police reporters with one exception had expressed their approval of the jail sentence. The silent man was Frank Sheridan, the veteran police reporter of the Bulletin. "What do you think about it, Frank?" queried one of the scribes. "It makes me very sad," answered Sheridan, "to be compelled to admit that the hope of the white race is an Indian!"

A Judge on the War Path

"However," continued Sheridan, "it must be admitted that Judge Treadwell is a worthy opponent for the hero of the Battle of Reno. The judge cannot be daunted. Nothing terrifies him. Just before he sentenced Jack Johnson a well meaning friend went to him to register a warning. 'Better be careful, Judge,' cautioned this amicus curiae, 'for if you make a misstep and give the black man a legal opening he is very likely to sue you.' 'Sioux! Sioux! Sioux be darned!' shouted the jurist. 'I can lick a thousand Sioux! I'm an Apache!'"

His Ancehtral Drop

There is great demand for Upton Sinclair's novel "Loves Pilgrimage," not because it is believed to possess great literary value but because of the report that the author displays great enthusiasm for obstetrics. I am told that Sinclair did not describe the most sacred of all human functions for the vulgar purpose of being sensational, but for the reason that for him childbirth has had a morbid fascination ever since he indulged his brutual curiosity on the occasion of the birth of his son. Sinclair is a morbid individual. This is due in a great measure to the fact that he is a man of a rather weak constitution, and that he worries a great deal about his health. In this connection an amusing story is told about an incident that occured on his last visit to this city. He was out riding with some friends in an automobile one day, and there appeared on the tip of his nose a globule, which, by the way, is one of the signs by which usually he may be distinguished in a crowd. On this occasion he had a very charming woman for his vis-a-vis. She was made nervous as all Sinclair's friends are whenever what it pleases them to call his "ancestral drop" makes its appearance. It had for her all the fascination of something mysteriously portentous. She tried to think of something else, but its spell was irresistible. She tried to get interested in the fleeting landscape, but the "ancestral drop" would not be denied. The lady was in thrall. It was as though some gorgon horror had her transfixed. Presently the plot thickened, that is, the drop was joined by a mate, and then yielding to an implse imperative the lady drew forth her embroidered handkerchief and gracefully applied it to the author's nose. The spectators roared. Sinclair collapsed.

The News and the Fact

One of our labor leaders recently returned from Los Angeles reported at a meeting of the Labor Council the other night that the unions were making great headway in the metropolis of the citrus belt and that it was in a fair way to be thoroughly unionized in the near future. The glad news was kindly disseminated by the local dailies which thus accomplished the purpose of its author who probably feels that it is advisable to create the impression that San Francisco is not singular in its devotion to organized labor. As a matter of fact the unions are not making any headway in Los Angeles. At a largely attended meeting of the Master Builders' Association of that city held on the evening of the 2nd inst., it was resolved to maintain forever the open-shop principle. This association, I learn from the Times, includes nearly every contractor in Los Angeles, and in preparation for threatened trouble on May 1 the ranks have been strengthened and every employer has agreed to stand fast.

The Muckraker at Monterey

Comes now the high-brow muckraker in the distinguished person of Professor Willis Lynn Jepson of the University of California and announces that the Monterey cypresses, acclaimed for years in Sunday supplements and far-flung advertising booklets as contemporaneous with the cedars of Lebanon and the Temple of Solomon, are mere sylvan youngsters operating under false pretenses. In the volume "Sylva of California" Professor Jepson administers the chloroform to this popular belief in the following language: "The age of the Monterey Cypress in the native groves is not readily determinable since the trees, on account of their rarity and interest, are not cut either for fuel or for lumber. One fallen tree, sawn through to remove it from a roadway, was ninety-eight years old and had a trunk two feet in diameter. Since the tree grows rapidly it would seem fair to hazard that two hundred to three hundred years represents the extreme age of the older trees. The advertisement of them in sea side literature as one thousand to two thousand years old does not, as far as the writer is able to determine, rest upon any actual data and probably represents a desire to minister to a popular craving for bigness and extremes." The pictorial representation of the various stages of civilization while the Big Trees were attaining their growth Professor Jepson likewise discredits with ruthless facts and figures. The age of the standing trees is calculated on the strength of statistics gathered from the stumps and the growth indicated by trees that have been felled for timber. The stump of one tree twelve and a half feet in diameter showed fourteen hundred and eighty-five rings, an average of twenty to the inch, but the stump of the Father of the Forest, twenty-seven feet in diameter, which would have been six thousand eight hundred and forty years old if the proportion of growth were the same, showed actually only thirteen hundred rings. Another, eleven feet seven and one-half inches in diameter, was determined to be two thousand and seventeen years old, while one of twenty-four feet, which should have been about twice that age, proved to be only one thousand three hundred and forty-six years old. The professor does not believe the average age of the adult tree to exceed fifteen hundred years, though there are a few which may be twenty or twenty-three hundred, and John Muir has discovered one exceedingly large specimen which he believes to be four thousand.

The Crew Went Out

John D. Spreckels has to assemble a new crew for his fine steam yacht which is swinging at anchor in these waters after a tour of the world. The crew which worked the yacht around the Horn quit when the Golden Gate had been passed. There were thirty-five of them and they complained that they had not been fed properly. I believe that sixty cents a day was allowed for the food of each man and whether that is sufficient to furnish a sailor with three meals I am not sufficiently posted to say. The sailors, however, did not think so and they emphasized their position by quitting. It was a great surprise to Mr. Spreckels. He had had them newly outfitted at a local dealer's, but they never donned their natty garments. They were so displeased with the character of their grub that just before they walked out they tore up the new clothes and trampled on them.

The Apartment House Craze

Of the building of apartment houses there is no end. Of which I am reminded by the report that E. J. Burns has obtained a lease from the Board of Education of the lot at Bush and Taylor that was occupied by the historic Denman School for forty years and that he is to build thereon an apartment house at a cost of a quarter of a million dollars. What is the fascination that the apartment house holds? Whatever it is the spread of it is a phenomenon that excites curiosity. It seems as though the gregarious instinct were becoming more pronounced and imperative. The disposition to huddle together under one roof and in narrow quarters is becoming infectious. What's the explanation? Assuredly not the high cost of living, for quarters in apartment houses are not cheap. Perhaps the service which reduces the volume of housework has something to do with the growing popularity of apartment houses. The servant problem is becoming more vexatious every day. It is responsible for the disruption of home life. The servant girl is becoming a rara avis, and now that Japanese and Chinese are becoming scarcer wages are going up at such a rate that it is infinitely cheaper and less bothersome to live in a hotel and eat in a restaurant than to keep house. As a result of our profound concern for the welfare of wage earners our consequent prejudice against Orientals, our passion for ease and luxury, we are rapidly undergoing vital changes in our mode of living that must inevitable affect not only our manners but our morals.

The Nurse of the Muses

I have received from the Pacific Coast Women's Press Association, of which Ina Coolbrith is president, a circular informing me that "the literature-loving public will be pleased to learn" that W. C. Morrow is to deliver under its auspices a series of lectures on authorship. I hope that this is so. I hope the literature-loving public is able to distinguish the man who is competent to instruct from the man who is not. Lecturers on literature are not rare hereabouts. There are several who have a prodigious reputation for what they might have done; whose pretensions are impressive and not to be challenged because their deficiencies are not to be discovered in specimens of genius. And there are others who point with pride to books they have written which nobody has the courage to read. Mr. Morrow is a master of the literary art, acknowledged to be such by competent critics the world over. And Mr. Morrow has the rare faculty of awakening the latent powers of the inexperienced. The power of creation is not so uncommon as is generally believed. There are "mute inglorious Miltons," poets who have never been conscious of their kinship with the Muses because they have never attempted to articulate. All that they stood in need of were a few hints as to the principles of the literary art and the encouragement that the bird must receive before it ventures to wing its flight from the nest. Mr. Morrow has evoked the latent powers of authorship in many persons. Many writers now following literature as a profession are indebted to Mr. Morrow for the discovery and the ripening of their faculties. As Miss Coolbrith says in her circular "he has long since come to be recognized as the commanding guide and inspiring force of the remarkable literary movement of the Pacific Coast." In his lectures which are to be given in Sequoia Hall he will give practical instruction to writers and he will discuss the underlying principles of fiction and the drama. Each lecture of the six will be given twice weekly in the evening.

Frank Drew, Booster

A little thought to the welfare of California and of San Francisco sometimes accomplishes more than spectacular deeds. Witness the happy thought which came to Frank Drew, the attorney, when he saw in a shop window a photograph of Tetrazzini singing to the city at Lotta's Fountain. He purchased the photograph and sent it with a letter to a friend of his who has an important position with the Bureau of American Republics in Washington. The result of this little action is interesting. The photograph has been reproduced in full page size in the latest issue of the Bulletin of the Bureau and in this form will be circulated far and wide in Spanish America. It will advertise San Francisco in a fashion that will appeal strongly to the Latins of our hemisphere and will do us a world of good.

A Diamond of Mythical Ill Luck

Once more the story of the Hope diamond has been dished up for the consumption of the credulous. Last Sunday's Chronicle recounted the catalogue of disasters which are supposed to have punished the individuals who dared to possess it. These mythical tales have been in circulation so long that no doubt most people accept them as true. As a matter of fact the Hope diamond has not a sinister history. The fact that it passed from the possesion of Madame de Montespan, the mistress of Louis XIV, to the jewel cases of Marie Antoinette and the Princess de Lamballe, both of whom perished during the Terror, is the groundwork of truth upon which the other legends of ill luck have been fabricated. From 1792 to 1830 the diamond was unheard of. Then it came into the hands of Daniel Eliason, a London jeweler, who sold it to Henry Thomas Hope, a London banker for $65,000. From this banker it received the name of the Hope diamond. Hope gave it to his daughter when she married the sixth Duke of Newcastle in 1861. It was held by the heirs of Hope and was in the hands of the present Duke of Newcastle from 1884 till 1901. Then it was sold at auction, brought to this country by Joseph Frankel's Sons and then went back to London. It was next sold to one Habib in Paris and though it was rumored that he bought it for the Sultan of Turkey, it was again put on the market when the Habib collection was sold at auction about two years ago. Since then it has passed into the possession of the Edward McLeans of Washington. There is no record of any misfortune befalling Eliason, the Frankels, Hope or Habib while it was in their hands. As a matter of fact the stories of ill luck first appeared in connection with Lord Francis Hope and his wife May Yohe, but as Lord Francis Hope never owned the stone and May Yohe very probably never even saw it, these yarns are not important, except as romance.

A Chance for the Supp. Writer

Here is a chance for the industrious scribe who contributes to the Sunday supplements of the local dailies. There is living in San Francisco a member of the crew of the wooden cruiser Kearsarge who took part in the destruction of the Confederate privateer Alabama on June 19, 1864, off the port of Cherbourg, France. The crew of the Kearsage numbered one hundred and sixty-three men and of these just twenty-two are known to be living, most of them in the New England states. So far as known none of the officers survive. The member of the crew who lives here is James Kerrigan. Why doesn't some Sunday supp. writer look up James Kerrigan and get his story of the famous fight?

The Judge From Sonoma

Judge Emmett Seawell, the man presiding at the Wilson murder trial, is a representative of the rural judiciary who is very likely to figure in the running when justices of the Supreme Court are again to be elected. Judge Seawell is from Sonoma county. He is the man by whom Dr. Burke was tried for murder in Santa Rosa a few months ago. He is an able jurist, held in high esteem by the legal profession, and beloved by the people of Sonoma for his qualities of mind and heart.

Who Swore?

Pat Healy, the old-time book seller, had Stanley Curtis auction a fine collection of Californiana last week and among the items was a copy of the novel "I Swear," written by Frank Powers, the well known lawyer. Powers sent Florence McAuliffe, a young lawyer who is associated with him, to bid the novel in. But McAuliffe found that the item would not be reached till very late in the session so he asked Dick O'Connor, another young lawyer who is a good deal of a collector, to bid it in for him and departed. When "I Swear" was put up Dick O'Connor bid ten cents for it whereupon Curtis raised him to twenty-five. O'Connor bid fifty and Curtis raised him again. The competition continued briskly till Curtis bid two dollars and sixty-five cents whereupon O'Connor withdrew, thinking that Powers would not care to pay more for the book. Curtis promptly knocked the item down to himself with the explanation: "I have bid this in for the author at his personal request."

He Will Have to Hurry

W. P. Hammon is in New York chafing at the slowness of capitalists in closing a ten million dollar oil deal. Not that W. P. Hammon promotes so many ten million dollar deals that they have become part of the daily routine and thereby lost their novelty and importance. Large as are his dealings, he has not yet reached that point. But W. P. Hammon is chafing just the same. The fact is, he is extremely anxious to get home. Deep as is his interest in the transfer to London and Boston capitalists of ten million dollars worth of oil properties in California, Hammon is more deeply interested in a transfer shortly to take place in this city. The transfer which distracts his attention from his present business in the East is not of a financial description. It is the transfer of his charming daughter Georgia to Mr. Scott Hendricks, the talented young lawyer. This transaction involving the heart and hand of a very estimable young lady is to take place at Trinity Church on April 25 and W. P. Hammon is not unnaturally eager to be on hand for the affair. That is why he chafes at the necessary delays in the consummation of a ten million dollar oil deal. Just as soon as the last signature is affixed to the last document Hammon will hurl himself into a train and start for home and all thoughts of ten million dollar deals will be banished in favor of thoughts about his daughter who is so soon to change her name. Speaking of changes in names, why do the papers persist in calling W. P. Hammon "William"? His name is not William, though it must be admitted that some of his acquaintances refer to him familiarly as "Bill." The whole thing is a misconception. W. P. Hammon's name is Wendell P. Hammon and he should be so called. This is offered in a spirit of gentle correction to the bavardes who of course cannot always be right.

About the Martins

Mrs. Peter Martin is going to New York in the near future. Her departure has been announced weekly for several months, but this time I am told she is actually to turn her shapely back on San Francisco for six months, some of them to be passed at Newport. Young Charles Oelrichs Martin will accompany his parents. Mrs. Martin will take with her a salmon pink kimono covered with gold butterflies which she has just purchased. The Walter Martins, I hear, are to rent their place at Burlingame this summer and hie them to a quiet retreat in Napa county.

The Keeney-Walker Romance

Talbot Walker is receiving congratulations on all sides, for he has captured the heart of one of the most fascinating and beautiful girls that has queened it over belledom in many a season. Miss Mary Keeney possesses charms of the striking sort that compel attention wherever she appears. Many a time I have seen a perfect battery of lorgnettes and opera glasses trained on her when she occupied a box at the theater. To be the cynosure of neighboring eyes is sometimes a trying situation, but Miss Keeney's poise is perfect and she has always emerged triumphant from the ordeal. Many admirers have worshiped at the shrine of her beauty and vivacity and there must be many a masculine heart wearing crepe, so to speak, in mourning for the death of fond romantic hopes. But that is always the case when a favorite belle publishes her preference.

Society Approves

The engagement is pronounced eminently suitable by society. Both young people are in the same set and the two families have been identified with San Francisco for many years. Judge O. C. Pratt, the step-grandfather of Miss Keeney, was a noted jurist. His widow and second wife died a few weeks ago and the Keeney family is in mourning. Miss Keeney is the daughter of Dr. and Mrs. James W. Keeney. Talbot Walker is a grand-son of the millionaire lumber-man who with William Pope founded the firm of Pope and Talbot. The Talbot mansion in Jackson street is still one of the handsomest houses in the neighborhood. Mrs. Earle Brownell who was a Miss Pierce is the young man's cousin. Her mother and Mrs. Walker were both daughters of old Talbot. I hear that Mrs. Templeton Crocker may act as matron of honor at the wedding of these young people. Miss Keeney was bridesmaid when the Crocker-Irwin nuptials were celebrated.

A Viennese Romance

There is a very pretty romance summarized in the announcement by Mr. and Mrs. George T. Wright of Alameda that their only son George Cedric Wright is to marry in Vienna, before the end of this month, Miss Louise Mildred Sahlstrom, the daughter of the Rev. and Mrs. A. L. Sahlstrom of Lyle, Washington. Cedric Wright has always been regarded as a musical prodigy and three years ago, when he had not yet reached his eighteenth year, he went to Vienna to study with Professor Sevcek, the teacher of Kubelik. At Professor Sevcek's studio he met Miss Sahlstrom who was also a pupil, having taken up her residence in the Austrian capital with her mother for the cultivation of an unusual musical gift. When Wright became acquainted with the young woman he divided his thoughts between music and her, the result being the engagement now announced. When the Wrights heard the news of their son's romantic attachment they were very much surprised. They thought at first that he was too young to marry, but speedily concluded that they would not interfere with his happiness. So he was told that he might look to his parents for whatever assistance was needed in finishing the musical education of himself and his young wife. The marriage would have taken place before this, were it not for the strict laws of Austria. Both the young people are under age and despite the consent given by the parents on both sides, the marriage could not take place without the forwarding of a lot of documents, including copies of the baptismal records. As young Wright's baptismal papers were destroyed in the fire, this halted the ceremony. But both will attain their majorities before the end of the month and then the marriage will take place. Young Wright belongs to one of our oldest and most prominent families. His mother was Miss Sophie Lansberger while his father is the son of the late Judge Selden S. Wright. Miss Sahlstrom's father was formerly professor of Greek at the University of Minnesota but is now pre-

Can Such Things Be?

A shocking piece of gossip is going the rounds concerning two of the most exclusive belles in society who are accused of smoking pipes. One of them owns a briar wood which she smokes in the privacy of her own boudoir and she says she has now lost all taste for cigarettes. The other girl secured one of her brother's pipes and has joined her friend in post-prandial smokes. They have tried to initiate others but most of the fair smokers of society cling to their mild cigarettes.

Miss Bull's Good Luck

Margery Bull who is one of the lucky California girls who will be presented at the English court this year is the daughter of Captain and Mrs. William Bull who were stationed on Goat Island a few years ago. Mrs. Bull is a handsome woman who made friends readily and her receptions at the navy station were largely attended. Mrs. Kate Voorhies Henry was her most intimate friend in San Francisco. When Captain Bull retired they went to Santa Barbara to live but there was not enough excitement there for the vivacious navy matron. The family packed up and went to Europe a few years ago and Margery was placed in one of the schools at Vevey where the Hobart children are being educated. She is a very pretty girl of nineteen and her presentation at court will be her first appearance in society. The Bulls are touring the world and arrived in Vancouver the other day on their way to England. They had intended opening their Santa Barbara home for the summer out the invitation to court changed their plans and they will not visit California.

An Embarrassing Encounter

A well known man and his wife stayed in town to attend the theater a few nights ago and afterwards motored down the peninsula to their home. On the way they stopped at a popular roadhouse for refreshments. When they entered the tavern they immediately espied a prominent young man with an equally prominent young woman, enjoying the hospitality of the place. The matron called the young man aside and said to him: "I think you had better take Miss Soandso home to her mother. Where do you suppose her mother thinks she is?" To which the young man very frankly replied: "Her mother thinks she is spending the night with you."

Miss Simpson's Engagement

The announcement of Amalia Simpson's engagement to Billy Hough was a surprise to some people who thought Joe King was the happy man. He has been so frequently seen at the theaters and at dances with this attractive maid that their names were coupled more than once by rumor. Now comes the explanation. Joe King is Billy Hough's most intimate friend and when young Hough's business interests took him out of town he would commission Joe to act as escort for his fiancee. The engagement was known however to their intimates who always included Joe King in their parties when Billy Hough was not available. It was intended to announce the betrothal at a tea next week and I am told Miss Simpson spent a morning in tears over the premature publication of her secret. She is a very talented girl and will be one of a singing trio in the Polyclinic Vaudeville. In the Kirmess her dancing was admired and she has appeared in various amateur entertainments. The Simpsons sold their home in Green street a few years ago and are living at the Regilius in Pacific avenue. The young lady's father was Consul for Denmark at this port for many years. Her sister is Mrs. Sydney Patridge, wife of the Episcopal Bishop of Japan. She was Agnes Simpson. Another married sister lives in Europe.

Premature Announcement

These premature announcements are very trying for the young people concerned. I am told there was no foundation for the one coupling the names of Natalie Hunt and Harry Rolfe. Miss Hunt's friend Miss Dorothy Chapman has just become engaged to B. S. Foss, son of the Governor of Massachusetts, and the day following the announcement it was stated Miss Hunt and young Rolfe were engaged. The statement greatly embarrassed the young lady who avers there is no truth in it and has returned engagement cups sent to her in proof of her denial. If it is not Natalie Hunt the gossips declare it must be Floride and they are looking for a formal acknowledgment in the near future. The Misses Hunt are daughters of Mrs. Randell Hunt and are well liked in society. They live in Pacific avenue.

There Is Nothing Like Being Frank

For interesting exhibitions of frankness in repartee commend me to the women's clubs where bridge is played for high stakes. Not that you will not find the same quality in the men's clubs where poker is played for much higher stakes, but masculine frankness never possesses that piquant flavor which attaches to the feminine variety. There was recently a little interchange at a bridge party which has been much talked about. One of the players is a woman of considerable wealth who has climbed very successfully in our social fastnesses. She is a very poor player and invariably tries the tempers of her associates in the game. After she had twice failed to play the right card one of the other women at the table essayed a suggestion, whereupon our climber replied with asperity: "My husband has never presumed to dictate to me and I'll not allow anybody else to do so." The retort silenced the other. Shortly afterwards our climber progressed to another table where she made another misplay. Again a player offered to advise her, but she interrupted with the remark which had been so successful a few minutes before. "My husband—," she began, but not no further. "I don't care one cent about your husband," snapped the other, "but I'll tell you one thing. Everybody hates to play at the same table with you because you are forever making mistakes." All very sweet and womanly, n'est ce pas?

A Beautiful Picture of the Currans

I joy to find a scribe who becomes intoxicated with the exuberance of his own verbosity; and when such a scribe happens to be describing something of a social nature, my joy is well nigh too deep for words. Such a one is the pensmith who wrote for the Pasadena Star a recent article about the plans of the newly wedded Ross Ambler Curran and Mrs. Postley. This scribe wanted to say that the new Mrs. Curran would motor with her husband from Pasadena to the north. So he evolved this: "The fairy feet, from the dancing slipper of which a Russian grand duke drank the wine of France, will on this occasion of joy press the clutch in the fast flying automobile when Ross Ambler Curran goes the pace a little too quickly." Mr. and Mrs. Curran spent their bridal night together, not an unusual arrangement, though the scribe dilates upon it thus: "Mr. and Mrs. Ross Ambler Curran returned to Pasadena last night. This time they did not have to seek separate hotels. The New Yorker was not obliged to go off to the Maryland after taking a Romeo farewell of his love; nay, far was it from being so, for the radiant couple were shown the bridal chamber." I submit that "nay, far was it from being so" is a gem of bavardistic ray serene. Hurrying on past the bridal chamber with the discreet scribe I read: "They had passed the time since Justice H. H. Klamroth made them man and wife in Cupid's very own preserve." What is Cupid's very own preserve? The scribe loses no time in telling us: "Namely, amid the orange blossoms of the orchards of Riverside and Redlands." It is interesting to follow them further: "They returned, redolent with the fragrance of those blossoms, and went to the Hotel Alexandria in Los Angeles. There they had a delightful meal, all in the privacy of their suite." Then they motored to Pasadena and the bridal chamber:

"The Currans made a remarkable picture as they entered the hotel. Behind came Mr. Curran's valet, while in the rear were two bellmen with four gripsacks." A valet and four gripsacks! I can only exclaim with Iago, "Oh, most impotent conclusion!" for indeed the scribe tells us no more.

Mr. Hotaling in Oakland

By Edward F. O'Day

After a visit to Ye Liberty Playhouse for the purpose of seeing Mr. Richard Hotaling in "The House Next Door," I can offer no good reason why the "unfortified city of Oakland" should erect ramparts. Despite the clever jibe of Henry Miller, Oakland is in no need of defending itself against the dramaturgic assaults of Mr. Hotaling. Mr. Hotaling is in no wise dangerous to Oakland's peace of mind. Far from it. Judging from the crowd which attended the performance of "The House Next Door" on a night of the poorest theatrical week during the year, Mr. Hotaling is a popular favorite who has been presented with the freedom of the city of Oakland. The audience was with him and his smiles during curtain calls indicated how much he enjoyed his audience. Out in the foyer a large floral offering with the words "Our Guest Star" empurpled upon it testified to the attitude which Oakland assumes toward Mr. Hotaling. Decidedly, as far as the public of Oakland is concerned, Mr. Hotaling has had the sweetest sort of revenge on Henry Miller. In adverting to the acting attainments of Mr. Hotaling, Miller made use of the weapon which most actors think should be forbidden the critic; he ridiculed him. But it seems to me that even so exacting a critic as Henry Miller would find little to ridicule in Mr. Hotaling's presentation of the character of Sir John Cotswold in "The House Next Door." It is the part of an exceedingly irascible old man who has ruined his family by extravagance and is now breaking the hearts of his wife and daughter by his senile temper. In the parlance of the regions behind the scenes it is an "actor-proof" part; that is to say, a part so constructed that an actor of respectable attainments could not fail in it, the reason being that all other parts in the play are rigorously subordinated to it, that it is full of good speeches and teeming with the sort of "business" that always pleases an audience. It would be far from just, however, to say that Mr. Hotaling succeeds in this part merely because it is "actor-proof." His is an exceptional characterization, carefully thought out and vigorously executed. In his facial expressions alone Mr. Hotaling vindicates his claim to serious consideration. His make-up would do credit to a veteran actor and the play of emotions over his mobile features created an illusion of age which was irresistible. He has a good carrying voice that only once or twice forgot the husk of age and the squeak of querulousness which go with the part. In his carriage he was pretty consistently old, walking with stiff rheumatic legs, putting a touch of palsy in his hands, rounding his shoulders and thrusting forward his head; in a word, submerging his personality in that of the old man. Taken altogether, the rendition of the part was of such merit that a stranger would readily believe the actor a professional of good training and long experience. Perhaps in the interpretation there were a few flaws—or it may be that they should be charged to the author, J. Hartley Manners. The old baronet does not impress as one to the manor born. He assumes at times the airs that one would expect in an upstart; he is too cocky, too much worried about his dignity, too conscious of the advantages of good birth, for a gentleman. All this makes for laughter, but it detracts from the delicacy of comedy and approximates farce. Whether the author or the actor is to be held accountable for this, it is hard to say offhand. Perhaps Mr. Hotaling has the weakness common to amateurs, however clever, the weakness which cannot resist temptation when the chance of a laugh presents itself. Another tendency which Mr. Hotaling should guard against is manifested in his pronunciation. "You fling me poverty in me face" is an offense against pure diction. "Me" for "my" is no more permissible than the vulgar "muh." In his almost constant use of this mispronunciation Mr. Hotaling suggests the influence of the old rip-roaring Shakespearian ranters. However, these are minor imperfections. Mr. Hotaling must be judged by and large and so judged he measures up to many good actors who do not act for the pure love of acting, as he does. I think that Henry Miller would have to admit as much if he could forget that rankling incident of three years ago.

AN EXPRESSION OF "FAIR" ENTHUSIASM

When a man is happy, he wants to give away something. Every man in San Francisco is happy because we got the Fair. Let every man make every woman happy with a present of a box of Geo. Haas & Sons' supremely good candies. Four stores.

Dockstader Minstrelsy

The minstrel show of other days is being absorbed into musical comedy. There is proof of this in the Savoy program which describes Lew Dockstader's offering as "a minstrel musical comedy with a plot." But while minstrelsy seems to be losing its identity, many of its salient features remain and will remain as long as any of the old-time blackface stars continue to present an entertainment in which women play no part. That is one of the charms of minstrelsy; it is exclusively masculine. And until somebody presents "a minstrel musical comedy" with a chorus of women, minstrelsy to all intents and purposes will be its old self. It is quite safe to say that there will be minstrel shows as long as Lew Dockstader continues in the business. He is a minstrel show all by himself and he seems to get as much delight out of the entertainment as the audience does. Why shouldn't he? Minstrel shows have always been distinguished from other varieties of theatrical entertainment by the spirit of comradeship that unites the performers to one another and to the audience. Perhaps the use of the real names of the singers and end-men has something to do with this. The interlocutor is on easy terms with everybody and everybody is on easy terms with the interlocutor. It is the same sort of bond which united the revelers with the chairman of the "Cave of Harmony" to which Colonel Newcome took Clive. No old-timer ever feels toward Lew Dockstader or Carroll Johnson or any of the other old-time minstrels the way one feels toward the popular actor. There was a warmth of real affection in the greeting which these men received on Sunday night. Perhaps to the exacting taste of the minute the entertainment lacked spice. It moved a little slowly. But the minstrel show is a leisurely form of entertainment. The old-time olio went at a slap-stick pace, but the olio has been made over in the modern "minstrel musical comedy with a plot" and its exuberance has been spread over a broader surface. Its best moments were larded with the fat humor of Lew Dockstader's foolishness. With the singing which was all good, that foolishness of Lew's made up a crackerjack show.

—The First Nighter.

Olga Nethersole at the Savoy

Lew Dockstader and his minstrels will hold forth for the last times at the Savoy this Saturday and Sunday nights and commencing Monday evening Olga Nethersole will begin a brief engagement in a new play from the pen of Henri Bernstein entitled "The Redemption of Evelyn Vaudray." She will present it for six nights only. "The Redemption of Evelyn Vaudray" has been staged by Ben Greet, the well-known Shakespearian producer, under the supervisions of Louis N. Parker, the adapter, and the cast will be a strong one. During the second and last week of her engagement Miss Nethersole will make her first appearance in "Sister Beatrice." This miracle play by Maurice Maeterlink was a great success when it was first presented in this country at the New Theater.

The Follies at the Columbia

That great musical comedy entertainment, Ziegfeld's Revue, The Follies of 1910, begins a two weeks' engagement at the Columbia Easter Sunday night, with matinees on Wednesdays and Saturdays. Ziegfeld is bringing his original players, chorus and production. The work which is by Harry B. Smith, Gus Edwards, Maurice Levi, Julian Mitchell and numerous others, is in three acts and sixteen scenes. The cast includes Bickel and Watson, Bert Williams, Bobby North, Billy Reeves, W. Wania, the imperial Russian dancer, William C. Schrode, Quigg and Nickerson, Peter Swift, Charles Hessong, Miss Lillian Lorraine, Fanny Brice, Shirley Kellogg, Evelyn Carleton, Florence Gardner, Arline Boley, Margaret Morris, Vera Maxwell, Fawn Conway, Lottie Vernon, Daisy Virginia and seventy-five Anna Held girls.

New Faces at the Alcazar

Izetta Jewell and Thurston Hall will assume leadership of the Alcazar players next Monday evening, appearing in "Wildfire," a racing comedy written by Broadhurst and Hobart for Lillian Russell. Viola Leach, Bessie Barriscale, Burt Wesner, Howard Hickman, Charles E. Gunn, Will Walling, Louis Bennison, Roy Neill, Walter Belasco and Clarence Elmer will be seen in well-fitting roles.

Alexander Heinemann, German Court Singer

Alexander Heinemann, the royal German court lieder singer, will be Manager Greenbaum's next attraction, giving a series of three concerts at Scottish Rite Auditorium. Heinemann is not only a beautiful singer and most interesting interpreter but he is also one of the most famous singing-masters of Europe and no vocal student can afford to miss hearing him. The first concert will be given Sunday afternoon, April 23, with groups of "lieder" by Schumann, Schubert, Loewe and Hans Hermann. The second will be given Wednesday night, April 26, with works of Beethoven, Brahms, Loewe, Schubert, Hermann and Hugo Kaun. The last program will be given Thursday night, April 27, with a list of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Franz Loewe, Schumann and Mendelssohn songs.

Mischa Elman's Farewell

Mischa Elman's special farewell concert will be given this Sunday afternoon at half past two. The young violinist will render a most comprehensive program. It will open with the "Sonata" for piano and violin in B flat by Mozart. This will be followed by the rarely played "Concerto" in D minor by Bruch. Saint-Saens, Dussek, Bach, Gretry, Gossec, Tschaikowsky and Wieniawsky will also be represented.

Next Week's Fare at the Orpheum

An original feature of next week's Orpheum bill will be a one-act play "The Suspect" which has a record of over three thousand performances in England. W. A. Brady, the theatrical manager who presents the drama has given it an adequate cast. Spirit Paintings will be produced by P. T. Selbit on behalf of Dr. Wilmar, the discoverer of the process. Taylor, Kranzman and White are three clever soloists and comedians who will appear in a skit called "Musical Foolishness." Bedini and Arthur style themselves "The Jovial Jugglers." The Five Satsudas are the latest quintette imported from Japan. A feature of their act will be K. Mankicki, the Japanese comedian. For their farewell week Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew will present for the first time in this city a dramatic episode entitled "The Still Voice" by George Cameron which is the pen name of Mrs. Drew.

Hotaling in Farce

The third week of Richard Hotaling's engagement at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will be devoted to "Mr. Hopkinson," the farce-comedy in which Dallas Welford was seen at the Valencia Theater the season before last. It will mark Hotaling's second appearance on the professional stage in a modern comedy. Henry Hall, the new leading man of the company, Elizabeth Stewart and all the regular Ye Liberty favorites will assist. "Hamlet" and "The Merchant of Venice" are to be given for the last two weeks of Hotaling's stay with the company.

The Russian Orchestra Festival

The programs for the entire week's festival of music by the Russian Symphony Orchestra under Modest Altschuler and the assisting soloists have been completed and Manager Greenbaum promises the finest series of orchestral concerts this city has ever known. The Russian Symphony is one of the important musical organizations in America and its conductor is one of the world's best. The concerts at Scottish Rite Auditorium will commence on Sunday afternoon, April 30. Seven different programs will be given. The other afternoon concerts will be on the following Saturday and Sunday. Evening concerts will be given Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday. Mr. Greenbaum has issued complete books for the week's offerings which can be obtained at any music store.

Elks Minstrels at the Valencia

San Francisco's Elks have long been famous for their minstrel shows under the direction of "Billy" Hynes, but it is seldom that this lodge permits its fun-making to be inspected by the general public. However on next Friday and Saturday nights, at the Valencia, one of the mammoth efforts of fun and frolic will be staged with much eclat. The names of the assisting artists is a guarantee of the performance, among the singers being W. J. O'Brien, M. D. Sullivan and Leo Baldwin; and among the funsters, Ed. Healey, M. J. Donigan, George Murphy and Billy Webster. "Billy" Hynes has trained a chorus of seventy-five voices.A beautiful tableau has been arranged in which Miss Thelma Fennell will pose as the Goddess of Liberty unveiling the exposition in San Francisco in 1915. The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Finding their efforts to depress the stock market futile, traders covered their shorts at the end of the week and this buying brought about a moderate rally in the leading issues. Still the market could not be called active at any time. Selling of Missouri Pacific was the chief incident of the week and was said to be due to the dissatisfaction over the choice of a new president. There has been no striking change in the general situation during the week but improvement in business is expected to set in before long, as a result of good crop prospects in the west and south. Conditions warrant an advance in the stock market as soon as the trust decisions are out of the way and we continue to favor the purchase of the standard shares around present levels.

Wheat—A decline of 3½ cents in the price of wheat the past week confirmed the judgment of market observers, and was justified by the statistical position and the generally fair promise of the winter sowings. Nothing developed in the past week to suggest that the bottom has been reached in the market. Flour trade is very quiet and will continue so until there is some evidence of a price recovery. The technical position of the market forced a rally the latter part of the week, but encouraged very little buying for a rise, operations on the long side being almost wholly covering of short accounts. Europe continues to back away from any possibility of exports from the Atlantic coast beyond those which usually occur regardless of the difference in market values. Liverpool remains the same distance below Chicago. The European supply situation is very comfortable and sales continue to press from the exporting countries. Crop conditions in the southern hemisphere, on the whole, are slightly better than last year. Australia will increase her yield 15,000,000 bushels, harvesting now being under way. India has had excellent rains which assure a harvest next month, larger than the big yield of last year. Winter sowings on the continent are in good shape, and the French shortage in acreage is being made up by spring seeding. We can see nothing in the world's situation to cause an immediate advance.

Corn—Unsettled weather the greater part of last week over the corn belt resulted in very disappointing receipts at all markets and helped the prices of cash grain. Holders were firmer in their views and eastern buyers displayed more anxiety for strictly fresh shelled corn. Nevertheless the shipments out were again short of the arrival, the eastern call being unimportant. The fleet that has been loaded to make room for corn and other grain in the elevators will move east in about a week. Only a part of this corn afloat has been sold and it is likely to affect eastern values when it arrives.

Cotton—The season for the planting of cotton is now on in all sections of the belt and while there has been a diversion in crop planting in the south during the past few years, cotton remains the money crop, although a great deal of attention has been paid of late to the growing of corn in the southern states for home consumption and export. However the prevailing high price for cotton is an inducement to grow a large crop this year, weather permitting. The average price of last season's crop was $14.37 per pound or $73.41 per bale. This season, although the crop promises to be about twelve million bales or nearly 1,500,000 bales more than last year, the average price promises to be as large as last season's high average of 14.37, as the bulk of the crop was marketed when prices were at the highest level. In other words farmers reaped the benefit of the high prices this season, having unloaded on spinners and speculators at the top of the market, and are now at work in the endeavor to grow another cotton crop. Thus far sales of mules, fertilizers and farm implements are reported to be of record-breaking proportions, and it is said that the increase in the cotton acreage will be immense, especially in the southwest, notably in Texas and Oklahoma. In the meantime the weather has turned off very favorably for the planting of the new crop, the rains coming after the soil had been thoroughly prepared, and it is stated that there is a good season in the ground; in west Texas the best in many years. Nevertheless the making of the new crop lies in the hands of Providence and the elements will be more of a factor than the increase in acreage, early estimates of which are placed at 5 per cent.

"I have nothing to reply," he answered, resorting to his former plan; "it is for you to tell me what you claim that I did."

"Very well," said the judge. "Listen! You started from Paris at seven o'clock in the evening and arrived at Courgeville at nine o'clock; returning you took an express for Paris at half-past eleven and reached Paris at half-past one, but you did not get to your home until half-past seven in the morning."

"Who saw me take this trip? No one."

"Because you disguised yourself—probably made yourself up in some way—and this precaution proves your guilt. When a man travels honestly he doesn't care who sees and recognizes him. Two hours and a half would have been quite sufficient for you to kill and dismember your victim, who left Paris by the same train as you."

"It is prodigious what the police can gather in the way of positive information," said Longouy sarcastically. The magistrate's narration seemed to him absolutely grotesque.

But suddenly his irony gave way to an almost overpowering anxiety; the judge had continued:

"If you did not return to your house until half-past seven in the morning it was because you decided, on leaving the train, to finish the night at the hotel near the station." There the judge named the hotel. "And why this maneuver? It was to create an alibi. During the preceding day you had telegraphed to this hotel, under an assumed name, and reserved a room. In the evening you took possession of this room, when you came in company with a woman—the woman who is now missing. At one o'clock in the morning you allowed yourself to be seen around the hotel, as you had allowed yourself to be seen four hours earlier. You thought that in the interval no one would have remarked your departure; and you could thus deny the journey to Courgeville. And that was very well conceived, but your expenditure of imagination comes back upon you as proof of your guilt. An innocent traveler who has no necessity for wishing to be thought elsewhere than where he is, does not take such pains to make his presence noticed at certain hours, in a hotel. Now give me your own account of how you employed your time on the night of the tenth of October."

Longouy had turned very pale; it was impossible for him to explain his actions on the date in question. As a matter of fact, the information the judge possessed was largely correct. It was true that he had reserved and occupied a room in the hotel the judge had named; true, also, that he had gone there with a companion and dined with her, and it was with the sole idea of avoiding a scandal that she had not wished to show herself with him in the public dining-room or in a restaurant. And this was precisely what he could not tell. His reputation as a man of honour also precluded his telling the name of his companion. It was that of the lady whom he had visited at Courgeville in the summer.

She had accorded him this meeting, the most innocent in the world, in order to talk over with him the increasing probabilities of their early marriage, but her prudence had made her hesitate either to go to his house or to receive him at hers. Hence the room at the hotel. Let this woman now come forward and say: "From eight o'clock till eleven o'clock, on the night of the tenth of October, Gaston Longouy was with me in a room of such and such a hotel," and the accusation against him would melt into air, but this was neither possible nor necessary. Would it not be all-sufficient for the reporter to pronounce the word which would terminate what he still regarded as a comedy? Nothing was needed but that he should confess the fantastic plan which he had made and carried through in order to advertise the paper. He was about to have recourse to this method of ending the affair, when the judge, noticing his emotion, delivered the blow which he had been preparing in order to overwhelm the man and force from him an avowal of his guilt.

"This woman whom you turned from the path of duty, this woman you led first to a hotel in Paris and then to Courgeville to assassinate her, is now known to us. We have discovered her name, her position, everything pertaining to her. In spite of the horrible state of mutilation in which she was found, she has been recognized as Madame Ballestin, nee Henriette Cardevache, of Trumot-les-Courgeville."

"Henriette! Madame Ballestin!" cried Longouy, "Impossible! Impossible! Henriette is not dead!"

"Come, no more of this comedy! You know that she is dead, since it was you who killed her.

"Ah, no, no! There is some mistake! It is too frightful! To imagine that I—I who loved her—could be her assassin! Ah, your honor, I was only pretending to be a murderer—experience of a reporter, and that sort of thing. The proprietor of the Voice of the People knows all about it; I told him of my scheme and arranged it all with him."

"There, there, that will do! You may tell all this wonderful fable to the jury."

"But assure me, your honor, that it is not true. Madame Ballestin is not really dead!"

"There is her death-certificate, made out after her disappearance was established. Her relations and her friends have been able to identify the sad remains."

"But, then," cried the unhappy reporter, "it was later that she was struck down, the poor unfortunate! Find out if she did not take the midnight train for Courgeville instead of returning to her home!"

The judge shrugged his shoulders.

The next day the Voice of the People was able to publish an exceptionally sensational interview with the supposed murderer of Madame Ballestin. The sale was enormous and the proprietor delighted. Rarely, even in America, had the press been able to put up a better "bluff."

"My friend, you hold some excellent trumps in this game," said Longouy's lawyer to him before the opening of the case in the court of assizes. "The prosecuting attorney is unable to produce any material proof; his whole case is built upon moral presumptions alone. It is a little chain of suppositions; I shall blow upon it and it will fall to pieces. But do not attempt to repeat to the court and the jury your ridiculous tale of simulated guilt, or you will turn them all against you. After such a recital I should not answer for anything."

The ingenious reporter was not willing to give up.

"But it is the truth," he cried, "and furthermore, it is this brilliant invention which is going to establish my reputation as a successful journalist on the American plan. But it is impossible to describe to you my sorrow! Henriette dead! And I adored her! I wish I could torture the miserable being who murdered her!"

No sooner had he announced, for his line of defense, the plan which he had elaborated with a view of furnishing such sensational reports for his paper than the presiding judge admonished him. "Don't attempt to play with the law," he said, "or you will be guilty of contempt of court."

"There, what did I tell you?" murmured his lawyer. "You will spoil the whole affair. You will prejudice the jury against you, and they will give you the maximum punishment."

On the judge's bench and all through the court-room could be noticed the same incredulity.

The proprietor of the Voice of the People was sent for, came, and testified according to Longouy's expectations.

"Now, you see!" cried the latter exultingly.

"Monsieur," said the prosecuting attorney to the proprietor, "is it possible that a man of your perspicacity, a man with an American penetration, did not immediately discern that this exceedingly ingenious reporter was laying a pitfall for you by his very candor, and with an infernal astuteness, a diabolical audacity, planned to commit his crime with impunity and to invalidate the proofs which might be brought against him, by simply saying: 'They are fictitious; it was I, myself, who voluntarily assumed these fetters and forged them in order to do a good turn for justice and prove to the public how easy it is for magistrates to deceive themselves?'"

The genial proprietor was rather taken aback by this view of the case; nothing was farther from his wishes than to look like a man who could be easily duped, and in order to prove his insight he replied quickly: "Oh, yes, certainly! I saw at once that there was something suspicious about this artifice of Longouy's, but I said to myself 'If he chooses to throw himself into the jaws of the wolf——' Pardon me, I meant no disrespect to the law by this metaphor!"

"That is quite right, quite right. You may sit down now," said the prosecuting attorney.

In the court-room indignation against the accused man was increasing every moment. His perverse audacity only inflamed it the more.

"Heavens, what a scoundrel!"—"Ah! these journalists!"—"Capable of anything!"—"To have cut and hacked that poor Henriette!"—"You knew her, didn't you?"—"Such a little thing—nothing but a charming child!"—"What a miserable brute!"—"Oh, the wretch!"—"And the effrontery of this ruse, to pretend to be playing at being a criminal!"—"To think that it is possible to behead such a man only once!"—"Even if they do condemn him to death"—"Why, is there a chance of his not being condemned to death? He may escape the guillotine?"

Caller—Are you positive that Miss Cutter is not in?

Maid—Yes, sir. I'd lose my job if I wasn't.

At this idea the popular fury mounted higher and higher, ready to go to any lengths in order to administer justice.

The hearing was over, the prosecution and the defense were deferred until the next day. When Longouy, surrounded by four guards, crossed the prison-yard in order to reenter his cell, an enormous crowd pressed around him and suddenly a cry was heard: "Hang him!" Twenty cries, a hundred, a thousand, repeated "Hang him, yes, hang him!"

A howling mob of men and women threw themselves on the guards, surrounded them, forced them apart and seized the miserable Longouy. In an instant they had bound his hands and feet; a rope was put around his neck; a street gamin of sixteen years climbed a lamp-post, drew up the rope and knotted it firmly; the rest loosed their hold of the unfortunate reporter, who now was left dangling in mid-air, his eyes protuding and his tongue hanging from his mouth.

"They have lynched him!" cried the proprietor of the Voice of the People, turning pale at the horrible sight. "Well, at least that is quite American!"

The next day a woman dressed in black presented herself before the district attorney of the province of Courgeville: "Monsieur," she said, "I am Madame Ballestin, and I was never murdered. Five weeks ago, on the night of the tenth of October, on entering my house a little after midnight, I found a cablegram from my husband, calling me immediately to New York, where he lay ill. Without losing a moment, without telling anyone—I had given my servant permission to go out, and she had not yet returned—I rushed to the Saint Lazarre station, leaped into a train for Havre and sailed for America the next morning.

"On arriving in America I was informed of the death of my husband; as soon as the necessary formalities would permit, I sailed again, in return. Newly widowed, I freely offer my testimony to save the life of Monsieur Longouy."

"In the name of heaven, madame," cried the district attorney angrily, "why could you not have managed to arrive twenty-four hours earlier? You put a very unsavory affair on our hands!"

Madame Ballestin fainted dead away on hearing that she was twice a widow, once actually, and again prospectively!

Who was the victim? And who was the assassin? Justice, that blind goddess, knows the answer to the riddle, but she will never reveal it.

Jones and Smith were two old bachelors who lived on the most intimate terms, constantly dined together and smoked the peaceful pipe, and occasionally went off together for a week's holiday by the sea. But a change came over the spirit of Smith's dream. Well on in the fifties he got married, and on his return from the honeymoon invited Jones to come and dine with him and be a witness of his happiness.

The dinner over, the old friends sat down in front of the fire after Mrs. Smith had gone upstairs.

"Well, my dear Jones," said Benedick, "now tell me, quite candidly, what you think of my dear wife."

Jones hesitated for a moment, then replied:

"Well, Smith, if I must speak quite candidly, I don't think much of her."

Smith patted him on the knee as he replied, confidentially:

"Neither do I, my dear Jones—neither do I."

Auto Notes

The raising of the American flag on the administration building of the new plant of the Lozier Motor Company in Detroit marked the completion and formal opening of the newest of Detroit's already large number of automobile enterprises. This factory which has been under construction since last May, commenced operations with a force of 450 men which will be increased as rapidly as possible until all departments are in full operation.

C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of the Diamond Rubber Co., has just returned from Salt Lake City where he completed details for the establishment of a Diamond factory branch. This new branch, which is to conform to the generally high standards set by Diamond Rubber houses, is to be located in the heart of the Mormon city's automobile trade district. Under the management of E. L. Hiteman the new establishment is to be the center of Diamond tire distribution for south Idaho, west Wyoming and east Nevada as well as for the entire state of Utah.

Among the most recent purchasers of Haynes cars are Leon Carrau, the wholesale jeweler, and A. Davies of the Davies Box and Lumber Co. Mr. Davies also owns a Haynes of 1910 model.

Carl H. Page, New York representative of the Chalmers Motor Company, has been elected vice-president of the Licensed Automobile Dealers of New York. John F. Plummer will succeed H. J. Budlong as president. The Licensed Automobile Dealers of New York is one of the strongest dealers' organizations in the country. Its members probably sell more cars annually than are sold in any other city in the world. Mr. Page is one of the most prominent automobile dealers in New York and sells an average of 1,000 Chalmers cars a year.

The local branch of the Haynes Auto Sales Co. has just been advised by factory authorities that 18 car-loads of machinery were recently unloaded at Kokomo, Indiana, for the equipment of the new Haynes factory which is being rushed to completion there. In order that the manufacture of cars may continue with little interruption a temporary wooden building is being erected to shelter this machinery which is to be permanently installed at once.

Seven deliveries of Oakland and Hupmobile cars is the record made by S. G. Chapman on Saturday of last week. This would indicate that Spring has brought prosperity to the local motor car trade. Among deliveries reported by Chapman are Oakland cars to Dr. C. Razor and A. C. Huston of Woodland, Wm. Shwarz of Napa and Stewart Nester of Arcata. J. L. Harlan, the Woodland sub-agent also made further delivery of three cars. Hupmobiles have been delivered to Dr. H. G. Plymire of South San Francisco, W. J. Johnson of Martinez, Frank B. Anderson and Philip Weinman of San Francisco and Steiger Bros. of Petaluma. In addition to these Chapman recently shipped two of the Hupps to the Von Ramm-Young Co. of Honolulu. The Chico Construction Company have just taken an Abbott-Detroit.

A. E. Morrison, sales manager for the Pacific Motor Car Company, and Col. H. W. Bradbury left recently on the steamship Harvard for Los Angeles to attend the twenty-four hour automobile race on the Los Angeles Motordrome. Just previous to starting Morrison received a telegram from the Southern California metropolis stating the Cole racing team had arrived there from Jacksonville where the cars had been competing in the Florida Beach races. Edmunds and Jenkins are the two drivers who have been piloting the Cole with much success in recent meets. The Cole entry in the twenty-four hour contest created unusual interest in Southern California motoring circles largely because of the sensational victories won there last year on the same motordrome by Endicott's Cole car.

"The Prodigal Judge"

Vaughan Kester always takes plenty of space in which to move his characters and "The Prodigal Judge" is no exception to his rule, for there are four hundred and fifty pages in which Judge Slocum Price and his associates play their parts, and though the Judge is the nominal hero of the narrative, nearly one-fourth of the story is told before he makes his appearance. The scenes are laid in North Carolina and Tennessee when Andrew Jackson was President, the Mississippi river a frontier, most of the Pacific Coast still foreign territory and Texas a refuge for undesirables. Though there are no historical characters introduced as actors in the drama, "The Prodigal Judge," is a historical novel of the better sort, one which seeks to give a picture of the times and manners and the common people of its epoch, a background for history. Bobbs Merrill are the publishers.

"The Imprudence of Prue"

"The Imprudence of Prue" is Sophie Fisher's second venture at novel writing—her first independent work, since "It Happened This Way" was written in collaboration with Rose Eytinge, the actress. This is a lively story of romantic adventure set back in the days of "Good Queen Anne," when Stuart plots were still factors in English politics and conventions were more or less elastic. Never was a damsel less auspiciously named than this heroine, for the only prudence connected with her was her name. It is a lively and readable book making no pretensions that it does not live up to, though one does wonder a bit what would be found in the chapter after the last one—whether the irrepressible Prue really did settle down or whether she merely carried her imprudence across the channel to the French court. Bobbs Merrill are the publishers.

Revolutions in Their Variety

The more we learn of the revolution in Mexico the more it appears to be an affair between the Maderos and Diaz. While the Maderos profess to be animated by the humane desire to emancipate the people from tyrannical dictatorship they are to be appeased rather by concessions to themselves than by guarantees of civil rights to the people. The circumstances that seem to justify this view of the situation have diminished the enthusiasm of some American editors who hitherto warmly espoused the cause of the revolutionists believing them to be intent upon establishing in Mexico the institutions of a true republic. They supposed that the masses had risen up in their might to overthrow the government of a despot and secure for themselves the blessings of liberty. This is the mistake usually made with respect to the character of revolutions and with respect to all the historic triumphs over arbitrary and despotic power. The masses never rise spontaneously to right their wrongs. It wasn't the masses but the barons who induced the signing of Magna Charta. Whenever the masses revolt it is at the instigation of a few men, and they have revolted unwisely more frequently than otherwise. And the fruits of a revolution usually depend on the character of the leaders. It was so in the case of our own revolution which is now popularly supposed to have been animated by a sentiment of hostility to the monarchical form of government and to have been precipitated by a king. As a matter of fact the thing that caused the revolution was more popular than the resentment that it inspired. Like most historic evils, such as witch trials, the stake of Smithfield and the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew, the proposal to coerce the colonies was extremely popular in England. It was carried by 304 to 105 in the House of Commons and by 104 to 29 in the House of Lords. Assuredly a popular measure if we may judge from the vote. And to provoke resentment of that act of oppression on this side of the water required much agitation. Also it required much perseverance and patience to persuade the people to fight it out after the war was started. The fruits of that revolution might have been very different from what they were had the leaders been disposed to take advantage of the ingratitude of the masses toward the army not only during the trying vicissitudes of the heart-breaking struggle but even after independence was gained. The masses hardly had sufficient patriotism to take an interest in the work of forming a nation. Hardly any more apathetic than our colonies in the days of the great crisis are the masses in Mexico today. They will abide by the decision of their leaders, and they will be satisfied, their ignorance being proportioned to the oppression and degradation under which they are accustomed to live. And because of this ignorance the revolution cannot be of much benefit to the masses. A revolution to be a success must first be achieved in the moral sphere. Then only can it be a triumph rather of principles than of bullets.

The Bully in Politics

One of the characteristic elements of the progressive type of statesmanship is bullyism which seems to be regarded as a sign of force of character. The political bully is a man whose symbol of force is the big stick. It is his policy to overcome opposition by the bludgeon method. He achieves the mastery of men by brutality. The argument ad auditores is his favorite in every controversy, and he indulges in gratuitous assertion without scruple, without restraint, preferring always to be victorious than a gentleman. Much success is to be attained in politics by following this principle of conduct, but the man who adopts this principle does not possess force of character, nor does he attain permanently a position in life which belongs to real merit. No man can have lasting influence who is not disposed to be fair and honest in dealing with his antagonists. The unfair, the dishonest, the brutal, are despised and they must in time succumb to the resentment of their enemies, for they have not the force of character to resist powerful, unterrified opposition. Fairness and honesty are essential elements of force of character, and when combined with self-reliance, common sense and courage they are irresistible. Now the bully is never a man of courage. Courage connotes magnanimity. The bully is good in attack but not in defence. He cannot fight an up-hill battle. He cannot stand punishment. The only game that he can play is the one in which he lays all the blows and takes none. A few smart thrusts takes all the fight out of him. He is easily flustered and routed, for it is only the courageous man who remains cool in the presence of danger, the self-reliant man who has confidence in himself, whereas the coward grows excited and becomes loud-mouthed to conceal his feelings. The arbitrary, dictatorial individual, accustomed to force his views on others and to win by bluster and brutality quickly loses confidence in and control of himself when he fails to make his usual impression. It is in critical emergencies that force of character asserts itself. Perhaps the finest type of forceful character in all history is Julius Caesar, who was not only brave and magnanimous but tender and conciliatory. He showed forbearance even toward the followers of Cataline. He never lost his temper. He was calm even when the virtue of his wife was in question. The antithesis of Caesar in statesmanship was William Cobbett who was known as the Big Ben in politics, who was accustomed to crush his opponents with his weight, and who, when set upon, slunk out of the controversy. It is well that we should be sensible of the consideration of what is the true and what is the false sign of force of character lest we follow in the train of a bully instead of a brave man.

A Mother's Love

Man's inhumanity to man can never equal man's inhumanity to woman. For man may deprive woman of her children, and this is a species of inhumanity which surpasseth all others. It is beyond the power of man to invent any torture more horrible, more exquisite. And this torture we inflict in the name of justice! We conceive it to be just to separate the unfaithful wife from her children, but what is done to the unfaithful husband? He may be separated from his children too. How vastly different though are the feelings of the bereaved father from those of the mother made desolate with loneliness and grief! No fondest father's fondest attachment approximates the essence of real human love—a mother's yearning. It is this which surpasses in sublimity all human deed or word or thought. On all this cold and selfish sublunary sphere there is but one imperishable fount of love and that is in a mother's heart. No language can express the power of that love, or image its intensity, its heroism, its majesty. The strongest love in man is only an episode in his life. Maternal love to a woman's sensitive soul is not a mere part of her existence but the very life breath of her heart. A sacred thing to trifle with is this image of God wrapped in the fine spun threads of a mother's affections. Yet with what brutal carelessness is it dealt with! How often is it mocked at by the undiscerning who regard an erring woman, a wife who has been disloyal to her husband, as something inferior to a human being? A woman may sin against her marriage vows and yet be not devoid of sensibility. A woman may not be a good wife and yet be not a bad mother. The only justification for separating a mother from her children is grounded in consideration of the children's welfare. The fact is not to be blinked that there are unnatural mothers in this world who have no sense of decency or shame and whose example children must be safeguarded against, but it should be always remembered that the first duty to children is to make them happy and that there is no happiness for them like that which flows from the tender caresses of a loving mother. To these observations we have been impelled by consideration of the case of Mrs. Henry, the unfortunate woman who seems inclined to cling both to her affinity and her children. She may not be deserving of the care of her children, but she is certainly more deserving of compassion than of the brutal attentions she has been receiving from the reporters of an evening paper who participated in the pursuit of her and seem to be quite proud of having keyholed her with all the artistry of a Gumshoe Burns.

Our New Preacher

Enthusiasm, the inspiration of everything great, the genius of sincerity, the virtue that rouses men to deeds of renown, that moves stones and charms brutes: it is this that has come to us in President Lovett's luxurious private car, across mountains and arid acres, through smiling valleys and populous cities. It is incarnated in the person of the Rev. Charles F. Aked, a distinguished preacher, who believes that here where meet and mingle the East and West, is an engaging field worthy of his best and noblest efforts. A man of imagination with a sense of beauty and a feeling for nature, is Dr. Aked; lured to us by the things that appeal to the spiritual instinct. He comes to us in much the same spirit in which St. Paul journeyed to Macedonia. Having been told, so he informed the reporters, that we were in need of a moral leader, he abandoned the fleshpots of Gotham and their votaries, and taking President Lovett's upholstered car he was whirled into our midst fledged for action. Having instinctive prescience of the future greatness of a city which reminds him of the Florence of the Medici he is glad to be with us, glad to be on hand to give direction to our moral forces. We, too, are glad to have this talented Englishman enter with his enthusiasm into the life of our community, to assist in augmenting the excellence of our nature. We can never have too much effort toward removing human error, clearing human confusion and diminishing human misery. We felicitate Dr. Aked on his coming, and ourselves also; but we would have a few words with him apropos of his assertion that "there are many people who are afraid that the forces of evil are getting the best of it in the foundations of this empire." We suspect that the purveyors of calumny have been whispering in Dr. Aked's unsophisticated ear, and we would warn him against these busybodies, we would assure him that their words ride upon poisoned arrows. Nobody need be alarmed about the forces of evil hereabouts. The proportion of evil to virtue in San Francisco is no greater than in any other large city. There is vice here as there is everywhere; evil there must be in every community, for there is evil in every man be he ever so good; but we judge a man not by his imperfections but by the degree in which they are redeemed by his virtues, and so also should we judge a community. Let us hope that on this principle we are to be judged by Dr. Aked. For while he is right in his conjecture that "there is an opportunity for great work here," to accomplish great work a clergyman must command respect, confidence and affection. Many clergymen have come to this city to accomplish great work, and they have failed because they sought not the salvation of others but their own vainglory. The pulpit was to them "the clergyman's parade"; they loved to preach; not those to whom they preached, and while there was much good preaching there was very little good hearing. Now as to Dr. Aked we have no misgivings other than those which are inspired by the average preacher who concerns himself with worldly affairs more than with spiritual affairs. He tells us that in England he was pro-Boer and made himself unpopular. from which we infer despite his professed desire to lead people into the way of living prescribed by Christ that he takes a hand in politics. If there was one thing that Christ let severely alone it was politics. He never bothered himself about the wars of the Romans. We believe with Webster that "the preaching of the Gospel is the form in which human agency has been and still is most efficaciously employed for the spiritual improvement of men." There was a time when preachers supplied popular enlightenment on the questions of the hour. The abbott then was a greater man than the mayor. Ecclesiasticism regulated international affairs. But long since the spread of education reduced to their original elements the duties and the influence of the clerical office. It is no longer necessary for the minister to qualify for the village orator and the social oracle. He is at liberty to imitate the apostles of Christianity, to exercise all his power to awaken devotion and faith, and devote all his learning to the quickening of immortal hope. The fact is however that many learned and sincere preachers do not consider that their commission confines them strictly to the business of inculcating what they believe to be the truths of religion. They do not regard the church as "the vestibule to an immortal life." And it is not to be denied that in their own way some of them accomplish much good. Dr. Aked is probably of their number. He says he wishes "to join movements," and what is better still he "wants to go with them for awhile and learn." Which argues that Dr. Aked is a man of discretion who doesn't jump to his conclusions. And because it does argue so we refrain from drawing any inference from his observation, "Your city wears a Parisian smile day and night." This observation may be variously interpreted. We hope that Dr. Aked would not prefer to see our city wearing a Parisian frown night and day.

A Lesson From Hartford

The initiative and the referendum were recently tried out in Hartford, Conn., and although some questions of vital interest were before the people about one-half the electorate either from apathy or preoccupation with their personal affairs did not go to the polls. And as a consequence the results of the election represent the sentiment of a small minority of the people. Nevertheless the people of Hartford are enjoying the inestimable blessing of self-government. What occurred in Hartford is precisely what has always occurred wherever a people has been deluded into the notion that self-government means government by the people sitting in committee of the whole. Self-government is of course something vastly different from government by direct primary, initiative and referendum. Government by these devices is what is technically known as absolutism. Its advocates at this day call themselves Progressives as though they were introducing something new under the sun, whereas they are merely reviving a form of government that has been frequently tried and always found wanting. It has been found wanting for two reasons: because it causes the people to take alternately too much and too little interest in civic affairs. When they take too much interest in civic affairs their action is the result of an accidental or momentary general opinion, which is vastly different from the organically produced opinion contemplated by institutional self-government. When they take too little interest in civic affairs and they are not protected by institutions such as our Progressives are seeking to destroy they drift into chaos and anarchy. Now this tendency to take too little interest in civic affairs is inevitable whenever elections are held frequently. This is a fact about which there is no dispute among philosophers who have discussed the science of government. They don't dispute it because history establishes it beyond peradventure. It is supported by tables of statistics dealing with elections from the time of the market democracy of Athens to Colonial rule in our own country. From these statistics is drawn this maxim: "The more exclusive the privilege of voting the smaller is the number of qualified voters who abstain from voting, and the largest number of abstainers occurs where there is universal suffrage and frequent elections." But what are the maxims, the precepts and the principles of any science to the modernists of American politics? Or what do they care for the lesson that has been afforded them by the election in Hartford or any other election?

The Hammers

Noise of hammers once I heard,
Many hammers, busy hammers,
Beating, shaping, night and day,
Shaping, beating dust and clay
To a palace; saw it reared;
Saw the hammers laid away.

And I listened, and I heard
Hammers beating, night and day,
In the palace newly reared,
Beating it to dust and clay,
Other hammers, muffled hammers,
Silent hammers of decay.

—Ralph Hodgson.

Perspective Impressions

The man who enjoys his natural gifts in silence has never tried a press agent.

Some of the things that come to him who waits are damaged in transit.

Santa Clara wants to unite with San Jose and call the result Santa Clara. This is a case of Jonah desiring to swallow the whale.

Dr. Aked says that his work in this city will make his work in New York "look silly." Well every man has a right to do what he pleases with his own work.

The man who marries with the expectation of getting nothing but a wife is not so rare as the woman who marries with the hope of getting everything but a husband.

The motto of modern American statesmanship: Nothing is morally wrong which is politically expedient

That coy citizen, James Rolph, vowing that he would ne'er consent has consented and once more the redemption of San Francisco is prefigured.

By their wine riots the French people reminded us that life in France is a romantic representation of existence gratuitously offered for the edification or amusement of the world at large.

Democrats in Washington are considering not What's best to be done for the country, but What's best to be done for the party. The solution of this latter question is regarded by Speaker Clark and his followers as the quintessence of statesmanship.

Senator La Follette is the author of a bill granting permission to civil service employees to unionize. Thus does the Progressive candidate for President betray his disinterested love of the humble wage-earner.

The Duchess de Sagan (formerly Anna Gould) says that her eldest son shall never get a sou of her estate because he looks like her first husband. This is a case of visiting on the son the indiscretion of both parents.

One bid of fifteen thousand dollars was all that was received last Monday when the Supervisors offered for sale bonds in the sum of $1,250,000 to raise money for a municipal water system. And that bid was not made by James D. Phelan or E. P. E. Troy or any of the other public spirited citizens who have been talking their heads off about Hetch-Hetchy.

Correspondence

"Tipperary"

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: It affords me great pleasure to bring forth from my precious scrap-book the "verses that rhyme with Tipperary" which your correspondent "Tipperary" called for last week. The author of these nonsense verses is unknown. They were written by way of retort to a poem by a Dr. Fitzgerald, a native of Tipperary, in which appeared these lines:

"And thou! dear village, loveliest of the clime, Fain would I name thee but I scant in rhyme."

In the fire of 1906 I lost a scrap-book filled with nonsense verse. It contained a very valuable collection. I'd like to recover some of them. May I not, now that I have responded to the call of "Tipperary," beg other readers of Town Talk to "come through"?

Yours truly,
—Hibernian.

"A poet there was in sad quandary,
To find a rhyme for Tipperary.
Long labored he through January,
Yet found no rhyme for Tipperary;
Toiled every day in February,
But toiled in vain for Tipperary;
Searched Hebrew text and commentary,
But searched in vain for Tipperary;
Bored all his friends in Inverary,
To find a rhyme for Tipperary;
Implored the aid of 'Paddy Cary,"
Yet still no rhyme for Tipperary;
He next besought his mother Mary
To tell him rhyme for Tipperary;
But she, good woman, was no fairy,
Nor witch,—though born in Tipperary;
Knew everything about her dairy,
But not the rhyme for Tipperary;
The stubborn muse he could not vary,
For still the lines would run contrary
Whene'er he thought on Tipperary.
And though of time he was not chary,
'Twas thrown away on Tipperary.
Till of his wild-goose chase most weary,
He vowed he'd leave out Tipperary.
But, no—the theme he might not vary,
His longing was not temporary,
To find meet rhyme for Tipperary.
He sought among the gay and airy,
He pestered all the military,
Committed many a strange vagary,
Bewitched, it seemed, by Tipperary.
He wrote, post-haste, to Darby Leary,
Besought with tears his Aunty Sairie;
But sought he far, or sought he near, he Ne'er found a rhyme for Tipperary.
He traveled sad through Cork and Kerry,
He drove like mad through sweet Dunleary,
Kicked up a precious tantar-ara,
But found no rhyme for Tipperary;
Lived fourteen weeks at Stan-ar-ara,
Was well-nigh lost in Glenegary,
Then started slick for Demerara,
In search of rhyme for Tipperary.
Through Yankee-land, sick, solitary,
He roamed by forest, lake, and prairie,
He went per terram et per mare,
But found no rhyme for Tipperary.
Through orient climes on dromedary,
On camel's back through great Sahara;
His travels were extraordinary
In search of rhyme for Tipperary.
Fierce as a gorgon or chimaera,
Fierce as Alecto or Magaera,
Fiercer than e'er a love-sick bear, he
Ranged through the 'londe' of Tipperary.
His cheeks grew thin and wondrous hairy,
His visage long, his aspect 'eerie,'
His tout ensemble, faith, would scare ye,
Amidst the wilds of Tipperary.
Becoming hypochon-dri-ary,
He sent for his apothecary,
Who ordered 'balm' and 'saponary,'
Herbs rare to find in Tipperary.
In his potations ever wary,
His choicest drink was 'home goosebery.'
On swipes, skim-milk, and smallest beer, he Scanted rhyme for his Tipperary.
Had he imbibed good old Madeira,
Drank pottle-deep of golden sherry,
Of Falstaff's sack, or ripe Canary,
No rhyme had lacked for Tipperary.
Or had his tastes been literary,
He might have found extemporary
Without the aid of dictionary,
Some fitting rhyme for Tipperary.
Or had he been an antiquary,
Burnt midnight oil in his library,
Or been of temper less 'camstary,'
Rhymes had not lacked for Tipperary.
He paced about his aviary,
Blew up, sky-high, his secretary,
And then in wrath and anger sware he,
There was no rhyme for Tipperary."

A Recall Resolution

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: The Legislature left its work incomplete. It failed to act on a joint resolution which I sent to one of the senators but which, as far as I can ascertain, was never introduced. That was too bad. It would have crowned the labors of our reformers. If you care to publish it, here it is:

Whereas, It is reported that owing to the recent heavy rains, the reservoirs of the Spring Valley Water Co., a corporation, now contain one billion gallons more than at any previous time;

And Whereas, The eight hour day was not observed in filling the said reservoirs, making the water unfair;

And Whereas, What is favorable to a corporation is looked upon by the people with grave distrust and recognized as an unfriendly act against the people as well as against organized labor;

And Whereas, This was an Act of God;

Therefore

Be it enacted by the people of California,

That the said offending party is hereby recalled, and Governor Hiram Johnson be requested, (the Senate and Labor Council of San Francisco concurring), to name three citizens of San Francisco, to-wit: M. I. Sullivan, Francis J. Heney and Fremont Older, as a board to supercede the said offending party in all matters that concern the regulation of public and private affairs in and around San Francisco.

Sincerely,
—A San Franciscan.

XVIII—RICHARD HOTALING

By Edward F. O'Day

"Why am I on the stage?"

Richard Hotaling smiled as he repeated the question. It was quite apparent that he liked the question. I doubt whether the interviewer could frame any question which Hotaling would like quite as much. It gave him a chance to talk about himself. It is a subject in which he is frankly and enthusiastically interested. And because he is an exceptionally good talker who carries you along easily by his swift volubility of well chosen phrases, it is a subject in which you speedily become interested too.

"It is a hard question to answer," he went on without any trace of hesitation, "unless one answers it from the standpoint of what amuses one. Being on the stage amuses me. Some men, Colonel Roosevelt for instance, like to hunt. I don't. My repugnance for killing any living thing is almost as great as Mrs. Fiske's and Mrs. Fiske once said to me, 'Oh that I had the courage of Charlotte Corday, so that I might kill that horrible man Roosevelt!'

"I dislike all kinds of waste. I couldn't bear to sit around here sucking tobacco into my mouth and blowing out smoke. It would bore me to play billiards, as those chaps are doing. I'd rather take a walk with crumbs in my pocket and feed the birds or stand at this window and watch the passing show."

Ample gesticulation accompanied the hurried sentences. We were sitting in the card room of the Athenian Club and my eye followed the direction of Mr. Hotaling's outstretched arm, first to the billiard room across the hall where Oakland's leisured men were cuing and miscuing, and then to the window through which Oakland's leisured street activities were on view. But my eye went quickly back to Mr. Hotaling's eager, smiling face. Baldness is pushing its way over the top of his head and his hair is graying perceptibly, as if in terror of its approach. Many wrinkles have cut their parallels across his forehead and there are vertical lines on either side of his mouth. But his blue eyes shine and the features are firm. Evidently his face has been marked not by the fullness of time but by the fullness of life, by that enthusiasm of existence which shows in all he says. And he kept right on saying.

"Too many Americans want to cut themselves to the usual stamp and are inclined to think that all who do not are fools. But I am never afraid to do the unconventional thing; and as long as I keep within bounds why should I not do the thing which is the expression of what is in me? I am younger today than when I was a boy. Acting is my gambol.

"And is it so strange that I should act? Joe Redding tells me that the late Lord Salisbury loved ivory carving and that Mr. Balfour is a fine violinist. Then too, the president of the Elevated Road in Chicago is an art blacksmith. Our own Willis Davis is an excellent wood carver."

Lord Salisbury, Mr. Balfour, the president of the Chicago L, Willis Davis and Mr. Hotaling—somehow the list lacks cohesion; but when one remembers the ivory carving, the wood carving, the art blacksmithing, the violin and the buskin, all superimposed upon inartistic pursuits, it carries a certain measure of conviction. I do not know how Mr. Balfour, the Chicago man and Willis Davis regard their business activities, but Mr. Hotaling enlightened me about his.

"You might ask me," he said, (and so I might), "how I keep business obligations while I am acting in Oakland. I can only account for it by a wonderful adaptability that gives me a certain measure of success in all I attempt."

Which, I should hazard, may also apply to Lord Salisbury, Mr. Balfour, the Chicago man and Mr. Willis Davis. But I did not pursue the subject, being much more keenly interested in Mr. Hotaling's dramatic diversions.

"It all goes back," he explained, "to the cellar circuses of my boyhood days. We were four brothers and we gave the usual performances for a bottle or a sack at our old home in Howard street between Twelfth and Thirteenth. When I left Andover at nineteen I played Richelieu for a church in which my mother was interested. I was just a youngster then, trying to give an imitation of Edwin Booth. Of course my performance of Richelieu today is far away from that early one. Then I acted in amateur affairs with Judge Murasky and Blanche Bates and Olive Oliver and Hal Blinn. Hal and I—Holbrooke Blinn, you know—used to be great friends and for days we would do nothing but imitate a Portuguese or a Frenchman or a German talking English."

And Mr. Hotaling fell at once into mimicry, giving me samples from his dialect repertoire. It suggested a question.

"Why do you play Shylock with an accent?"

"I play Shylock with a strong Yiddish accent," he answered, "because I can't play him any other way. It's simply the character inside of me coming out. Acting, you know, is an obsession. The body, the individuality is set aside and the personality is so tinctured and flavored by the character the actor is trying to portray that all the physical attributes of the actor are absolutely under the control of the role. In Shylock I can't give up the dialect. Besides, I've visited the Jewish quarters in Prague and other European cities. But to keep right at home, go and talk to Daniel Meyer—as soon as he drops all his Jewish attributes I'll play Shylock straight."

That sounding quite conclusive I asked him why he didn't go on the stage as a professional performer receiving compensation for his efforts. At Ye Liberty, you know, Mr. Hotaling is not on the payroll. No ghost walks for him.

"If I received any compensation for what I did, it would take me out of my class. As to becoming a professional actor——." He considered for a moment.

"Well, I suppose as youngsters we have all thought of driving the great ones into continuous. But I'm old. I'm forty-two. Besides I'm both lazy and timid. I'm very easily disheartened. Then again, I take so much joy in other things. No one thing is so very important to me that I want to strive for it. And I like to get out in the country. I love to be alone in the woods and commune with the pixies. When I'm fussing with my chickens and my pigeons I want to do nothing else. The fact that chickens and pigeons have to be killed for food disturbs me; but at least we kill them quickly and don't let them breathe out their poor lives in the pocket of a hunting coat.

"I suppose if some of the fellows at the Bohemian Club heard me talking like this they'd say I was posing. Which reminds me," he rattled on ,"that after a recent minstrel show at the Bohemian Club in which I was one of the end-men, I was accused of being vulgar. I admit that sometimes I approach near the realm of the vulgar, but I can say for myself that I have never indulged in anything indecent that wasn't disinfected by a certain cleverness that gave it raison d'etre. One of the Bohemians who objected most to my end-man jokes is most lascivious in his private life. Personally, I am willing to admit that all my purity is in my private life."

It all came very suddenly. Evidently it was on his mind and had to come off. But I switched the conversation back to the stage.

"I love to play Hamlet," he said. "I love to play it despite the fact that I have seen Forbes Robertson try to play it. Forbes Robertson is a very tiresome person. When you see his Hamlet you feel that it should have been announced beforehand that 'the Rev. Doctor Forbes Robertson on next Sunday night will give a reading of Shakespeare's Hamlet and during the reading he will walk up and down.'

I was breathless at his iconoclasm and to convince me he gave an imitation of Forbes Robertson's Hamlet. At the conclusion he threw up his hands in disgust.

"Besides all that," he said, "Forbes Robertson's shoes squeaked."

"As for Bernhardt," he continued, "I can't see her. She's a very dear old soul, of course. But she does everything from the throat."

And he gave me an imitation of Bernhardt.

"I am sensitive to malicious criticism like that of Acton Davies," he went on, "but I like sincere criticism. An adverse point of view is all right, but all I ask is that if the critic shows me where I'm wrong let him tell me the reason why.

"I like my role in 'The House Next Door.' I love anything that will cause the audience to drop a sweet tear. I like the part of the bounder in 'Mr. Hopkinson.' After that I'm to play Shylock. Then I'll alternate in Othello and Iago. After that I'd like to alternate in Uncle Tom and Little Eva; then play Abigail in 'The County Fair' and finish with Lear. I'd be content then to go back to the country.

"But——," and there was a yearning note in his voice as he spoke, "I would like to play somewhere else than in Oakland."

By Robert McTavish

The Muckraker Abroad

Charley McClatchy, of the Sacramento Bee, is not altogether pleased with Europe, as a few excerpts from his travel letters will show:

It is a mistake to make a visit to Vesuvius. There is absolutely nothing to see when you get there. You cannot approach near enough to the mouth of the crater to give you any better idea of the volcano than you can obtain at a distance . The trip is tiresome and is not worth the trouble.

There is a great deal in a name. The British matron and the American citizen will flock into the churches and galleries here, armed with their Baedeker. He is their brains, as well as their guide. They look upon him as infallible. And they will sit—Baedeker in hand—in intense admiration over some "old master" that Baedeker has marked with the sign of his apostolic approval—probably some female figure with the arm of an infant, the leg of a cornfed Amazon, a brewery bust and the face of a cherub. And there they will rhapsodize and think they admire it, because Baedeker has recognized it.

The Corso would scarcely make a good alley in Sacramento.

If one-tenth you hear about them on every hand be true, the usual Roman nobleman is a despicable scoundrel, as well as a nasty libertine. I have heard it from the lips of more than one man of family in Rome—men who have lived all their lives in Rome, Romans who love Rome—that if the American millionaire knew the average Roman aristocrat as the people of Rome know him, he would prefer to see his daughter dead at his feet than married to one of them. However, no one should have the slightest shadow of sympathy for any American girl who comes over here to sell herself for a title, and then finds she has bought a deadbeat, a libertine, a drunkard, and a wife-beater. She baited for what she got. Let her put up with her diseased fish and keep silent.

In Italy so far the barbers have been just about as bad as the wine has been good. They shave here by main strength and awkwardness And after they are through they take the shaving brush and use it to slop a lot of cold water over the face from a basin which has been cut on one side so as to fit in the neck.

Automatic German Citizenship

A bill of great interest to all Germans living in the United States will soon be introduced in the German Reichstag by the Pan-German League and the Association for the Preservation of German Nationality in Foreign Countries. This instrument provides that loss of German citizenship cannot take place without the knowledge or against the wish of the German subject in question. In particular, German citizenship will not be forfeited when a German subject becomes the subject of another country, although the German citizenship will be suspended in relation to that country of which the German subject has become a citizen. The moment he leaves foreign territory his German citizenship will revive automatically. The children of a German emigrant who has lost his German citizenship will be entitled to become German subjects on making application to the proper German authorities. Women of German birth who have ceased to be German subjects owing to marriage with the subjects of other countries will, on making application, if their marriage has been terminated by the death of the husband or by divorce, again become German subjects. In this case, those of their children not yet of age likewise will become German citizens.

Making Soap Out of Mustangs

Imperial Caesar dead and turned to clay is not dedicated to more inglorious use than the wild mustangs of the Mojave Desert. While Caesar stops a hole to keep the wind away the mustangs are made into soap. Just what the process is has not been explained, but according to the San Bernardino Sun, a sober journal, the thrifty Los Angeles soapmakers have discovered a good lathery article of suds and buy him off the desert at five dollars a head. This is surprising, but only less surprising is the fact that the Mojave has its bands of wild horses. The progenitors of the bands were turned loose years ago and besides increasing after their kind, were joined by many strays which got away from prospectors in obedience to the call of the wild. The bands are very large and exceedingly wild.

The Case of Andrew Toth

In 1891 in Allegheny county, Pa., Andrew Toth, an Austrian, was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to the penitentiary for life. The other day he was pardoned by Governor Tener and given his liberty after serving for nearly twenty years. It turns out that he was wholly innocent of the crime with which he was charged, that, in fact, he had no connection whatever with it, and that an injustice was inflicted upon him for which now there can be no adequate redress or reparation. The chief witness against him at his trial, the man who positively designated Toth as the murderer of Michael Quinn, and on whose testimony Toth was convicted, lately died in Austria, and on his deathbed confessed that he swore falsely and he piteously begged that the victim of his devilish perjury might be set at liberty. The confession led to an investigation along the lines it disclosed, and this made it perfectly certain that Toth was wholly innocent. This Andrew Toth was a poor and obscure man who worked in one of the Carnegie mills at Pittsburg. They tell us that there was nothing in his character or antecedents to connect him presumably with such a crime; that he was a peaceable, devout and even a religious man, and that in the prison he was known as "Little Praying Andy." During all the weary years of his incarceration he bore his sufferings meekly and patiently, never once losing his faith in God, and in the fact that the day of his deliverance and vindication would surely come. He tells us himself that the confinement, the toil and the discipline of the prison caused but a very small part of his suffering. It was the anguish which wrung his soul on account of the frightful injustice done him, and the disgrace brought on his humble name and that of his wife and children. What can society do in recompense? It would seem, absolutely nothing.

He's Against Bathing

Sir Almroth Wright, a distinguished London physician, has recently been talking in a fashion which reminds one of a Shavian medico. Sir Almroth is against the hot bawth and the cold tub. "People," he declares, "say we must have hard exercise, a certain amount of washing and a certain amount of fresh air, but I am persuaded that these rules are quite wrong. There is a belief that by washing people wash off the microbes but we also destroy the protective skin which is all around the body like the tiles of a house. When one has a horny hand no microbes can ever get near the skin. A great deal of washing increases the microbes of the skin, so I don't think cleanliness is to be recommended as a hygienic method." All of which has excited the derision of London journalists and obtained for him mention in countless paragraphs. Which, in turn, may have been what Sir Almroth was after.

Branding Criminals

A Paris physician, Dr. Icard, has announced his invention of a new method for identifying criminals. It consists of a paraffine injection, by which he can be readily recognized. After taking his measure by the Bertillon process, Dr. Icard suggests that a small quantity of paraffine be injected under the skin of the convicted person. The injection forms a small hump, which does not endanger the person's health, but which he keeps all his life and which looks like a natural excrescence. According to the doctor's scheme a regular sign language could be arranged. It might be agreed the world over that the right shoulder blade be reserved for operations. It could be divided into three parts. The upper might be reserved for humps denoting "very dangerous," the middle for "dangerous," the lower for "less dangerous." And a detective could easily take hold of a man's shoulder and feel for the hump which would indicate whether the criminal be handcuffed immediately or watched for a longer period of time.

Tea Drinking in France

Tea drinking in France seems to have become not only fashionable, but popular. Its increasing vogue is shown by the revenue returns for 1909, which show a consumption of 1,239 tons. Reckoning a pinch of tea per cup, this represents about 620,000,000 cups drunk in the course of the year. Ten or fifteen years ago tea was regarded in France as a semi-medical concoction, to be used to restore fainting women. It was classed among the mild liquids commonly known as "tisanes," and in the provinces, at any rate, people who expressed a liking for tea as a beverage were looked upon as "snobs" or eccentrics. Nowadays the fashion has spread all over the country, and no hotel would be likely to perpetrate such an absurdity as the famous announcement, "Tous les jours, five o'clock a quatre heures." The practice of giving sweet wines with cakes in the afternoon is now looked upon as quite out of date.

UNION SQUARE SAN FRANCISCO

Feminine Intuition

By Louis Faran (From the French)

For some years past I had managed to invent an ingenious pretext for declining the annual invitation of my dear old aunt, the estimable Madame de Franges, to join her regular summer house-party at her picturesque chateau, the "Willows."

Frankly, I feared being bored. I was deeply attached to my aunt, however, and considered her one of the sweetest, dearest old ladies in the world.

My cousin, Elise, her little granddaughter, who was horribly spoiled, possibly because she was an orphan, I regarded as a mere thoughtless, happy, noisy child, a trifle too hoydenish to suit my esthetic tastes. She had grown up with the rapidity of a blade of grass, was extremely tall and slender, and naturally with me she did not count. As to the other highly respectable people with whom my dear aunt surrounded herself on these annual festivities, they rather bored than amused me.

This year, however, I accidentally learned that the list of invited guests had been slightly modified and that Madame Londel, "the beautiful Madame Londel," as she was called in Parisian society, would honor the "Willows" while monsieur took the water cure at Vichy. The news quite electrified me and instantly I sent a gushing note of acceptance to my unsuspicious aunt.

Madame Londel and myself were not strangers, for during the previous winter, I had been her most devoted cavalier at balls and receptions and our discreet little flirtation had been much discussed in the drawing-rooms over teacups, so I joyfully prepared to take my departure for the "Willows," Seine-et-Marne.

Arriving at the chateau, Madame de Franges greeted me with: "Ah, I know why you did not refuse to come this time!"

These words, I must confess, for the moment rather disconcerted me, particularly when she added: "It was Elise who discovered the reason for your honoring us this year.'

"Diable!" I said to myself. "Young girls in general are often worse than les enfants terribles, and on many occasions more to be feared."

As these uncomfortable reflections were flitting through my mind, Elise herself, who had overheard her grandmother's last words, with disheveled hair and almost breathless, came running down the stair-case like a rushing wind, and, with a prodigious bound, landed in the center of the spacious drawing-room.

"Yes, indeed, monsieur!" said she with a pert toss of her head and a general air of triumph. "Every other summer you have found us too tiresome to come, but this year you were very glad to accept our invitation and simply because—"and here she hesitated, but continued in a moment with a provokingly knowing look, "because you knew exactly whom you were going to meet."

For the life of me I couldn't understand how she had divined the true motive of my visit; so I watched her expression with renewed anxiety, and then, with the idea of throwing her off the track, I made a ghastly attempt to smile, and managed to say: "Truly, now—"

But she interrupted me, and with a smile of triumph, remarked:

"Yes, it is because we invited another beau just like yourself, your bosom friend Alfred de Mussielle!"

Delighted with herself and proud of her discernment, she burst out into a loud laugh, while I, who had not until that very moment known of de Musielle's coming, patted her on the shoulder, took her by the hand and congratulated her in the most profuse language on her rare penetration and extreme finesse. Poor little Elise!

I must acknowledge that the arrival of the beautiful Madame Londel gave me a disagreeable disappointment, and a rather severe shock. I had always met her in Paris in the evening, under the illusive light of a chandelier or a lamp; but now in the broad daylight under the glaring rays of a pitiless summer sun, notwithstanding the artificial aids so artistically used to preserve her beauty, she no longer looked the same. Gradually, however, the first disagreeable impression passed away and I became again her devoted cavalier, doing all I could to please her.

Some days later, as we were walking through the fields and had purposely fallen behind the rest of the party, I began in the most ardent manner to pour out the passionate love lyrics with which her charms had inspired me. She did not seem in the least offended with my boldness, but listened with apparent satisfaction as one quite accustomed to such declarations and graciously granted me a rendezvous for that very evening. Very mysteriously we agreed to meet in the conservatory, when all the rest of the highly respectable and tiresome people should be sleeping the sleep of innocence and boredom.

During the remainder of the day I experienced great difficulty in concealing the joy I felt at the prospective romantic meeting. We dined, of course—for how can love live without dining?—and at ten my aunt and her guests retired as usual to their apartments for the night. I waited with anxiety the approach of midnight, the hour fixed for our rendezvous.

At last, as the clock struck twelve, with the greatest precaution, I began to prepare to leave my room when I heard a very light knock at the door. I opened it, and in the shadow vaguely distinguished the outlines of a feminine form that proved to my great stupefaction to be Elise.

"Elise!" I exclaimed. "What are you doing here?"

She motioned me to be silent, placing her finger on her lips, and then, drawing closer, whispered:

"We must speak very low, for grandmama is asleep and it would frighten her dreadfully!" Then, eyeing me from head to foot, she said softly: "You were getting ready to go out; where were you going?"

I looked at her without answering, completely stupefied, and she continued in a low whisper:

"I was just coming to get you. I was unaware that you, also, knew. How did you find it out?" And without giving me time to answer, she added in a still more confidential tone: "After all, it really doesn't matter. Come, hurry, we have just time! But are you going unarmed? Take your revolver, please." I made a gesture of protest, but she said imperiously: "Take it! You must! It will be necessary if the robbers are numerous."

"The robbers!" I repeated to myself. "Then it is merely a question of robbers," and mechanically I obeyed. Going to my bureau drawer, I armed myself with my pistol. Then Elise blew out the light and I followed her in silence into the darkness of the hall and out into the garden.

I did not dare to ask an explanation. Happily for me, however, Elise began to explain without being questioned, and, suddenly turning toward me, she said:

"The place of meeting was in the conservatory, was it not?"

Completely nonplused and not knowing what to reply, I made a sort of inarticulate sound, which she accepted as an acquiescence and with her accustomed volubility continued: "Today, just a little after twelve, as I was getting wild flowers by the side of Old Mother Jeanne's cabin, I distinctly heard voices whispering: 'Yes, tonight, while the household are sleeping, we will meet at twelve in the conservatory'; I was so frightened that I did not dare to move or peep to see what the robbers looked like.

"My first thought was," she went on, speaking in a lower and more mysterious undertone, "that we were all to be assassinated; but after reflecting, I decided that this was absurd and that I was foolish to allow myself to be so easily alarmed. All day I endeavored to rid myself of that frightful conjecture, and even tonight I tried to put it out of my mind. But once in my own room, I was seized with a desire to investigate and to find out just what the mysterious whisperers meant to do. 'Just suppose,' said I to myself, 'that they should attack poor old grandmama!' After that I couldn't sleep, so I got up and dressed and came after you."

As Elise talked she hurried on, and I, her unwilling victim, meekly followed. Arrived at the hedge, she drew me behind a clump of shrubs. "Here," she whispered, "our view will be perfect, and we shall be unobserved. No matter which path they take, they will be obliged to pass there"—and she pointed to a lilac bush—"to reach the conservatory."

The situation had become quite ludicrous and, since I had discovered the sort of robbers we were in search of, I did not care to spend the rest of the night, revolver in hand, waiting for imaginary burglars. The only difficulty now presented was how to get rid of this suspicious girl. I begged her to return to the chateau, but she refused point-blank and would not listen to my logical pleadings.

"No," she declared, with the tenacity of a little terrier, "my resolution is irrevocable, and I shall remain here on watch."

Soon after, the expected happened and we heard a slight rustling of leaves. "Hush! Listen!" said Elise, trembling from head to foot with fright.

Then, in the clear starlight, we saw Madame Londel gowned in a long, trailing, white Grecian robe—undoubtedly got up for my special delectation—walking quickly toward the side of the conservatory. Stunned with surprise, Elise opened wide her great brown eyes and stood transfixed, watching her grandmother's guest until she had disappeared into the avenue of roses leading directly to the conservatory. For a few minutes she remained silent, trying to collect her thoughts, and then repeated half aloud to herself: "Madame Londel! Madame Londel in the conservatory!"

Suddenly the whole truth of the situation flashed upon her and, overcome by the comical side of the adventure, she burst into a loud laugh—a fresh, piercing, insolent laugh—which was irritatingly exasperating.

"Look here," I said, "Elise!"

But she would not listen to me. "Madame Londel!" she repeated. "Well, she is a sweet duck! Madame Londel and her rendezvous in the conservatory! Why, you could just as well have left your revolver in your drawer."

Lew Hanchett, Millionaire

As a result of his successful sale of the street railway system of San Jose and Santa Clara to the Southern Pacific Company, Lewis F. Hanchett enters the millionaire class. The deal was made with Kuhn, Loeb and Company, bankers for the Southern Pacific, who are very close-mouthed; so the consideration has not become public, but it is said that four millions were paid to Hanchett and to John Martin and Eugene de Sabla who were his associates in the deal. There is a story of hard work and independent endeavor behind the success which Hanchett has achieved. With his father he used to be in the cattle and mining business, without, however, making a big cleanup. Then Hanchett's sister married George Crocker and when Hanchett went into the street railway business in San Jose it was said that Crocker was backing him. As a matter of fact he never received assistance from his millionaire brother-in-law. He had many a day of hard sledding, but there was no appeal to his wealthy relation. Now that he has crowned his years of hard work he has only himself and a close personal friend to thank. The manner in which he got into the street railway business is interesting. The German Savings Bank of this city held a mortgage on the street railways of San Jose. J. C. Campbell, the lawyer, put up $30,000 as an option to cover this mortgage, but found that it was hard to interest capital. Finally he went to Hanchett and told him that if he would take the option, save Campbell his $30,000 and protect the bank, he might have the properties. Hanchett went to New York and tried to interest the Goulds, but without success. Then he went to Edwin Hawley, at that time a rising young railroad man, through whom the Southern Pacific got wind of his proposition. The big company tried to buy him out but he refused to sell. The Campbell option had only three days to run and Hanchett despaired of swinging the deal when his friend Fred Tillman came to his assistance and advanced the money. Just what Hanchett paid is not known, but he never regretted his persistence. He knew he had a good thing and at last his greatest expectations have been realized

The Forgetful Reformers

It does not necessarily follow that because a man is a reformer he has a better memory than other men. At least that is the deduction I make from a little thing that happened at Sacramento. At the beginning of the session there was the customary resolution to buy each member of the Legislature a set of codes. There was also the customary objection from those few members who thought that ten or fifteen sets would be amply sufficient and that the State should be spared the expense of buying one hundred and twenty sets at eighteen dollars a set. After considerable debate it was decided to buy a set for each member with the understanding that all the sets should be turned over to the State law library when the Legislature adjourned. Everybody seemed to be satisfied with this compromise. But alas! it seems that reformers have poor memories. At the end of the session the only legislators who remembered their promise were Senators Martinelli and Caminetti and Assemblyman Chandler. All the other—one hundred and seventeen in number—thoughtlessly packed the State's codes into their boxes and carted them away from Sacramento. However, as this was a reform Legislature, there is no doubt that just as soon as the slip of memory is called to the attention of the one hundred and seventeen members, they will lose no time in sending the books back to Sacramento where they belong. Any one who would doubt that is out of sympathy with reform and should be anathematized.

Who Is Spingarn's Friend?

President David Starr Jordan of Stanford will probably have his curiosity stimulated when he reads the statement of Professor Joel E. Spingarn, late head of the department of comparative literature of the Columbia University. Professor Spingarn lost his job because, it is said, he espoused the cause of Professor Peck who was dismissed for getting involved in a breach-of-promise scandal, but the Alumni News of Columbia University has said that Professor Spingarn was "relieved from academic duty" because he had not properly performed his work. Now comes the professor with a statement to the effect that he incurred President Butler's enmity on account of the interest that he took in Professor Peck's case. That part of his statement which will interest President Jordan is as follows: "When this controversy first aroused public attention a few weeks ago a professor of the Leland Stanford University warned me from the experience of his own university that the authorities of Columbia would attempt to evade the real issue by obscuring personalities." From this it is to be inferred that in the faculty of Stanford there is still a professor who has no very high regard for President Jordan. This professor evidently has been harking back to the Ross case. It has been supposed that everybody who sympathized with Professor Ross in that firebrand's controversy with President Jordan long since shook the academic dust of Palo Alto from his feet and hied himself to a more congenial atmosphere.

They Couldn't Feaze Si

From placid Centerville comes an interesting story concerning Colonel Roosevelt, Prexy Wheeler and a village blacksmith. The colonel and the prexy were motoring to Berkeley and their car broke down as they passed through the sleepy hamlet. They were told that the only man in town who could tinker their machine was Si, the village blacksmith, so they repaired to Si's smithy. They found him hard at work and stated their demand. "I'm busy," said Si, "and I have no time to fix you up." The prexy bristled. "But," he said, training an imperious look on the village smith, "I'm Benjamin Ide Wheeler, president of the University of California and this is Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, ex-president of the United States." Si shifted his quid, spat with deliberation and answered: "I don't give a hang who you are. Do you see those ploughshares? Well, I promised Bill Harrison to have 'em ready tomorrow morning and I'm going to have 'em for Bill on time." And Si went on with his work.

Love's Pilgrimage

With those readers who pronounce Upton Sinclair's novel, "Love's Pilgrimage," erotic I take issue. The book does not rise to the plane of eroticism. Mr. Sinclair could not be erotic howsoever hard he tried. By temperament he is ascetic, and from lack of imagination he is incapable of depicting the manners and modes of impassioned sensuality. Mr. Sinclair is a realist with the talent of the painter who can reproduce what he sees. He fancies that by accuracy realism may be vindicated. He has yet to learn that not to know the difference between an ass and a horse is a less serious matter than to paint either animal inartistically. In "Love's Pilgrimage" Mr. Sinclair is inartistic inasmuch as he wandered beyond the limit of license. He has introduced his readers to a husband and wife for the purpose of laying bare sentiments, feelings and conduct which husbands and wives hold sacred. One cannot read the book without feeling like a Peeping Tom, and as the instincts of a Peeping Tom are happily extremely rare there is not much danger of the book being widely read. It is my sincere advice to my readers not to permit their curiosity to impel them to the purchase of this book. If any there be who have a pruriency to be stimulated they will suffer disappointment if to gratify their passion they attempt to read this novel. It is nothing more than nauseous stuff, filthy trash. You may enjoy Petronius or Apuleius, Boccaccio or Rabelais, but even so you will not enjoy Sinclair. By this novel he has achieved nothing more than the distinction of having written a disgusting book which the most unsqueamish will fail to find diverting or entertaining. Sinclair has made the mistake of attempting entertainment beyond the bounds of art. His is not the sin of outspokeness; not the vice of obscenity but of profanation. Treatment may justify choice, as we have learned from Rabelais, who had the skill to purge even grossness of offence; but Sinclair is a writer against whom the Paradise of license has been barred by angel hands.

The Importance of Works

Two newspapers are taking our new Senator, John D. Works, very seriously. I refer to the Fresno Republican and the Los Angeles Express. As Mr. Rowell of the Republican and Mr. Earl of the Express are responsible for foisting Works upon the State they may be pardoned for looking with enthusiasm upon their handiwork. "Chet" Rowell finds that the reopening of the Lorimer case has "done one thing for California." What is this one thing? "It has given Senator John D. Works a national reputation in his first week." It is not every Senator who wins a national reputation in his first week, so we are interested. But not knowing just how that reputation was acquired, we read further: "Every newspaper in the United States published Senator La Follette's resolution for a new inquiry, with the name of Senator Works leading the proposed committee." We are properly impressed. To have one's name published broadcast as the leader of a proposed committee is to win a national reputation. There can be no doubt about it because "Chet" reiterates it: "The unique luck of it is in having his recognition come in the first week on a matter which automatically advertises it and gives the recipient of the recognition a national reputation at one leap." Here we have a formula worth remembering. Let us enrich out memories with the fact that national reputations are won at one leap by automatic advertisement. Hats off to the unique logic of "Chet." Mr. Earl is so impressed with the importance of Works that he has detached a member of his staff, Mr. Eddie Dickson, to wait upon the footsteps of the new Senator and properly pressagent his achievements. Dickson is an enthusiast, but his enthusiasm is not reserved for Works alone. It is extended to all the Progressives. Two days after Dickson arrived in Washington he wired to the Express: "Progressive Republicanism is in the ascendant in the National Legislature. One has only to glance over the faces of members of the new Senate to become instantly convinced of that fact." If Eddie sees all that at the first glance what will he spy after a good long look?

He Remembered His Friends

I saw Malcolm McDonald in the lobby of the Palace Hotel a few days ago and heard with considerable pleasure that his recent mining investments are going to put him in the millionaire class. Here is a man who deserves to be rich because he uses money to give pleasure to others. It was ten years ago that Malcolm McDonald made his first cleanup in Nevada mines, and I will never forget one night in the bar of the old Palace when he handed to Charles Morris, another Nevada miner, ten thousand dollars in crisp new bills. Morris looked at the money with amazement and interrogation depicted on his face. "Charlie," explained McDonald, "you have always been a mighty good friend to me and I want you to take this gift as a little token of my esteem." McDonald also dug up the names and addresses of his old playmates and school day friends and sent them sums ranging from one to five thousand dollars.

The Richest Oil Well

It is so easy to make a fortune in oil nowadays that the making of one is listed among the commonplaces. Oil magnates have ceased to be distinguished from the common herd. New fountains of oil burst from the profounds of earth and inundate the circumjacent fields without even so much as inspiring a scare head in a daily paper. In the State where once glistered the fruit of the gardens of Hesperides now flow streams of golden oil and the world lifts not an eyelid. Less than a month ago the most remarkable oil well in the history of the oil-producing industry began to spurt its precious treasure, and the only emotion it has induced is felt by the fortunate owners. This is the Mammoth Oil Company's well at North Midway. Not long ago the Lakeview well was considered a marvel. It is not to be compared with the Mammoth for the quality of its oil or the profits which it poured into the pockets of its owners. The Mammoth began to gush on March 26 at the rate of thirty thousand barrels a day, and on April 26 the Mammoth company will receive the largest check that was ever paid in this country for oil production in one month. Estimating at the present ratio of production this check will approximate $120,000. The Mammoth has not hit the high-water mark for production, but owing to its quality, being 26 gravity oil, and the exceptionally favorable circumstances attending the tapping and piping of it the owners have been exceedingly fortunate. Within forty-eight hours after the column of oil made its first appearance the Standard Oil Company had three pipe lines leading to the well and the Mammoth company had a contract for sixty-five cents a barrel. The principal stockholders are Clarence Berry, president; William Maguire, vice-president; Charles H. Holbrook Jr., Frank Berry of Alaska and Louis M. Hoefler.

"Why should the spirit of mortal be proud?" quoted the impassioned actor. Then he paused a moment to let it take effect.

"Well," spoke up a half-inebriated man in the audience, "I'll be the goat. Why should it?"

Plumas Will Be Wet

J. E. Sexton, assistant to the manager of the Quincy and Western Railway, brings to the city the cheering news that Plumas County after a protracted "dry" spell, will go "wet" again on May 15. The people of Plumas got tired of the saloons on account of the undesirable character of the men who ran them in and about Quincy. But now they feel that the saloon keepers have learned a lesson and will conduct their places properly. One of the supervisors who voted to make the county "wet" again is a man who has never tasted liquor in his life. He declared that liquor had never done him any harm and he didn't see why it should harm other people! One of the things which helped the "wets" was the discovery by a newspaper editor of a blind pig in the meeting room of the supervisors. He told in his paper how the sheriff came in to get a drink —and got it! I believe that the district attorney was quite wrought up about the thing and expressed the opinion in private that the sheriff acted indiscreetly! But after May 15 there will be no occasion for blind pigs in Plumas, in the supervisors' room or elsewhere.

A Hot Campaign in Butte

A friend who came down from Oroville a few days ago told me that the citizens of that interesting town are having the time of their rustic lives over the municipal campaign which is now waging merrily. The present mayor, C. E. Kusel, is opposed for reelection by one Paul Reicker. Reicker added to the gayety of the fight by issuing a pamphlet in which he declared that Mayor Kusel had not fulfilled his promises to the people and also that he was lined up with the water company and the liquor people. Whereupon Mayor Kusel came out in a newspaper interview and vociferated that Reicker was a fugitive from the law and that he was wanted in Portland for a felonious assualt. Reicker retorted with a circular affirming that Mayor Kusel was the owner of disorderly houses in the Oroville red light district and therefore a lawbreaker. At last accounts, said my friend, Reicker was out looking for the mayor and vowing ominously that when he found His Honor there would be no waste of words.

Kent's Committees

The Honorable Bill Kent of Kentfield will not be overburdened with committee work during the current session of Congress. He will have plenty of time to attend to his correspondence and to indulge in the distribution of seeds among the voters of the second district. For Bill has been placed on two committees which will not call for the overexertion of his tremendous intellectual abilities. In the parlance of the sidewalk Bill has been handed "a couple of lemons." He was given the tail-end place on the committee on industrial arts and expositions and was made next to tail-ender on the committee on reform in civil service. As the award of the World's Fair to San Francisco disposed of the only important business before the first committee and as the second committee has no particular program of activity, Bill will be relieved of the worries with which the members of working committees are afflicted. His failure to land desirable committee places is traceable to his long feud with Congressman Mann of Illinois, the minority leader. As I said last week, it is believed in Washington that that feud started when Kent was avid of Mann's seat and failed to satisfy his ambition. When the minority in Congress organized, Kent wanted to have a committee on committees make the assignments. but the prevailing sentiment was in favor of allowing the minority leader to do this. So Kent became peevish. He expressed no preferences, made no request; in fact, showed no interest in the matter. Naturally Mann did not go out of his way to berth him comfortably.

His Constituents Are Sore

There is a lot of dissatisfaction among Kent's constituents over his committee assignments and the purported reasons for his failure to land something impressive. This dissatisfaction is voiced in the largest city of Kent's bailiwick by the Sacramento Union. The Union is not in sympathy with Kent, although it did not oppose his candidacy. So its comments must be regarded as unfriendly. There can be no doubt however that these comments represent a sentiment that is being expressed in many parts of the second district. The Union points out that Kent's insurgent tendencies cannot be offered in excuse for his bad committee assignments because insurgents like Madison of Kansas and Lenroot of Wisconsin were given important berths. "If he could have been appointed to the committee on irrigation, public lands, agriculture, immigration or some other body having first consideration of matters vitally affecting the interests of his constituency, he would be in a position to do effective work," says the Union. "Evidently Mr. Kent has by some particularly offensive course caused himself to be all but completely ignored in the organization of the House. Perhaps a reminder that Mr. Kent is not in the national capitol merely to perform as a partisan might be in order." And the Union refers tartly to Kent's two committees, "one of which never meets, while the other's work was completed at the last session."

Our Lame Ducks Provided For

Sometimes it pays to be a lame duck. When a statesman retires or is retired from the national legislative body, all the world is darkened for him for a while, but there are apt to be compensations. Samuel G. Blythe has been telling in the Saturday Evening Post how Frank Flint and Jim McLachlan "fell on the feather bed." "One of the finest and softest mattresses ever contrived for ex-statesmen to fall upon," he says, "is the National Monetary Commission of which ex-Senator Aldrich is the head, front, center and all the works." The salary attached to the job is seventy-five hundred dollars a year and the duties are not onerous. "The only financial transaction that will worry them or need worry them will be to draw their seventy-five hundred dollars a year each. That is as far as they will go; but their connection with the commission will enable them to live in Washington, if they want to, part of the time—and that is much, for after a statesman gets the Washington habit it is very hard to reform." On this gold-fleeced feather bed ex-Senator Flint and ex-Congressman Jim McLachlan landed when they fell out of the legislative body. Of course they may earn those salaries of theirs, but Blythe is sceptical, judging from past performances of the Commission. "The studies this band of financial experts has been making of our currency and banking systems are of inestimable value to the country—that is, the studies they have been making would be of inestimable value to the country if they had made any. The fact is, the National Monetary Commission is a joke, when its membership is considered." I doubt whether Frank Flint and Jim McLachlan see the joke.

The Bank of Shasta Failure

When the Bank of Shasta closed its doors a few weeks ago there was apparent studied effort to hold former Bank Superintendent Alden Anderson responsible for much of the misfortune of the depositors. It was said that he learned weeks before he went out of office that the bank was in straitened circumstances, and that he should have taken prompt and summary action. Mr. Anderson being in Europe and unaware of what was occurring here was not heard from. In his absence but one side of the story was accessible, and that side was exploited for all it was worth to his discredit. Meantime the truth has been coming to light, and in justice to Mr. Anderson it should be given publicity, but the newspapers seldom recant. However they have modified their criticisms. The truth is that Anderson had no knowledge of the looseness of the bank's business management until after the first improper transaction by which its condition was impaired. Before that time there was nothing for him to do. He had no way of anticipating a hazardous loan. As soon as he learned of the loan he attempted to repair the damage, to protect the depositors and stockholders by obtaining security for the loan and by compelling a change of management to guard against a repetition of misconduct. If he could have accomplished his purpose all would have been well, and the probabilities at the time were that success would attend his efforts. The course he took was the only course that sound judgment dictated. It was the course that gave promise of averting a disaster that threatened a whole community. According to his lights, the only lights available at the time, it would have been folly not to attempt to protect the depositors by the business method which he adopted. Eventually it became imperative to close the bank, but that circumstance does not prove that Anderson did not act wisely when he first learned of the misconduct of Banker Bush. During Mr. Anderson's term of office he rendered more efficient service than was ever rendered by any of his predecessors. He did not go about seeking publicity for his achievements, but the bankers of the State knew that he handled several difficult problems with great ability, and that by his conscientious devotion to duty he caused the rehabilitation of more than one shaky institution and protected people who are to this day unaware of their obligations to him.

George Sterling's New Book

There are three longer poems in George Sterling's new book, "The House of Orchids and Other Poems," which has just come from the publishing house of that friend of all California writers, Alexander M. Robertson. They are "The House of Orchids" itself, inspired by the poet's visit to the beautiful home of Mrs. Joseph B. Coryell; "Duandon"; and "An Altar of the West" which embodies the writer's broodings at Point Lobos, the southern boundary of Carmel Bay. Of these "The House of Orchids" is pretty well known already. It was first published in the Town Talk of two Christmases ago. What more need be said of it than was said by a shy singer whose poetry will some day be acclaimed as it deserves: "'The House of Orchids' is as rich in loveliness as are orchids themselves. There is a veil over the lines heavy with the atmosphere in which such flowers thrive." Some of its lines suggest the sustained haunting of Coleridge's Kubla Khan. No doubt the verdict of the cultivated will be that it stands with the best that Sterling has done—and that is saying much. "Duandon" is a poem permeated with exquisite sentiment and bearing lightly a tale that is transfigured with the beauty of the sea and sea-shells. Throughout the whole volume, by the way, Sterling's increasing preoccupation with the sea is evident. He shares for old ocean the passion that distinguished Shelley and Swinburne. Evident too in this volume is Sterling's increasing thoughtfulness. Mere beauty contents him no more; there must be a significance in the beauty he celebrates. This broadening and deepening of his inspiration is well illustrated by "The Evanescent," one of the most precious jewels of the present collection. Occasionally, as in the sonnet "The Moth of Time," there is an agnostic, almost a cynical note which, let us hope, is only a phase of Sterling's development, to be outgrown in his robuster thinking.

The Personal Note

The personal note is struck many times. "A Character" which may or may not be Sterling's warm friend Jack London, is not so much a characterization as a celebration of one seen through the rose-glasses of enthusiastic admiration. "The Apothecary's" is in a light vein that is not very well known to Sterling's readers, though his friends have had many charming reminders of it. The poems addressed to Ambrose Bierce, to Hall B. Rand, to Vernon L. Kellogg, to Charles Warren Stoddard and to Nora May French have a peculiar richness of beauty for those who catch the accent of sincerity that beats in every line; for strangers they have beauty sufficient of the purely poetic kind. The poem to that unhappy singer Miss French runs thus:

The Ashes in the Sea

N. M. F.

Whither, with blue and pleading eyes,—
  Whither, with cheeks that held the light
Of winter's dawn on cloudless skies,
    Evadne, was thy flight?

Such as a sister's was thy brow;
  Thy hair seemed fallen from the moon—
Part of its radiance, as now
    Of shifting tide and dune.

Did Autumn's grieving lure thee hence,
  Or silence ultimate beguile?
Ever our things of consequence
    Awakened but thy smile.

Is it with thee that ocean takes
  A stranger sorrow to its tone?
With thee the star of evening wakes
    More beautiful, more lone?

For wave and hill and sky betray
  A subtle tinge and touch of thee;
Thy shadow lingers in the day,
    Thy voice in winds to be.

Beauty—hast thou discovered her
  By deeper seas no moons control?
What stars have magic now to stir
    Thy swift and wilful soul?

Or may thy heart no more forget
  The grievous world that once was home,
That here, where love awaits thee yet,
    Thou seemest yet to roam?

For most, far-wandering, I guess
  Thy witchery on the haunted mind,
In valleys of thy loneliness,
    Made clean with ocean's wind.

And most thy presence here seems told,
  A waif of elemental deeps,
When, at its vigils unconsoled,
    Some night of winter weeps.

His Love of Jewels

Sterling's love of jewels which was strikingly manifested in his "A Wine of Wizardry" is once more shown in the new volume. There is hardly a page from which gems do not scintillate to the imagination of the reader. One cannot dip into the book without being reminded of a treasure box of precious stones. "Clean from kingdoms of the sapphire vast," "shuddering blaze of leaping emerald and cold chrysoprase," "like some king-ruby ravished from a throne," "in jasper evenings of the sea" are instances of how his poet's eye clothes the ocean with gems. "Beyond that realm of jade and jade-bound bays he saw the sapphire fields of ocean blaze; heard the alliant waters chant their rune before the turquoise battlements of noon" is a characteristic stanza. In "The House of Orchids" there is not so much of this as one might expect, but we have "crystal in the twilights of the moon," "evanescent pearls," "baleful rubies," "her ghostly pearl" and "bowls of jade." And so on through the volume. It may be questioned whether so persistent a reliance for beauty on the hues of jewels does not rather weaken than strengthen a poet's imagination. But perhaps this is a theme for hypercritical controversy. For another kind of controversy there is the new chapter for the Book of Job, a tour de force that cannot be treated slightingly, though it will naturally be studied rather as a poet's exercise than as an item in his contributions to original verse.

He—"My dear, I don't want you to wear that dress you had on last night again."

She (indifferently)—"What's the matter with it?

He—"Er—Well, Paddington came up to me and said: 'I can see your wife's back from Paris.'"

The Preacher and the Ladies

Rev. Charles Aked is making a great hit with the ladies by his ardent espousal of woman's suffrage. They predict for him a great future in San Francisco on account of his attitude on the suffrage question. But the other preachers in town are in a state of panic. They are afraid that this clergyman who says that denominations are nothing to him and who regards creed as a triviality will become the star pulpit performer and increase the vacant spaces in their pews. Dr. Rader, I am told, has already expressed himself on the subject. And Dr. Rader's acquaintances predict that he will lose some sleep in quest of a hobby for a counter-agency.

They Can't Ride on Passes

Recent restrictive legislation relating to railways enacted by the Interstate Commerce Commission and by the California Legislature has created a curious situation for some of our well known men. On account of a ruling by the Interstate body a stock holder in one railway corporation cannot use a pass over the lines of another railway. That is hard enough on the men who have never been in the habit of paying for their transportation, but our recent legislature complicated matters by passing a law which prohibits a shipper from accepting a pass on a railway with which he transacts shipping business. The men who have been embarrassed by the application of this law are J. C. Queale of Minneapolis and Berkeley, president of the McCloud River Railway; Frank G. Drum, president of the Yosemite Valley Railway; T. S. Bullock, president of the Yosemite Valley Railway; and G. W. Scott, president of the Yreka Railway. All of these men are interested in lumber or other corporations which ship over the rails which they own; so they cannot use passes on their own lines!

Oza Waldrop Heard From

The innumerable theatregoers in our midst who remember Oza Waldrop for her fine work in ingenue roles at the Alcazar (where she preceded Frances Starr), will be pleased to learn that she is doing splendidly in New York. It is doubly interesting to chronicle this fact at the present time because her brother, Uda Waldrop, has won particular praise here by his piano playing as the accompanist of Rheinhold von Warlich, the Russian lieder singer. Four years ago Uda Waldrop played the organ in a church across the bay and spent a great deal of his spare time at the Press Club where his playing was a feature in many jinks. He left San Francisco and has been a great deal abroad, winning a success in concert work which is as satisfying as that won by his pretty sister on the stage in New York. In a recent issue of the New York Telegraph I came across quite a tribute to Oza's ability and, incidentally, to the Alcazar. The writer quotes a conversation with a "renowned first-nighter." It is worth quoting. "That artist, Oza Waldrop," said the man who knows the European theater backwards and is not without qualifications for passing on Chinese plays or the drama dances of the South Sea Islands, "must have been trained at the Comedie Francaise." "Not a bit of it," answered the writer; "she came out of a California stock company." "Then I wish I could banish half the stars I have seen on Broadway this season to California stock," rejoined the expert, "until they acquired the finesse that enables that tiny morsel of temperament and talent to construct a definite and luminous characterization out of ten speeches, a rag of chiffon and a pair of shoe strings." "Which," concludes the writer, "is about all the material that dramatists find it necessary to give this clever little girl."

Ruth St. Denis and "Dick" Tully

When Ruth St. Denis was here she told one of her interviewers that she wanted a great play. "My ambition, my dream," she said, "is a great drama of motion and color which will have what I call my dancing as a pivot on which to revolve. Into this drama I would have woven some great spiritual truth that I might express in a series of dances, some great appealing idea like the attainment of Samahadi by the Yogis of India." That's a big order to fill but Miss St. Denis has found a Californian who has undertaken to fill it. To whom do I refer but to Richard Walton Tully, our own "Dick"! Dick is writing a play for Miss St. Denis. Naturally it will not be like his previous efforts. Neither his first effort which was afterwards belascoated with local color to make "The Rose of the Rancho" nor his "Cupid the Cow-Punch" would offer much opportunity for Miss St. Denis and her pink tootsy-wootsies. I await with interest the production of what I can naturally regard as "Dick's" magnum opus.

Evening Dress at the Play

Londoners are asking each other whether the customs of Paris, Vienna, New York, or Berlin in regard to dispensing with evening dress in the best seats in the theatres will be adopted in British playhouses, and the old rule for "dress" be replaced by the Continental one for "tweeds." The suggestion first came from George Alexander, the actor, who says that a person wishing to pay for a good seat should not be admonished to wear full dress. His views are enthusiastically sympathized with by Sir Herbert Tree and Cyril Maude, and the latter points out that a change should be made this year, at any rate, on account of the visitors who are to be in London for the coronation. There are others, however, who still believe in the good old custom of dressing for the best seats. These rightly declare that a man in evening dress does not like to sit beside one in tweeds, who might just have come off the train. And, most important of all arguments is that which points to the appropriateness of evening dress for a man who accompanies a woman in proper evening attire. George Grossmith Jr. is among those who are emphatically against abolition of evening dress. London theatre audiences, he points out, are acknowledged to be the best dressed in the world. And it is his opinion that they should not give up their position

Why Europeans Die of Plague

The special correspondent of the London Times at Kharbin, (he is a medical man), seems to think that no European need die of the plague now raging in Manchuria if the proper precautions are taken. He writes: "Evidence as to the value of inoculation is inconclusive, but evidence is overwhelming that nearly every case of death among the Europeans was preventible, and there have only been fifty deaths among a European population in the infected areas of North Manchuria of not less than 60,000. Astonishing indifference was manifested in the face of danger. Dr. Mesny, the brilliant French doctor who died, was examining unmasked the chest sounds of a patient with his naked ear when the patient coughed into his face and thus gave him his death. Dr. Michel, the Russian doctor whose death shocked the community, believing himself immune, showed a reckless disregard of precautions. Among the Russian sanitary corps, recruited as they were from the lowest classes, there was a conspicuous absence of precautions, the men drinking the spirit given them to disinfect their hands after moving the dead. When Pere Metillot was struck down in Hulanfu (a large Chinese town fifteen miles distant) his fellow-missionary from a neighboring district, Pere Delpal, came to nurse him. They had been friends from boyhood Pere Delpal kissed his dying comrade on the lips, was infected, and died in three days."

All the Speed He Wanted

"Drive like the deuce!" shouted Smith, springing into the taxi.

With a lurch the car darted forward, and away they went like lightning through the fog. Crash! They took off the wheel of a passing wagon. Hi! Hi! They missed flattening out a small child by two-ninths of a hair. Clang! They upset a milk-cart. People shouted, constables impotently held up their hands as the taxi dashed up one street and down another, taking corners on two wheels, and threatening every lamppost with destruction.

At last, after half an hour's furious racing, they slowed up in a narrow thoroughfare, and Smith poked his head out of the window.

"Are we nearly there?" he asked breathlessly.

The chauffeur turned in his seat and shouted: "Where did you want to go, sir?"

"What's wrong?" maw ast.

"This is one of the best joaks I ever saw," paw says.

"Lissen and I'll read it to you: 'Why is the mistake of a dockter not as bad as that of a dentust?' Do you no?" paw ast.

"No," maw told him.

"Becoz," paw red, "one fills six feet and the other fills an aker."

"How do they do that?" maw ast.

"Becoz they make A mistake," paw ansered.

"Which does?" maw says.

"Both of them," paw told her. That's why the mistake of the dockter izzent as Bad as the dentust's."

"Why not?" says maw.

"The dockter only fills Six feat," paw told her, "and the dentust fills An aker."

"I don't understand About the feat," maw sed. "Why does he Fill six of them and What does he fill them with?" Paw began to look kind of glassy out of his eyes, and he Red the joak again to himself So he would be sure he Didn't make enny mistake. Then he says:

"Why, you see if a dockter would make a mistake it mite be fatle, and so he would fill six feat of earth with a man because the man would Be about six feat tall you no."

"I don't see mutch to laugh about such a joak," maw told him. "May be it mitcn't be a man at all, Or he mite be short."

"Oh, well," paw says, "they just pretend He would be a six-footer so as to Make it come in with the aker."

"Why do they want to do that?" maw ast.

"That's the joak," paw says.

"Which is?" maw told him.

"Why, the aker," paw ansered.

"Where are they enny Joak about that?" maw ast.

"The dentust fills it, you no," paw sed, but he Didn't seme to be very sure about it By that time.

"Yes," maw says, "but you red that he made A mistake."

"Don't you no what an aker is?" paw ast. "A tooth that You fill is an aker, and They have akers of ground."

"But where does the mistake come in?" maw sed.

"Why he Fills the rong one," paw ansered, Wiping his forrid and kind of looking Around like if he was trying to see If the escape was all cut off.

"Well, then how does He fill the aker," maw ast, "if the tooth he Fills is the rong one And duzzent ake?"

Then paw got up and tore the almannick in two and Threw it in the waist basket and sed:

"They are no use Trying to bring enny sunshine into This fambly. Let's drop the subject. The man that rote the joak Was a fool, and the one that printed it Was a worse one, but I'm not going to rong Either one of them by unjust suspishens. Mebby they didn't ever try to tell it To a woman."

A Lillian Russell Story

Speaking of a saving sense of humor, Lillian Russell has retained hers over a chaotic waste of one-night stands, too. A letter from Miss Russell recounts an encounter between that bright-orbed star and a village Milton who was introduced to her somewhere between Enid, Oklahoma, and Waco, Texas, as a "literary young man." "Dazzled by my fur coat," writes Miss Russell, "the 'literary young man, was smitten with a fearful silence which I hadn't the nerve to break. Finally he tore his gaze away from my chinchilla and blurted forth in an agony of intellectual unrest: 'I think Shakespeare is a real nice writer, don't you?'

"I answered 'pretty good but he hasn't done much lately worth bragging about!'

"I am still haunted by the look in that man's eyes!"

"Isn't there any way to cut down a butcher's bill?" asked Tightwad, sarcastically addressing his meat man.

"Why, yes, Mr. Tightwad," said the latter. "You might pay a little on account now and then."

Society Women in Business

Another bright society woman has entered the business world. I refer to Mrs. Fred Tallant, the sister of Mrs. Vincent Whitney who has taken up her late husband's insurance business. Mrs. Tallant was beautiful Helen Landers, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Landers and her husband who died last year belonged to the well known Tallant family. His sisters are Mrs. Stephen Brodie of Detroit and Mrs. J. J. Brice and his father was a pioneer banker of San Francisco. Mrs. Tallant has brains with her beauty and her friends who include Mrs. George Lent, a bridesmaid at her wedding, Mrs. Osgood Hooker and Mrs. George Pope are delighted with her success. Another society woman who is making a success of insurance is Miss Cora Smedberg, who is identified socially with the Burlingame set. Mrs. Randell Hunt whose daughter Natalie announced her engagement to Herbert Baker during the week is in real estate and Miss Sally Maynard also dealt in real estate for a time. There is a large circle of business women in society who will welcome Mrs. Tallant to their midst.

Fred Knight's Operatic Hopes

I am assured on good authority that Fred Knight is to seek success on the operatice stage. He is studying deligently with this end in view having taken up dramatic art while he masters the roles of German opera. Mrs. Knight who is in Europe wholly approves of his plan and the Family Club is watching the future star's progress in his ambition. Knight is the son of attorney George Knight and possesses a fine baritone voice that has been heard frequently in Bohemian and Family Club revels. He has been urged to adopt a professional career by such a judge as David Bispham, but only in the past weeks seriously determined to follow the advice. Mrs. Knight who believes her husband has a great future is related by marriage to Princess David Kawananakoa who was Miss Campbell of Honolulu. The mother of the Princess took for her second husband Colonel Sam Parker and his son was the first husband of Mrs. Fred Knight. He left her a fortune at his death and Mrs. Knight was a wealthy young widow when she married the young San Francisco clubman.

Society Suffrage and Dr. Aked

Leaders of the suffragette party drew class distinctions, I am told, at the meeting to hear Dr. Aked last Tuesday and there is a great deal of dissatisfaction in the ranks. The boxes were all reserved for society women who were invited to fill them while the real workers of the cause were relegated to the body of the house. In the boxes were Mrs. A. H. Voohies, Mrs. Kate Henry, Mrs. Ed Dimond, Mrs. Ben Dibblee, Mrs. Jimmie Robinson, Miss Elena Robinson and more of their set who have been luke warm in their support of suffrage and had been gathered from the highways to lend the distinction of their presence. Dr. Aked made a fine impression with his indorsement of the American woman. He piled the flattery on thick and it was all welcome. Dr. Aked waxed witty at the expense of men in his story of the woman who told the man that no woman had had seven devils cast out of her in the Bible and to whom he responded, "No they are still in you." It is an old story that we have heard before.

They Might Have Eloped

Some of the more romantic people in society were a little disappointed when formal accouncement of the engagement of beautiful Mary Keeney to Talbot Walker was made. These romantic ones secretly hoped that Miss Keeney would elope with the man of her choice. There was absolutely no reason why she should do anything of the sort, for both are in the same set and the marriage will be a perfectly satisfactory one to both families. But it seems that when Helene Irwin, Charlotte and Emily Wilson, Florence Hopkins and Mary Keeney were at school together they made a schoolgirl vow that when the time for marriage came it would be by way of elopement. Emily Wilson kept her vow by eloping with Orville Pratt in spectacular fashion. Then Charlotte Wilson wedded George Cadwalader in conventional fashion and the romantic ones were disappointed. Helene Irwin broke her schoolgirl vow when she neglected to elope with Templeton Crocker. Now Mary Keeney has shown the same sort of weakness. The only remaining hope of the romantic ones is that Florence Hopkins will save the honor of the coterie by dashing off somewhere and getting married with all the sensational secrecy one reads about in romantic novels. But she is just as likely to succumb to the influence of formality and convention as the others.

How Styles Do Change!

The modes change with revolutionary completeness. Also our insular possessions are extremely remote. The two propositions do not seem to have much in common but they have. For my present purpose they must be regarded as intimately related. Two years ago when the charming and vivacious Engracia Critcher married Lieutenant Freyer of the navy, (their romance growing out of the coming of the fleet around the world), the styles for women were quite different from those which prevail today. Women were wearing large pompadours, small hats and gowns of a cut that now seems alien and queer. Naturally, when Lieutenant Freyer was ordered to desolate Guam, his bride accompanied him; naturally too the charming Engracia took away with her the fashions of the moment. Now, down in Guam, the fashions do not respond to the feverish influence of the restless modistes; they remain fixed for many years at a time. It is so very far away, you see. So when Mrs. Freyer returned to this city recently with her husband, she still wore the extinct modes of two years ago—pompadour, hat, gown and all. Her friends were astonished when they saw her, but speedily realized the situation. A hurried run to the modiste and the milliner in a closed taxi remedied the defects in Mrs. Freyer's wardrobe.

Mrs. Casey Stricken

Mrs. Maurice Casey who was stricken with paralysis while on a visit to San Jose this week is one of the best known women in society. She was formerly Mrs. Dillon, the mother of Kate Dillon who with Mrs. Henry Crocker inherited the millions of the late Mrs. McLaughlin.

Maude Fay and the Prince

Before despatching our felicitations to Miss Maude Fay in Munich let us wait and see whether it is true that she is engaged to marry Prince Luitpold of Bavaria. These long-distance stories are not always confirmed. In a way I should be sorry to learn that the story was correct. From all I can learn Miss Fay has a fine operatic career ahead of her and it would be spoiled if she married into the Bavarian royal family. No Wittelsbach would allow his princess to appear on the stage. Of course a woman's personal happiness is apt to be more to her than her operatic ambitions, but still it is always too bad to see an artist retire to private life when the future of his or her art is still full of promise. Think of the case of Mary Anderson, for instance. In connection with the story of Miss Fay's engagement it is interesting to recall what she wrote in a letter to this paper more than a year ago. "I am quite content with my social position here in Munich," she said; "a position which I realize is quite unique—I being an American (I prefer saying Californian) and on the stage—two conditions rather difficult for conservative foreigners to accept."

She Didn't Get Him

From New York comes the story of the grievous disappointment of a gay and ambitious grass-widow from this city whose engagement to a son of a New York millionaire was reported in the despatches some months ago. This woman is her own press agent, and she has had great success in promoting publicity for herself as her first husband learned much to his embarrassment about the time that he found life with her to be unbearable and hied himself to Reno for salvation. On the income that she has since enjoyed combined with her captivating graces she has been able to cut a great swath both in Paris and New York. For a time it seemed as if she really had snared the son of the millionaire, but a short time ago he broke the news gently to her in her apartments in Fifth avenue that the fascination had worn off, and she immediately gave a melodramatic performance a la Leslie Carter that startled the whole hotel. She was ordered to leave, and did so leaving her trunks behind to secure her bill. When last heard from she was on her way to Europe.

Charles Rollo Peters' Sorrow

Charles Rollo Peters, the distinguished California artist, has been receiving a great many letters of condolence from his friends here. Recently in New York Peters lost a young son who was undergoing the dread mastoid operation and he is nearly heartbroken. Sorrow has come in superabundance into the life of this artist. His first wife who was beautiful Kitty Murphy died quite suddenly. Then he lost a son in a shocking accident. And now he has lost a second son. The hearts of his friends go out to him in sincere sympathy.

Mrs. Elkins' Engagement

When Mrs. Katherine Felton Elkins went East a couple of weeks ago her friends supposed it was to attend to business affairs. Judge their surprise when they learned of her engagement to William Nelson. I'm told by her intimate friends that the prospective groom is well nigh sixty years of age. He is a prominent lawyer and a man of considerable means. Many were equally surprised when they learned that Mrs. Elkins would by the terms of her late husband's will be obliged to relinquish the Elkins' wealth in the event of her remarrying. To the older friends of Mrs. Katherine Elkins this did not come as a surprise. They were fully aware that her first marriage was far from happy and that she was not a favorite with her late father-in-law who first accumulated his wealth as a wholesale butcher and later owned the Chicago street railroads. Mrs. Elkins' two children Felton Elkins and Miss Marie Louise were left over one million apiece and are most devoted to their mother. Mrs. Elkins as Miss Katherine Felton met young Elkins, a young Harvard graduate, while on a visit to Washington with her father who was at the time United States Senator from California. The wedding which took place in the little church in Menlo Park some twenty-five years ago was a society event. Mrs. Elkins belonged to the set which included Miss Hattie Crocker (now Mrs. C. B. Alexander of New York), Miss Nettie Tubbs (now Mrs. J. S. Oyster), Miss Bessie Kittle (now Mrs. William Hinckley Taylor), Miss Flora Low and Miss Bessie Slade (now Mrs. William Mayo Newhall). The death of Senator Felton's wife took place when his two children Katherine (Mrs. Elkins) and Charles Felton were very young. They were reared by their aunt Mrs. George Loomis, the sister of the late Mrs. C. N. Felton. After the marriage of Mrs. Elkins and Mr. Nelson they will reside in Philadelphia.

"The Acme of Snobbery"

"The Jeems Yellowplushes of the San Francisco society columns are snobs in their published writings every one of them, although as individuals they are very different outside of the newspaper offices." Here is a sentence culled from the editorial column of a San Jose paper which has given me pause. The editorial in which it was set down bore the title, "The Acme of Snobbery" and the writer points his moral from the published story that the Princess Kawananakoa of Honolulu had been "commanded" to attend the coronation. Down in San Jose where democracy is a fetich and the monarchical form of government is hated this story seems to have aroused great indignation. This indignation is voiced by the editorial writer who points out that as the Princess is an American citizen she cannot be "commanded" by King George to do anything. Which is perfectly correct. But the editorial writer is quarreling with words, not with the "Jeems Yellowplushes," if he only knew it. If a plain democratic invitation may be called a "bid," why may not a royal invitation be called a "command"? Kings delight in high-sounding words; so why not let them have their fill of them without complaining. If the San Jose editorial writer wishes to make out a case of snobbery against our bavardes, he should be able to find more pregnant material for his thesis. But it would cause me pain just the same. Our "Jeems Yellowplushes" are a joyous lot who contribute wonderfully to the gaiety of existence in this prosaic neck of the woods. I would not have their enthusiasm dampened for the world.

Whom Does Mrs. Atherton Mean?

Gertrude Atherton is nothing if not outspoken. She dares to say what is in her mind and has the cleverness that enables her to say it in phrases that sting, if the subject matter of her remarks happens to be critical. Over in London she has just been talking about the American woman who invades the British capital with social ambitions. "One thing that strikes me as rather contemptible," says Mrs. Atherton, "is the number of wealthy American women who come over here and start off to try to get into society. They take houses and splurge tremendously. They are dazzled by going to Court and try to get people of title at their houses. All this is rather ignoble." Now I wonder what woman or women Mrs. Atherton had in mind when she uttered these acid remarks. Is it possible that any Californian was included in her list?

Hotel Del Monte Summer Sports

Dates for the annual carnival of sports have been definitely taken and announcement is made by H. R. Warner, manager of Hotel Del Monte. In addition to the regular "Month of Sports" which has come to be recognized as the premier event in amateur sports on the coast, a number of other features have been added. The first event will be the National Electrical Supply Association inter-State golf tournament, April 25, 26 and 27 at which the electrical men of the coast will defend honors against the players from the middle West and eastern States. Next will come the National Holiday tournament which will be held over the fourth of July—July 1 to 5, inclusive. As the first comes on Saturday and the fourth of Tuesday with Sunday intervening this tournament will surely be largely patronized. Following this will come the annual Fall dog show which is the first event in the schedule of the "Month of Sports." This will be held August 25 and 26. The annual Fall golf tournament at which the amateur championships of the Pacific States, the Del Monte handicap and the championships of the Pacific Coast Golf Association are decided will be held September 2 to 9, inclusive. It will be remembered that last year there was an entry list of over one hundred and twenty-five at this golf tournament and it is expected that this year's will exceed even that remarkable list. The annual tennis tournament of the Pacific States Lawn Tennis Association will probably follow the golf games, although the dates have not yet been definitely decided on. A number of requests have been made to Manager Warner to include some amateur auto races in the list of events but no action has been taken on them at this time. Altogether the season at Del Monte promises to be the most brilliant in years.

An Umbrella Story

Once upon a time there was a man who left his umbrella in the stand of his club with a card attached, bearing on it an inscription: "This umbrella belongs to a man who, on provocation, is the possessor of the most damaging kidney punch in the British Isles, and is also apt to lose his temper. He will be back in half an hour." But—mark the "but"—on returning for the goods he found instead of his card, a new card, a strange card, with a legend: "This card is left by a man who can run twelve miles in one hour. He will not be back."

Hillier, English bicycle and tricycle champion in the days of the high wheel and hard tire, used to tell an amusing story about his trainer.

It appears that the trainer would at times get on Hillier's nerves, by calling him Mr. 'Illier. One day, in exasperation, Hillier said to him: "Why do you always call me Mr. 'Illier? It is not my name, you know."

The trainer stood back in astonishment and replied: "Well, if a haich and a hi and a hel and a hel and a hi and a he and a har don't spell 'Illier, I'd like to know what it do spell."

The Follies of 1910

By Edward F. O'Day

In this year of grace 1911 most of us are quite willing to put our follies of last year in the dark backward of memory where the worm of conscience will not gnaw at them. The running months bring follies of their own for the delectation of the old Adam that is in us. Of course they are merely the old follies of last year and the years before last masked and masqueraded in the current fashion. That is why they appeal to us. It would be too bad if we went on committing the old follies in exactly the old way. Strange as it may seem this bit of rather inconclusive moralizing came to me while I sat in the Columbia and watched Mr. Ziegfeld's moving pictures of the follies supposed to have been peculiar to last year. With the exception of a vacuous burlesque of the arrival of Colonel Roosevelt in New York there was nothing characteristic of 1910 in the piece. It is true that in one of the many scenes some of the money barons of the country were presented in equally vacuous burlesque, but the follies of the money barons go on for ever and there was nothing to prevent the spectator from fixing the date of their actions in 1905 or 1915. The rest of Mr. Ziegfeld's follies are independent of dates. "Temperamental" stage persons raise the old Nick at rehearsals year in and year out. Boozy young fellows make themselves ridiculous over pretty stars in every revolving twelvemonth from Halley's comet to Halley's comet. And audiences laugh at these and other follies without reference to the calendar. So while Mr. Ziegfeld's show fails to justify its title, being weakest where a literal-minded person who accepts titles at their face value might expect it to be strongest, it justifies itself by exciting mirth. The spectacle of a man patiently packing an upright piano about a room while two other men argue as to the proper place to set it down, is bound to be provocative of laughter. The sight of two men lambasting each other in a prize ring and continually tumbling on their heads or necks cannot fail to make one ha-ha. These are not specimens of the highest form of humor but they are humorous just the same and we must take them for what they are worth. Measured by the laughter they elicit they are unequivocally successful. So is the band that plays out of tune—to those who have not exhausted the possibilities of mirth in this time-worn act by a long devotion to vaudeville. In an altogether higher class than any of these is the variety of ragtime purveyed by Miss Fannie Brice. It is the raggedest ragtime that I have ever heard—ragtime torn to tatters; and in my humble opinion it was so far above anything else in the show that all the rest was nowhere. Miss Brice has style, individuality, and she gets her effects across the footlights with the ease of perfect mastery. Bert Williams is good and Bobby North (who does one of his old familiar medleys) is good; but Fannie Brice is great. May she come here soon again and never become too important to drop her staccato deliciousness. Speaking of deliciousness reminds one naturally of Miss Lillian Lorraine who has a delicious beauty, though she is far from being the paragon the press agent would have us believe. There are many more beautiful women on the American stage than Miss Lorraine. There are thousands who are better singers. As a matter of fact Miss Lorraine has no gift in that direction. Her charms are purely those with which nature has endowed her. How she ever came to be chosen for the star of Mr. Ziegfeld's aggregation must remain a mystery, unless it was for her beauty and her gracefulness in falling into a tank of water. She does that very well. If she did it twice instead of once she would be twice as interesting as she is at present. If she did it in a bathing suit as some of the "Anna Held girls" did, she might create a positive sensation. But one cannot expect too much of a pulchritudinous star. For my part I would rather watch one Fannie Brice than a dozen Lillian Lorraines.

Gossip of the Theatre

The Nethersole's Last Week

Olga Nethersole will make her last appearances in "The Redemption of Evelyn Vaudray" this Saturday afternoon and evening. On Sunday she will rest and on Monday she will present for the first time Maurice Maeterlinck's miracle play, "Sister Beatrice." Originally produced at the New Theatre in New York a year ago, the play proved the artistic success of the season at that playhouse. Miss Nethersole has already appeared in another play of Maeterlinck and the director of the New Theatre did her the honor of inviting her to come to the playhouse to create the titular role in the Belgian dramatist's version of "Mary Magdalen." It was her wonderful performance in this play that induced the management of the New Theatre to authorize her appearance in "Sister Beatrice." Maeterlinck's play is based on an old Dutch legend which has also been used by John Davidson in his "Ballad of a Nun" and by Adelaide Proctor in her "Legend of Provence." In addition to "Sister Beatrice" Miss Nethersole will also appear in "The Enigma," a short play which Paul Hervieu wrote for the Comedie Francaise.

Imperial Court Lieder Singer

Alexander Heinemann, the favorite lieder singer of the Imperial German Court and one of the greatest living singing-masters and interpreters of the classic songs, will give his first concert at the Scottish Rite Auditorium this Sunday afternoon, April 23, at 2:30, offering a program of masterpieces by Schuman, Schubert, Loewe and Hans Hermann. Mr. Heinemann has been described as "a Dr. Wullner with a voice of exceptional beauty," and his concerts are said to be fascinating in every way and worth a dozen singing lessons to any student of the vocal art. The second concert will be given Wednesday night, April 26, with a program of Beethoven, Brahams, Schubert, Loewe, Hermann and Kaun songs, and the farewell concert will be given Thursday night, April 27, with another splendid list of works including by special request Loewe's remarkable ballad "Archibald Douglas." The box office is now open at Sherman Clay and Co.'s and on Sunday at the Hall after ten o'clock. In Oakland Mr. Heinemann will repeat the Thursday night program on Friday afternoon, April 28, at 3:30. Seats for this event will be ready at Ye Liberty Playhouse on Monday, April 24.

"The Follies of 1910" Go On

With Lillian Lorraine, Bickel and Watson, Bert Williams, Billie Reeves, Bobby North, Fannie Brice and other attractions "The Follies of 1910" at the Columbia has attracted great audiences. It will be seen up to and including Sunday night, April 30. There will be matinees on Wednesday and Saturday. Seats for all the remaining performances are now on sale and the demand is very great.

The Russian Symphony Orchestra's Season

One week from next Sunday afternoon, the renowned Russian Symphony Orchestra will open a series of seven festival concerts at the Scottish Rite Auditorium. This is the most elaborate and expensive musical attraction of the year. Few managers would dare attempt what Will L. Greenbaum has succeeded in accomplishing in securing such an aggregation of artists without the backing of any committee, patron or musical society. There are just fifty players in the orchestra. Each is an artist, and many are famed as soloists. Nikolai Skoloff, a Russian violin virtuoso, who was specially engaged to play at the recent Gould-Decies wedding will act as concertmaster. Four eminent vocal artists forming a quartette of mixed voices will lend variety to the programs. In addition, Manager Greenbaum has arranged to have that marvelous boy pianist, Pepito Arriola, appear as soloist at one of the concerts, and it will be a novel sight when the mere child appears surrounded by half a hundred grown men and plays one of the most difficult of "Concertos" for piano and orchestra. Mr. Modest Altsculer, the conductor, is one of the most gifted musicians in this country with that indefinable power of imparting to his men every thought in his mind, and the result is that the Russian Orchestra plays like an amalgamation of virtuosi. These will certainly be the finest orchestral concerts ever heard in this city. At the opening concert Sunday afternoon, April 30, the special features will be the first performances of Rachmaninoff's "Symphony, No. 2, Liadow's symphonic sketch "The Enchanted Lake," a Tone-Poem by Sibelius called "Finlandia," a vocal quartette entitled "Night" by Tschaikowsky and some smaller numbers. By request, Tschaikowsky's "March Slav" has been added to the program. Monday night, May 1, the principal numbers will be Schuman's "Symphony" No. 1, Musorgsky's "Sunrise on the Moskva River," Ilyinski's Suite "Nur and Anitra" in five descriptive movements and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyrie." Tuesday night, May 2, Dvorak's "From the New World," Victor Herbert's "Irish Rhapsodie" and Tschaikowsky's "Theme and Variations" will be the more important numbers. Wednesday night, May 3, the music from Richard Strauss' Music Drama "Salome" will be heard here for the first time as will also Glazounow's Symphonic Suite "The Middle Ages" and Arensky's variations on a theme by Tschaikowsky which was inspired by the legend "Christ, when a child, a garden made and many roses planted there." Friday night, May 5, might be termed California night for two of the feature numbers will be the "Prelude" to Act III of the new Victor Herbert-Joe Redding opera "Natoma," the scene of which is laid in this State, and the Chinese Suite "Aladdin" by Edgar Stillman Kelley, for which the composer gathered the themes in our own Chinatown. The symphony on this night will be Beethoven's immortal No. 5 and the Russian works will be by Rimsky-Korsakow and Kayanus. Saturday afternoon, May 6, Pepito Arriola will play the Liszt "Concerto" in E flat and the orchestra numbers will include Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Borodine's Overture "Prince Igor." The farewell program on Sunday afternoon, May 7, will be indeed a glorious offering. Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 will be given here for the first time as will also the "Prelude" to the new opera "Koeninskinder" by Humperdinck, the Ballet from Glinka's "My Life for the Czar," and a Suite from "Child Life" by Conus. The box office will open next Wednesday, April 26, at Sherman Clay and Co.'s for both season and single tickets. Mail orders will receive careful attention if addressed to Will L. Greenbaum, and complete program books are obtainable at all music stores, or will be mailed to any address free upon application. Not in any music center of Europe can a more interesting, beautiful and novel series of orchestral concerts be heard.

Russian Orchestra at the Greek Theatre

The Musical and Dramatic Committee of the University of California, of which Prof. William Dallam Armes is the chairman, has arranged for two special programs by the Russian Symphony Orchestra, the dates being Thursday afternoon, May 4, at 3:30, and Saturday night, May 6, at 8:15. The Thursday afternoon concert will be devoted entirely to Russian works, and will feature Tschaikowsky's "Symphonic Pathetique," Rachmaninoff's Tone Poem "The Cliff," the stirring Overture "181," and half a dozen other masterpieces. At the Saturday night concert Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker Suite" will be given in its entirety, the same composer's "March Slav" and three other Russian works will be given, the balance of the program being devoted to "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan und Isolde," "Gotterdammerung," "Siegfried" and "Tannhauser." Seats for these two events will be on sale at Sherman and Clay and Co.'s in San Francisco and also Oakland, and at the usual places in Berkeley. In case of inclement weather the concerts will be given in the Harmon Gymnasium.

"The Aviator" at the Alcazar

For Izetta Jewel's and Thurston Hall's second week as leaders of the Alcazar players "The Aviator," one of last year's Broadway successes, will be given its first presentation here. It is a farcical comedy by James Montgomery, and, as its title implies, treats of flying machines and birdmen. One of its big scenes shows the start of a real monoplane with Thurston Hall at the helm and as many people as the stage can accommodate frantically cheering him. Ludicrous situations and incidents follow each other with rapidity throughout the three acts.

devoted to "Hamlet." This role was the medium in which he made his initial appearance on the professional stage about three years ago. His performance was praised by the critics on both sides of the bay and crowded houses were the rule during its run. Manager Bishop promises a sumptuous scenic and costume production of the play and a cast that will do it full justice. The Hotaling engagement will close with a revival of "The Merchant of Venice" in which Hotaling appears again as "Shylock."

Attractions at the Orpheum

The Orpheum program next week will be headed by Bert Coote in a sketch entitled "A Lamb on Wall Street." Arthur Deagon, for the past four years a star in Ziegfeld's "Follies," will tell a number of stories in various dialects and sing a few songs. The reappearance of Clay Smith and the Melnotte Twins in a musical skit entitled "Artistic Nonsense" is sure to be cordially welcomed. Goleman's European Novelty, consisting of a number of clever dogs and cats, will make their first appearance here. Next week will be the last of Selbit's Spirit Paintings; Taylor, Kranzman and White; Bedini and Arthur, and of the third degree drama "The Suspect."

A Talented San Francisco Girl

One of the most attractive and clever members of the Follies of 1910 Company is a San Francisco girl who, though she has been on the stage but a short time, has made wonderful progress in her profession. I refer to Miss Florence Gardiner who sings "Good-bye Beckie Cohen." Miss Gardiner is only twenty years of age, and notwithstanding her brief experience on the stage she is the understudy of the star of the big Ziegfeld show. As she is a talented girl with a good voice and loads of pulchritude she will doubtless make much of her opportunities. She is a pupil, by the way, of Fernando Michelena.

The Coming of Bernhardt

Mme. Bernhardt will come to the Columbia on Monday, May 1. The regular seat sale for the week's engagement will open on Thursday, April 27, promptly at 9 o'clock, at the box office of the theater. But mail orders, accompanied by check or post office order, and a stamped addressed envelope, will be filled in order of receipt. The repertoire for the week is as follows: Monday, May 1, "L'Aiglon"; Tuesday "Camille"; Wednesday matinee "Madame X"; Wednesday evening "Jeanne d'Arc"; Thursday "La Tosca"; Friday "La Sorciere"; Saturday matinee "L'Aiglon"; Saturday evening "Madame X"; Sunday evening "Sister Beatrice."

A Love Song

(Out of season.)

Her name is merely Sarah Cooke;
She's not so bad a wench;
She knits and sews and even knows
A smattering of French;
And, what is more, her father's on
The local petty bench.

Her wit is of the nature which
Not frequently expands;
But, when it rips, produces quips
Which no one understands.
She has, as all her friends admit,
A useful pair of hands.

Her teeth remind observant folk
Rather of gold than pearls;
Her hair is sound and hedged around
With artificial curls.
Her eyes (a grayish-greenish brown)
Are much as other girls'

Her singing voice is strong and large,
She has a powerful throat;
Her hats suggest the cheaply dressed,
Her boots suggest the vote;
And she is undefeated by
The longest table d'hote.

Her waist is of the size that most Suggests security;
Her competence is not immense;
Her age is forty-three;
I cannot say what makes me think
She is the girl for me.

Expensive Staging

The indignant citizen was freeing his mind.

"You want 50 cents for admission to this motion picture show, do you!" he exclaimed. "That's an infernal outrage!"

"Look here, mister," said the man in the box office, "this is no ordinary entertainment. These pictures cost a small fortune. They show two men taking dinner together. One of them is eating a porterhouse steak and the other is getting away with a plate of bacon and eggs."

Lady—Can't you find work?

Tramp—Yessum; but every one wants a reference from my last employer.

Lady—And can't you get one?

Tramp—No, mum. Yer see, he's been dead twenty-eight years.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The stock market was without trend during the past week, there being no incentive for activity in either direction. The announcement that the Supreme Court would hand down the trust decisions was received with indifference, inasmuch as they are still hanging over the market and are liable to come out most any Monday. Traders apparently took the position that unless the Mexicans should arouse the market, another dull week was in prospect. Advices from the west and south in connection with the crops were all of an encouraging nature, and there is confidence in the strength of the fundamental conditions.

Wheat—Nervousness on the part of the shorts in May, with oversold pit conditions generally, were mainly responsible for a fairly strong market last week. Receipts moreover, continue light and with another big decrease expected in the visible supply of this country, shorts were more willing to take profits in all months. In the general situation governing the wheat markets of the world there has not been a radical change in any respect. The crop outlook in this country is splendid, while there is no material improvement in the cash outlook. Barring a little more activity in the trade in flour and cash wheat at Minneapolis, millers continue to show the same apathetic spirit in regard to buying cash wheat that they have displayed for some time. Indications are that winter wheat farmers have liberal supplies and with the possibility of reciprocity, spring wheat holders may unload more freely as soon as the new crop is seeded. Naturally the operations in May wheat have been of much import as bearing on the upturn in values. Shorts, until recently, were encouraged to sell May wheat by the talk that the nearby months would go to a full carrying charge basis under July. Bears are likely to receive encouragement from abroad as prospects are for heavy world shipments from now on, while supplies are large and crop conditions generally favorable.

Corn—A many-angled situation exists in the corn market. Receipts are small and farmers are not selling much corn, while brokers claim to be unable to sell any kind of corn either for domestic or export account. Cash prices have advanced from a tremendous discount to a premium over May for No. 3 yellow, with the futures advancing at the same time and yet there has been no increase in the volume of country selling. Stocks show small increases and with navigation open it is expected that about two million bushels will be shipped east from Chicago at once. Some of it has not been sold but it will make a large decrease in local supplies. Wet weather not only has retarded the movement but has delayed plowing for corn, although there is no lack of time yet for preparing the ground for a big acreage. Farm consumption continues on a heavy scale and farmers are showing an independent attitude in regard to selling.

Cotton—The cotton market has been on the upturn during the past week and prices have scored a fair advance, due to the strong statistical position of the staple on this side of the water and the better trade reports from Manchester. Liverpool markets have reflected conditions abroad by sending higher prices almost daily. Receipts at primary markets have been light, much less than a year ago. The news that trade was improving in America has reached England already and was partly responsible for the good demand for spots in the Liverpool market. According to advices from New York the tone of the cotton goods market only shows some slight improvement compared with a week ago. However, it is said that the immediate situation is one of resisting further depression in prices while raw cotton is held firm, and that mills are still running in excess of the actual demand, which gives buyers cause for doubting the ability of the spinners to hold the market up. There is a good trade in England, but Liverpool holds a fairly good supply of cotton. Including that afloat, the stock of all kinds in Liverpool is 288,000 bales larger than last year. There were general heavy rains during the past week in central portions of the cotton belt and temperatures were unseasonably low, reviving complaints of too much rain and of the weather being too cold for young cotton. A change to warmer weather is expected next week, and this, with clear weather, ought to have a depressing effect on the distant futures.

Quite Enough

"Oh, sir, will you please come at once? There is three brutes jumping on a poor organ-grinder."

"Is he a big organ-grinder?" queried the old gentleman calmly.

"No, no, sir; quite a little man. Oh, come at once, or it will be too late!"

"I don't see why I should interefere," replied the old gentleman. "If he's a small man the three men don't need any help."

Feminine Intuition

"Now that we are sure there is no question of robbers, I think that we had better return to the chateau," I muttered in exasperation, "for it is no longer necessary to remain here."

"Not at all," retorted Elise with provoking coolness; "we have seen Juliet, let us await Romeo!" Then, bursting into laughter, she exclaimed: "How delightfully amusing! I wonder whom she is waiting for?"

This question capped the climax. Her laughing curiously made me furious, and I could hardly control my temper as I pictured the temptingly beautiful Venus de Londel, awaiting me in the conservatory, while I stupidly remained a helpless prisoner behind a clump of shrubs, not daring to budge. The whole affair was too ridiculous. And the thought of the precious time I was wasting irritated me. I decided I was not going to miss my appointment to satisfy the caprices of a rascally little girl, and that, if affairs came to a crisis, I would simply tell her that I was the happy mortal expected by Madame Londel. What right had she to mix up in my affairs?

"I wonder, Cousin Gaston," said Elise suddenly, "whom Madame Londel is waiting for? It certainly must be someone who is easy to please."

"Why?" said I, a little vexed.

"Because," exclaimed Elise, "because she is no longer young!"

"Indeed," I replied.

"Yes, but perhaps you have never observed Madame Londel very closely. Why, Gaston, her hair is dyed. One can easily see that by looking at the roots. Then she is frightfully wrinkled! Only her wrinkles are half concealed by enamel."

Ah, that moment I felt like giving the impertinent girl a good shaking. Just then a cloud, which had partially veiled the face of the full moon, passed away and Elise, revealed in the clear, cold, penetrating white light of the moonbeams, appeared to be another being. The clear white and pink of her complexion; the full, fresh, red lips, disclosing a set of perfect teeth; the expression of her great, brown, frank eyes; her abundant mass of dark hair; the easy graceful movements of her tall, reed-like figure—in a word the splendor of her youthful charms suddenly burst upon me and completely disarmed my anger.

"Why, haven't you noticed," she continued, "that, to appear slender, Madame Londel is so tightly laced she can hardly bend? Acknowledge, cousin, that there are men who are shockingly lacking in taste. The man who would play Romeo to that Juliet must be an imbecile. Don't you agree with me, Gaston?"

I managed to evade the question, and she suddenly said: "Hush! I think there is someone coming!" And looking beyond the lilacs in the direction of the conservatory, she stamped her impatient little foot and flew into a rage. "No man is a gentleman who would keep a lady waiting as he has done. How humiliating for Madame Londel!"

My brutal wish of a moment before had now deserted me and, won by the youthful charms of my pretty cousin, I had no desire to acknowledge or have her suspect that I was the "imbecile" whom Madame Londel was awaiting.

I was suffering unspeakable agony and began to ask myself whether we were destined to spend the entire night there, waiting for a person whom I had every reason to know would not come. I really began to fear that Elise's little head would discover the truth and at that moment I would almost willingly have staked half of my possessions to have found a possible solution of the situation. But the Fates were with me, for suddenly we heard a heavy foot-fall approaching us. Instinctively my cousin drew nearer to me, and placed her hand in mine.

Decidedly more interested in the intrigue than she was, I looked through the branches of the trees and perceived Alfred del Mussielle walking leisurely along. His appearance did not surprise me, for I knew that for some time past he had been accustomed, particularly in summer, to take a walk at night when he could not sleep, and that it was purely accidental that he had turned in the direction of the conservatory.

As soon as Elise recognized de Mussielle, she sprang up with a bound, turned pale, and an agonizing expression in her face startled me. "Come," she said in a low whisper, "let us go, I have seen now." Her hand still rested in mine. She did not, however, seem to notice it, and together we walked silently on towards the chateau. But after a few moments, Elise burst into loud sobs and her slender form quivered with emotion.

"Mon Dieu, Elise!" I exclaimed, frightened by this unexpected emotion. "What is the matter with you?" We were walking near a stone bench and, throwing my arm around her, I drew her down beside me. "Come," I said, questioning her again, "tell me what it is that disturbs you?"

Then, resting her head on my shoulder, she explained in almost incoherent sentences that Alfred de Mussielle had asked only the previous day for her hand in marriage and that she had promptly refused him, but her grandmother had urged her to reconsider his offer. "But now," she added, "after what I have seen tonight our affair is finished!"

Astounded at what I heard, I asked half mechanically: "What? You marry, Elise? A little girl like you! How old are you?"

"I shall be eighteen next month," she answered. "Of course, grandmama said I was very young to marry, but she is very old—and when she dies, I shall be left in the world entirely alone."

Touched with the simplicity of her words and the thought that some day this pretty little orphan girl would be left to face the world without a protector, I repeated to myself: "Eighteen? Then she is no longer the little girl who used to annoy me. Eighteen years old! Tomorrow she will be a woman." And this is why, undoubtedly, I could not entirely repress a thrill of passion as her soft white hand rested within my own.

I looked at her now with surprise, as though seeing her for the first time. To me she appeared another being, and the child of yesterday was transformed into an adorable young woman, whose grace and beauty had charmed and captivated Alfred de Mussielle.

Poor de Mussielle! One word from me would have exonerated him. But that word I withheld and occupied myself solely with getting my cousin back to the chateau under the protecting wing of her dear, devoted grandmother. As to my rendezvous with the Venus de Londel, I scarcely thought of it again, except—to be grateful.

Six months later my cousin and I were married, and one evening, as we were sitting in the rosy firelight of our cozy home, talking over that memorable night when we first began to fall in love, Elise looked up confidingly from her embroidery and said: "Do you know, Gaston, I never thought very much of Alfred de Mussielle."

"No?" I answered indifferently.

"From the very start I refused him point-blank without being able to give a satisfactory reason to dear grandmama for my refusal. I seemed to have a presentiment that he was not what he ought to be."

"Indeed?" I said, shaking the ashes from my pipe into the open grate.

"Women," earnestly continued my dear little wife, "have a sort of infallible instinct in these matters and are rarely deceived. Why, Gaston," said Elise, growing a trifle excited, "I would rather be cut into a thousand pieces than marry a man who was capable of falling in love with Madame Londel!"

I was tempted to burst out laughing and to divulge my secret, but thought it would be cruel to destroy Elise's faith in her own infallible convictions; so, instead of enlightening her, I caught my pretty little darling up in my arms and kissed her.

Auto Notes

The big surprise at this season's Pablo Beach races in Florida was the work of Herb Wilson who drove a Cole car. Neither driver nor car belonged to the regular Cole team and Wilson, who continued to win or place in every race, was heralded as a mystery by the press. It was finally found that the new driver was associated with the Cole agency in Jacksonville and that the car was one taken from stock on his salesroom floor. J. J. Cole, president of the Cole Motor Car Co., wired Wilson offering him a place on the Cole racing team. Wilson, however, declined, stating that he preferred selling to racing.

While sales of Rambler motor cars have been largest in the cities, and increases are being made every day in the metropolitan centers of the country, a special number of the Rambler Magazine has just been published by The Thomas B. Jeffery Company which presents in a vastly interesting way the subject of the motor car for the farm. Packed from cover to cover with pictures of the Rambler in use on the big farms of the country, it tells the story of farm prosperity and success most marvelous to the person unacquainted with the development of the American farm.

The auto trade in the valley sections of the State is taking a decided boom, according to advices brought to town by A. E. Green, manager for Wallace Bros. of Stockton. A big demand has developed in the San Joaquin metropolis this spring for Hupmobile and Oakland cars, in evidence of which Green brought down a number of prospects to look over the complete line of machines handled by S. G. Chapman. A number of sales have been closed. Green reports that the new road connecting Stockton and Sacramento is proving a big stimulus to automobile touring this spring.

A testimonial to the local popularity of the new 1911 Haynes fore door models is found in the number of these machines that are already seen on streets and roads of this vicinity. One of the latest of local motorists to take delivery of a Haynes model is J. R. McElroy of Pine street. The car purchased by Mr. McElroy is a fore door five passenger machine.

Speeding over the foot hills of the Rocky Mountains on the road between Denver and Colorado Springs which traverses gullies, ravines and the sage brush slopes of this western trail, Fred Hall, with a Lozier stock car, on March 30, lowered this much coveted western record by making the distance of seventy-three miles in one hour and forty-three minutes. It was Hall's first venture in racing or record breaking work, and he succeeded in cutting thirteen minutes off the previous record made by Yesley Smith in a 70 horsepower Thomas car, a record which has withstood all attacks for the past two years.

The tire manufacturers of the country who have been responsible for more than 96 per cent of the auto rims heretofore made, have turned over to the United Rim Company all automobile rim patents, together with engineering data and all other available information, for the purpose of establishing a universal standard. The standardization has resulted in the adoption of three rims, any one of which will fit all straight-side and clincher tires. These also embody the most efficient means for detaching the tire from the rim and for demounting the rim from the wheel. By combining in these rims all the good points of the endless variety of rims heretofore made, including the Continental, Goodyear, Diamond (Marsh) and Goodrich types, car builders, tire makers and car owners are relieved of the necessity of using a pre-determined type and are enabled to use or replace tires with the most convenient types available.

Letters

"Sylva of California"

The second volume of memoirs of the University of California, "Sylva of California," the work of Willis Lynn Jepson, is a sizable volume filled with interesting information for professional botanist or lay reader. About one-half its bulk is reserved for full-page plates showing characteristic or exceptional forms of trees, the effects of wind, leaf forms, cones and other matters best presented by pictures, but there are two hundred and eighty large pages of print containing descriptive and historical matter as far as possible removed from the dry and statistical, for besides the scientific botanical descriptions and references there are historical data, distribution, habits, and peculiarities, uses, and in general, brief but comprehensive bringing together of all that one needs to know of the trees of California. We may boast of twenty-eight species of the pine family, ten of the cypress, nine willows, eleven oaks and five ashes, besides our two species of redwood. Of particular interest are the chapters on "Mutilation and Reproduction," "Seed Production" and "Geographical Distribution." One cannot but feel grateful to the author, amongst other things, for his recommendation of native trees in place of so many exotics in laying out parks and private estates. Within a single generation we have seen our wild flowers all but exterminated and those who, as children gathered them indiscriminately now purchase seed and cultivate in small patches the identical species which once covered whole hillsides. In another score of years some of our trees which are now ignored or despised may become rare enough to be regarded as treasures. "Sylva of California" represents twenty years of research on the part of the author. The Paul Elder Company is associated with the University Press in the publication of the book.

Ghost Stories by Crawford

Under the title "Wandering Ghosts" the Macmillan Company has brought together half a dozen stories more or less tinged with the supernatural, by the late Marion Crawford. As all these "tales of terror" have appeared in periodicals and all attracted more than ordinary attention at the time of their publication, the titles alone will recall them to mind. "The Dead Smile" introduces a vision of the banshee and tells of the deathbed of a vicious old man whose lips were fixed in a ghastly smile that seemed to compel everyone about him to imitate it. "The Screaming Skull" is a study of suggestion; the recital of a story of cleverly concealed murder which inspired one of its hearers to duplicate the crime, and the subsequent haunting of the murderer by the skull of the dead woman. "Man Overboard" tells of the haunting of a sailor by the wraith of his twin brother lost overboard. "For the Blood is the Life" deals with vampyrism, a belief which is almost a matter of course in south-eastern Europe. "The Upper Berth" tells of a stateroom on a trans-Atlantic liner which was haunted by the presence of some creature, animal or human, every passenger who occupied it being driven to suicide by drowning. "The Doll's Ghost" is almost "in lighter vein" as compared with the other stories. That large class who acknowledge a love for stories of the supernatural will find "Wandering Ghosts" to their liking while the host of Mr. Crawford's admirers will be glad of this one more book from his stilled hand.

Picturing an Ideal Life

We are indebted to Mrs. Roger A. Prior for an interesting portrayal of the life and manners of good society in Virginia in ante-bellum days. "The Colonel's Story" is, in its plot, the narrative of the grievous disappointment of a noble-hearted man who had fallen in love with a young girl, his distant relative, and believed that his attachment was reciprocated when in fact she was fond of him only as her kinsman, her affection being given to one of her own generation, and of the elderly colonel's sacrifices and efforts on her behalf, never revealing his secret when he realized his error. Apart from the plot we have a presentation of a life almost ideal. Being a southern woman, the author has kept the slaves in their proper places, well in the background. It is an inviting picture, too, of the summer colony at the White Sulphur Springs where people went for rest and relaxation, not for show, and where the gatherings were like family meetings and kind feeling ruled in the place of ostentation and exclusion. The colonel, Colonel James Jones, belongs in the same gallery of portraits as those fine pictures given us by Thomas Nelson Page and F. Hopkinson Smith, types that we are the better for meeting even if only in books. From the Macmillan Company.

"The Professor's Mystery"

"The Professor's Mystery" need not have been a mystery at all but for the misdirected efforts of a family to conceal a slight aberration on the part of one of them, with the usual result that their explanations and precautions were far more mysterious than their cause. There are some clever descriptions of seances. The story is a collaboration by Bryan Hooker and Wells Hastings. Published by Bobbs Merrill Co.

Our Sceptical Labor Leaders

It may be that the men who have been arrested for the many dynamite outrages by which life and property were destroyed in several cities are not the miscreants by whom the deeds were perpetrated. But it is much easier to believe that the right men have been apprehended than that arrests have been made in furtherance of a conspiracy to incite public feeling against organized labor or as a stratagem in anticipation of a general strike in Los Angeles. The theory regarding a conspiracy of capital against labor aided and abetted by the authorities is so absurd as to argue insincerity on the part of the men by whom it is voiced. And the leaders of organized labor are not doing their cause any good by their superheated scepticism or by professing to believe it more likely that the crimes were committed by anti-union employers than by union men and that evidence consisting of dynamite "plants" has been manufactured by the enemies of unionism. The credulity which they manifest if not assumed is at any rate so preposterous as to be incredible. It is the kind of credulity which believes everything but the truth. We should have more confidence in the leaders of organized labor if they were less disposed to shield union men by whom violence is practiced. Violence is not one of the cardinal principles of unionism. Violence is not as a rule ordered by union leaders. But the struggle between union employers and non-union workmen breeds violence as everybody knows who has any knowledge of the history of industrial strife, and to the shame of some union leaders be it said that while loudly declaiming against the lawlessness of strikers they have frequently betrayed their acquiescence if not their connivance.

Our Unanimous Dailies

Amid all the auspicious circumstances attending the candidacy of James Rolph Jr. there is one evil omen that may well fill him with misgivings the while he looks into the seeds of time. We allude to the portentous unanimity of the parochial press. At intervals extremely rare the militant editors of the vociferous dailies call a truce and hold a conclave, and when the common people behold the terrifying spectacle they seem spontaneously to resent for the time being whatever advice emanates in emphatic accord from the molders of public opinion. If we may take the lesson of experience as conclusive there is no escape from the proposition that a candidate for public office, "though his virtues plead like angels, trumpet tongued," is doomed to defeat if it be his misfortune to incur the approval of the united daily press. And this is the fate which at this moment seems to be in store for that eminent and much respected citizen, Mr. James Rolph Jr., candidate of the business interests of the community for the office of mayor. But fortunately for him there is yet time to avert disaster. Difficult though it is for our militant editors to come to an agreement, more difficult still is the maintenance of their unanimity. Feeble their confidence in one another, they are prone to suspicion and suspicion breeds treachery. Let one be persuaded to excess of enthusiasm and the entente cordiale will be quickly disrupted.

A Leader of Thought

How hopeless would be the fate of our country were it not for the leaders of public thought! It gives one a shudder to meditate on the miscellaneous disasters that might threaten, the multitudinous evils that might o'erwhelm, did not the divinity that shapes our ends supply us with those exceptional, superior persons, accustomed to abstract contemplation, who do the necessary profound thinking for us. These men are not appreciated by the common herd. This is because of their remoteness above our heads, far up among the clouds where, calm, contemplative, passive, they survey the universe, read the stars, watch the return of the seasons, the falling leaves of autumn, and smile without bitterness at the follies of the world. It is only when they condescend to come to earth, which they do occasionally for a moment in a spell of abstraction, that we are able to glimpse them and faintly apprehend their greatness. Thus were we favored the other day by that stupendous scholar, David Starr Jordan, exponent of the higher thought, accurate judge of the effects of things with reference to all their bearings, ramifications and impediments. Dr. Jordan came among us to protest against the arrest of his son for speeding in his automobile. Like the most commonplace fond parent he rebuked the officers of the law for daring to humiliate the offspring of the Jordans. "If any one," said the eminent pundit, "says that Knight Jordan violated the speed law at the time and place named said person is guilty of perjury." How does he know? Under the sun, nor beyond it is there anything that the apostle of peace on earth does not know.

The Wealth of Nations

In two little tables of statistics is to be found a lucid explanation of what is the matter with the United States of America. The first is a table of the total wealth of four nations:

United States	$125,000,000,000
Great Britain	88,725,000,000
France	83,000,000,000
Germany	63,500,000,000

The second is a table of the per capita wealth together with the population of the same four nations:

Country	Population	Per Capita
France	40,000,000	$2,075
Great Britain	46,000,000	1,930
United States	90,000,000	1,390
Germany	64,000,000	992

From the foregoing it is evident that the wealth of this country is not very well distributed. In France more than in any country in the world there is an actual division of wealth. In this country with its enormous population which is more than double that of France while its wealth is only a third greater the poor are innumerable while of capitalists we have comparatively a small number. In the circumstances it is natural that dissatisfaction should be widespread and that the ranks of the Socialists should be recruited at such a rate as to cause our politicians to sit up and take notice. The great advantage which France has over us in per capita wealth is due in a large measure to the prodigious wealth of a comparatively small number of our citizens. We have more millionaires than are to be found in any three countries of Europe and a small group of them possess more wealth than all the millionaires of France. The explanation of course is protection to able-bodied industries; but the reduction of the tariff will not satisfy the horde of disgruntled. They are not to be satisfied with abating injustice. Their aim is not so much to prevent the further piling up of fortunes as to compel the distribution of those that have been accumulated.

His Maiden Effort

A breath of Progressiveness taken at the storm centre in Washington, D. C., has somewhat tempered the transports of our distinguished citizen, the Hon. John D. Works, Senator by grace of a cheverel-conscienced Legislature. Who that does not remember the passions stirred at Sacramento when as Senator-elect this champion of the masses characterized the proposal to recall the judiciary as "reform run mad!" Then were the vials of wrath uncorked, and blasting were the invectives eructated against the new-born statesman who had dared give utterance to a sentiment grievously at variance with the cherished views of the men who had raised him to place and power. With bell, book and candle the anathematized Senator-elect was banished from the fold, consigned to the outer-darkness infested with unspeakable standpatters. There he seems to have repented. For in his maiden speech in the Senate he evinces a disposition to recant. He is in favor of admitting Arizona to the Union, the recall to its ultimate conclusion to the contrary notwithstanding. Mildly he disavows a belief in the principle of the recall so far as it affects the judiciary, but it is no longer "reform run mad." He believes in giving the people what they want, and the recall he regards as a happy medium between a corrupt representative government and a pure democracy. He argues that the people of Arizona have a right to decide for themselves what form of republican government they will live under so long as it does not conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and as the Constitution does not define "a republican form of government" it must be assumed that the phrase was used "in the generally accepted sense." The Senator's argument is sound. To determine whether Arizona is admissible to the Union it must first be determined whether its Constitution provides for a republican form of government such as was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. And what this form of government was understood to be is a question which eventually must be solved by the Supreme Court of the United States. The question is already before the Supreme Court of the State of Oregon, and that it will soon be in the Federal courts is quite certain. Meantime Judge Works may be able to satisfy himself on the subject by pursuing appropriate studies. If he has not yet been retained on either side of the question we believe there is but one conclusion that a man of his analytical mind can reach.

American Despotism

Richard Croker in a farewell interview on the eve of his departure for his home in Ireland a week ago took occasion to remark that under the British flag there is more personal liberty than under the stars and stripes. There was a time when such an assertion by such a person as Richard Croker would have stirred the chauvinistic spirit of wild-eyed editors in every State in the Union. But the spirit of patriotism is no longer rampant, national pride has ceased to be so sensitive as to make us ridiculous. We have grown more tolerant of criticism since the days of Charles Dickens, partly because we have become less provincial, but chiefly for the reason that we are not so self-satisfied as formerly, not so insensible of our imperfections and our shortcomings. Perfervid rhetoric such as used to inflame us on the Fourth of July may now be employed in vain to titillate our emotions. The only sentiments worth while are those that stimulate distrust, dissatisfaction and hatred. No longer enamored of the institutions that once were our pride and our glory we honor none but those that would hasten their decay. Such are the consequences of the apotheosis of Demos. Raging up and down the land is the spirit of democracy with its dogmatic tone, its deceptive simplicity of ideas, its fantastic notions of equal rights for all, and all its alluring illusions. And it is this very democratic spirit despite the restraint it has been under in the past that is responsible for the checks on personal liberty on which Richard Croker has animadverted. There is no greater tyrant than the multitude, and in the degree in which the power of the many is magnified the liberty of the individual is diminished. Now unquestionably Richard Croker is right when he says there is more personal liberty in England than in this country. He might have gone further and said without fear of refutation that there is less personal liberty in this country than in any country in Europe save Russia. So many are the restraints on personal liberty in this land of the free and home of the knave that Americans with the price in their pockets and red corpuscles in their blood go abroad to enjoy themselves. So industriously have we been engaged in curtailing the natural rights of man that to enjoy them to the full one must go to London, Paris or Berlin where the happy impression still prevails that private morals are not a menace to the peace and prosperity of the State. The progress being made toward Puritanism in some of our chastest States where the delusion is fostered by the pious majority that man was made for the Sabbath and always to mourn is making life therein unbearable to every individual who has a drop of the old Adam afloat in his system. In these States liberty means that everybody is free to do what nobody cares to do, and the pursuit of happiness is becoming one of the most perilous of inalienable rights. Thus have we gravitated into the state toward which democracy tends in spite of the institutions which once inspired the hope that they might protect us from ourselves. Nowhere, it is true, have we any of the visible symbols of despotism—neither the knouts nor the thumbscrews; we neither pillory our De Foes for writing about public affairs nor our Bunyans for proclaiming their views of religion, but nevertheless there is grinding intolerance and frightful tyranny. Where in the world is there a despotism comparable with that of the press of this country which carries on without restraint its terrible inquisitions not of fagot and flame but of obloquy and hatred? What protection has the private citizen from the tyranny of the press? Assuredly the courts do not afford him protection. In hardly any of our State governments is there such a thing as justice between the press and the individual. The press is the Fourth Estate, and judges elected by the people are not independent of that branch of the government. It is the democratic spirit that insists that judges should be responsive to the will of the people, that they should be elected for a term of years and be subject therefore to the favor of the multitude. How can justice be insured in a State where the judges are not absolutely independent? It is platitudinous to say that impartiality is the life of justice and that justice is the life of all good government, but these are truisms that are ignored in this press-ridden country where the liberty of the press means not the liberty of discussing public measures and political questions but the liberty of affronting, calumniating and defaming. So we need go no further than consideration of the principle on which justice is here administered and of the nature of the liberty enjoyed by the newspapers to perceive that the United States is far from being a country in which "mankind throws off its fetters."

Perspective Impressions

The people of Seattle are thinking of recalling the recall mayor. Let the good work go on.

The man who has right on his side is always in the majority but seldom of it.

"Andy" Gallagher says it's a "frame-up." This is the same Andy who was such a great booster for Burns in the days of the Graft Prosecution.

The heavy hand of the law had the impertinence to fall on David Starr Jordan's son and Dave took a slap at the wrist.

A report from Washington says that Everis Anson Hayes is among the insurgents who are willing to stop insurging and return to the fold of conservative Republicanism. This isn't news. "Red" does this after every election.

Dr. Rader asks: "Are the preachers of San Francisco amiable nobodies?" That's a mild way of putting it.

According to Speaker Clark the Democrats are now on trial. If the charge be asininity the prosecution must confess the plea of scores of time in something worse than jeopardy.

Congressman "Bill" Kent voted for publicity of primary and general election campaign expenses. Of course such a law would not be retroactive.

Rev. Thomas B. Gregory, the Plutarch of the Hearst papers, says that Lord Byron is "the greatest poet that the English-speaking race has ever produced, Shakespeare alone excepted." Thus are the claims of Markham and Miller quashed forever.

A bavarde says that Jennie Crocker while in England will receive sixteen proposals of marriage. Well Jennie seems to be able to take better care of her purse than of her necklace.

According to Mr. Hearst his friend John Hayes Hammond ought to be appointed Ambassador to Berlin because—well because he is a great engineer, possessing qualifications for everything but the post he is after. The boost reads like a knock.

If Queen Elizabeth never saw Mary Stuart, as Henry Morse Stephens says, her control of her curiosity was preternatural. For she certainly had great curiosity regarding her distinguished contemporary, and there were nineteen years during which she might have gratified it with very little exertion. History doesn't record everything that happened in this world.

Cannon's Nonsense

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Here is a piece of unparalleled nonsense for your correspondent "Hibernian." It was written by Theodore Hook's friend, Rev. Edward Cannon.

Yours truly,
—A Scrap-Book Crank.

If down his throat a man should choose
In fun to jump or slide,
He'd scrape his shoes against his teeth,
Nor dirt his own inside.

Or if his teeth were lost and gone,
And not a stump to scrape upon,
He'd see at once how very pat,
His tongue lay there by way of mat,
And he would wipe his feet on that!

Get Busy!

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Why not apply the editorial spur to the gentlemen on whose shoulders rest the duty of selecting the site for the Panama-Pacific Exposition? They're "hurting business." Pending their decision everything is in statu quo. It's worse than if we weren't going to have any Fair. With no such project in view everybody would be doing business in the usual way, but as it is everything is at a standstill. Nobody cares to do anything until the great, important, all-absorbing site question is decided. Prospective purchasers and sellers of real estate are holding their deals in abeyance. This suspense is awful. It's high time for the Fair directors to get busy. Urge them to quit their squabbling and do something. Make it Harbor View, the Park, Lake Merced, or any old place in preference to keeping it up in the air. Take us off the anxious seat. I'm weary standing on the tiptoe of expectancy.

Sincerely yours,
—Business Man.

Slurring Shakespeare

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Although I am told by my very clever and very up-to-date young sons and daughters that I am way behind the times I at least try to keep abreast of new things in literature and the theater. Most of the new styles in books and plays fail to strike a responsive chord in me, so perhaps I am hopelessly old-fashioned. This is truer of the new plays than of the new books. For Maeterlinck's "Sister Beatrice," for instance, I have no power of appreciation. It is above and beyond me. Yet I went to see it and read carefully all the critiques in the Tuesday papers. I am still unable to see its great worth, but I am not bigoted as well as old-fashioned and therefore have great respect for the critics who praised it. But why should one of them exalt Maeterlinck at the expense of the glorious Bard of Avon? Was that necessary? I refer to the able critic of the Bulletin who referred slightingly in her notice of "Sister Beatrice" to what she called "Elizabethan melodrama." Undoubtedly she had in mind those splendid compositions which are the crown of English literature, "Hamlet," "King Lear," "Othello," "Macbeth" and the rest of those peerless dramas which Shakespeare left the world as its priceless literary heritage. Her reference made my blood boil Mr. William Winter or the lamented George Barnes (who were my favorite dramatic critics), would never have written like that. The moderns are no doubt wonderful, but is it too much to ask that the critics shall not slur the ancients whom some of us love so dearly? It is unnecessary and it is not sound criticism. I remember that several years ago in an interview which he gave to Mr. Ashton Stevens (a saucy critic but a good one), Mr. George Sterling, the poet, said that he would as soon think of throwing pebbles at the Cathedral of Chartres as attempt to pick flaws in Shakespeare. Would it not be well for the critic of the Bulletin to cultivate the same modesty?

Very sincerely,
—One Who Saw Booth.

A Macaronic

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I sympathize with your correspondent "Hibernian" who lost his scrap-book of nonsense verse in the fire and I take pleasure in contributing one from memory, a once familiar specimen of that kind of literary composition, difficult as it is humorous, called the Macaronic.

Yours truly,
—Reader.

The Bland Wanderer

By Arnold Bennett

In the drawing-room tonight an old and solitary, but blandly cheerful, female wanderer recounted numerous accidents at St. Moritz: legs broken in two places, shoulders broken, spines injured; also deaths. Further, the danger of catching infectious diseases at St. Moritz. "One very large hotel, where everybody had influenza," etc. These recitals seemed to give her calm and serious pleasure.

"Do you think this place is good for nerves?" she broke out suddenly at me. I told her that in my opinion a hot bath and a day in bed would make any place good for nerves. "I mean the nerves of the body," she said inscrutably. Then she deviated into a long set description of the historic attack of Russian influenza which she had had several years ago, and which had kept her in bed for three months, since when she had never been the same woman. And she seemed to savour with placid joy the fact that she had never been the same woman.

Then she flew back to St. Moritz and the prices thereof. She said you could get pretty reasonable terms, even there, "provided you didn't mind going high up." Upon my saying that I actually preferred being high up, she exclaimed: "I don't. I'm so afraid of fire. I'm always afraid of fire." She said that she had had two nephews at Cambridge. The second one took rooms at the top of the highest house in Cambridge, and the landlord was a drunkard. "My sister didn't seem to care, but I didn't know what to do! What could I do? Well, I bought him a non-inflammable rope." She smiled blandly.

This allusion to death and inebriety prompted a sprightly young Yorkshirewoman, with the county gift for yarn-spinning, to tell a tale of something that had happened to her cousin, who gave lessons in domestic economy at a London Board School. A little girl, absent for two days, was questioned as to the reason.

"I couldn't come."

"But why not?"

"I was kept . . . Please 'm, my mother's dead."

"Well, wouldn't you be better here at school? When did she die?"

"Yesterday. I must go back, please. I only came to tell you."

"But why?"

"Well, ma'am. She's lying on the table and I have to watch her."

"Watch her?"

"Yes. Because when father comes home drunk, he knocks her off, and I have to put her on again."

This narration startled even the bridge-players, and there were protests of horror. But the philosophic wanderer, who had never been the same woman since Russian influenza, smiled placidly.

"I knew something really much more awful than that," she said. "A young woman, well-known to me, had charge of a creche of thirty infants, and one day she took it into her head to amuse herself by changing all their clothes, so that at night they could not be identified; and many of them never were identified! She was such a merry girl! I knew all her brothers and sisters too! She wanted to go into a sisterhood, and she did, for a month. But the only thing she did there—well, one day she went down into the laundry and taught all the laundry-maids to polkah. She was such a merry girl!"

"In the end," the bland wanderer continued, after a little pause, "she went to America. America is such an odd place! Once I got into a car at Philadelphia that had come from New York. The conductor showed me my berth. The bed was warm. I partly undressed and got into it, and drew the curtain. I was half asleep, when I felt a hand feeling me over through the curtain. I called out, and a man's voice said: 'It's all right. I'm only looking for my stick. I think I must have left it in the berth'! Another time a lot of student girls were in the same car with me. They all got into their beds—or berths or whatever you call it—about eight o'clock, wearing fancy jackets, and they sat up and ate candy. I was walking up and down, and every time I passed they implored me to have candy, and then they implored each other to try to persuade me. They were mostly named Sadie. At one in the morning they ordered iced drinks around. I was obliged to drink with them They tired me out, and then made me drink. I don't know what happened just after that, but I know that, at five in the morning, they were all sitting up and eating candy. I've traveled a good deal in America and it's such an odd place! It was just the place for that young woman to go to."

XIX—REV. CHARLES F. AKED

By Edward F. O'Day

He is the soul of good humor in an interview, is Dr. Aked. And let me add, the soul of condescension. He more than meets the interviewer half way. Dull though you be, inappreciative of pat phrase or rounded epigram, there is no excuse for your overlooking the good things of his conversation. With half a brain you may know when he has uttered a telling sentence by the patient manner in which he pauses and watches your hurrying pencil pin his winged words to paper. He knows the newspaperman, does Dr. Aked, or thinks he knows him. So he slurs no opportunity of enlightening him on obscure points.

When he told a story of Dr. Birrell he was at pains to explain that this was the father of Augustine Birrell who, he was at equal pains to let me know, wrote "Obiter Dicta" and "Res Adjudicatae" and occupies a place in the British cabinet.

"Ah, you know Birrell," he commented on my imperfect gratitude.

When he mentioned Charles Bradlaugh he carefully pointed out that Charles Bradlaugh was a celebrated athiest who held the same position in England that Ingersoll held in America.

"Ah, you have heard of Bradlaugh," and his soft syllables seemed like a rebuke to precocity.

When he spoke of Derby he spelled it for me letter by letter lest I should be misled by his English pronunciation. And when he resurrected a very good though very old anecdote about Pere Hyacinth, he would have spelled the Frenchman's name for me too. Perfect politeness would have feigned ignorance and accepted his help. But who, except possibly Dr. Aked, was ever perfectly polite? Somehow or other I betrayed to him that I had met the name before. By some unconscious look or gesture my overweening pride of knowledge got the better of me and he know that I had heard of Pere Hyacinth. But he did not resent my knowing. With true Christian forbearance he placed a tiny coal of fire upon my head.

"Ah, you read French," he murmured.

Would that I could as easily gain the reputation of deciphering cuneiforms!

This condescencion of the reverend doctor informed all the interview. I am quite sure that he did not expect me to talk to him about religion. That is to say, he did not expect me to question him on the topic which he deprecates as "conventionally religious." In his secret thoughts he was probably good naturedly surprised that I broached matters of dogma and put questions of creed. He let me understand very clearly that these were subjects of minor interest with him. And yet he humored me by consenting to discuss them.

"The barriers between denominations are breaking down at the top and wearing through in places and they are already so low that we can shake hands across them."

His orotund rolling of the plentiful r's in that sentence was very impressive. Almost I forgot the purport of his words in my admiration of his delivery. I must have seemed spellbound, for he smiled a toothsome smile under his thick mustache, draped one lanky leg over the other and went sonorously on:

"The step from one denomination to another is becoming very common. Dr. Jowett—he is not related to the great Master of Balliol though he bears the same name—went from Congregationalism to Presbyterianism. Dr. Hillis—probably the best known American pastor; he succeeded Beecher—went from Presbyterianism to Congregationalism. Dr. Cadman went from Congregationalism to Methodism. Dr. Dawson went from Methodism to Congregationalism and thence to Presbyterianism."

To this imposing array of barrier-breakers Dr. Aked allowed me to add his own name and proceeded to explain why he slid through the barrier from the Baptist to the Congregational sect.

"Until I came here I had always been a Baptist. But there is no longer any reason for the Baptist denomination. It has done its work, it has delivered its message, it has borne its testimony."

Dr. Aked, it will be observed, is a hero of the psychological moment. His leaving the Baptists and the squeezing from the Baptist sect of the last juice of purpose were contemporaneous phenomena. I take it that if he had not been called to the Congregational fold in San Francisco he would have left the Baptists just the same. But he anticipated any comment of this sort.

REV. CHARLES F. AKED

"What attracted me to the church here was its breadth," he explained. "The people here are ready for the light. They sympathize with my conception that the pulpit should take into view the whole of human life. My church is to be interested in everything human beings are interested in. The real devils we have to fight are dirt, disease and drink. I don't want to preach merely about the things which are conventionally religious. Religion has as much to do with the polling booth as the pulpit, with the primary as the presbytery, with swapping horses just as much as with singing hymns. I believe that a church whose outlook is broad enough will attract those who do not go to church."

It was extremely interesting but, to my old fashioned notions, extremely revolutionary. My curiosity was excited, so I asked him what one would have to believe to belong to his church.

I am still in doubt whether he regarded me as a stray looking for the fold, a maverick ready for the branding. But assuredly he displayed considerable enthusiasm in kicking down the barriers which might have separated me from the true faith.

"In the way of denominational dogma we believe absolutely nothing," he specified; "but we hold to those beliefs which are common to Protestantism everywhere—God, Christ, the Atonement, the Resurrection and so on. But we don't define these beliefs."

I am sure I looked stupid, because I felt stupidly unintelligent. Dr. Aked showed his pity for my benighted state by explaining:

"No, we don't define these beliefs. As soon as you begin to define you begin to limit. Another man's definition binds you and your definition binds him. Take the Resurrection for instance. Half a dozen men have half a dozen theories to explain it. But they have a ground of agreement."

I must have worn a dubious air.

"The Church," he explained. "The Church can hold all their theories. The Church accepts the fact and allows people to explain the fact as they wish. The great facts are God, the divinity of Christ and the immortality of the soul. The whole body of Christendom will stand firm on these facts."

I felt hot and stuffy in the presence of this porous-knit Christianity, but I managed weakly to say something about Unitarianism.

"Unitarianism has done a great work," conceded the doctor. "It has taught me that Jesus is human as well as divine; that He had a heart as well as a soul. I think I see a way out of the controversy between the Trinitarians and the Unitarians. The Unitarians see in God the Father all that the Trinitarians see in God the Son while the Trinitarians see in God the Father all that the Unitarians see in God the Son. Really I find no reason for the continued use of the words Unitarian and Trinitarian."

Here was a breaking of barriers with a vengeance. It sounded plausible when the doctor said it. But for the life of me I can't get its significance. Has it any? I might have asked for light but just then Dr. Aked hurled the Bible at my head. Metaphorically of course.

"As to the Bible, a very large and liberal view is permitted to everybody. The old view of the Bible is dead and gone. It only exists among the most illiterate."

That hit me right between the eyes and dazed me. It filled me with sorrow too. Poor sacred book! Poor millions who still hold to the old view that the doctor says is dead and gone! Poor pigmies of the intellect who have expounded and still expound an exegesis condemned by this giant of the current year! Illustrious names flitted through my fevered mind. Gladstone was

The Canned Convention

The newspapers are beginning to take note of the fact that the state convention which will meet in May next year to send delegates from California to the national Republican convention for the nomination of candidates for president and vice-president will be a canned convention. Under the law passed by the Legislature of two years ago the county conventions which will send delegates to the state convention will not be new bodies chosen in response to the current popular political ideas. They will simply consist of reassemblings of the county conventions which met last year before the August primaries to send delegates to the state convention which formulated the party platform. The San Diego Union points to this fact and says it will allow Hiram Johnson, Meyer Lissner and their associates to "steal the State for La Follette." "The same men," it says, " who did the bidding of Johnson and Lissner at the county conventions last year and chose a State convention subservient to their will, will be the ones to name the convention at which the second betrayal of the party is to be consummated." The Riverside Press says that the "delegates will represent conditions two years old and there may be sweeping changes of sentiment within that period to which they would not be responsive." The San Bernardino Sun rather exultingly points out to those who are complaining of the mare's-nest, that it gave a warning about it during the last session of the Legislature when there was still time to change the law. "Not a member of the dominant element," it says, "had the courage to attack this piece of monumental political stupidity." Even Deacon Pillsbury of the "California Outlook" takes a crack at the reformers on this score. "The blunt truth is," confesses this high priest of reform, "that a present attractive advantage has, most regrettably, outweighed loyalty to a fundamental principle that the will of the people shall find ample means of expression whenever the people have a will that they wish to express. About this time in the year of our Lord 1912 the people of California will have a will that they wish to express, and no adequate way of expressing it will have been afforded them. The ghost of this bit of politics will rise to plague us."

The Great Chinese Loan

The United States has at last entered the financial councils of nations regarding Chinese affairs. This important step was taken a fortnight ago when the agreement for a loan to the Chinese government of fifty million dollars was signed by representatives of American, English, German and French high finance. The loan was projected as an American enterprise purely, and was then sought by the Chinese for political purposes. Later a suggestion was made to allow European capital to take part in the loan and after negotiations covering several months an agreement was reached providing that four banking groups of the United States, England, Germany and France should participate equally and that the financial adviser to the Chinese government with regard to the loan should come from a neutral European state. The banking interests concerned are the Morgan houses, the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Company, the Bank of Indo-China and the Deutsche East-Asiatic Bank The loan is secured by the provincial revenues. Five millions will be paid immediately, five millions when the Powers have approved of the Chinese currency reform and the Manchurian development schemes, and the balance in monthly installments. The loan is to be made at 95 and is to be covered by a bond issue, the bonds to mature at a period of from forty to forty-five years and to bear five per cent interest. The appointment of a neutral financial expert is now being discussed. The Japanese papers are devoting much space to this "four-Power loan." Japan hoped the negotiations would fail as she did not relish the increase of American and European influence in China.

American Stocks in Germany

The German ministry has been attacked by former Colonial Secretary Dernburg for its "narrow-minded dilettantism" in barring American securities from the German market. His criticism was evoked by the governmental action thought necessary to prevent the purchase of two million dollars of Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul railway shares. He asks whether Germany can afford by such tactics to jeopardize American friendship and the rich German-American trade. He points out: "The United States is the third largest buyer of German industrial products, while we buy $301,000,000 worth from America. Our total trade balance with America is the largest of any we have. In addition, American traffic is worth at least $50,000,000 a year to the German steamship lines, while America is the country in which, with the exception of Germany and Austria, most people of German tongue and origin live. In these circumstances I regard it as nothing short of fatal to turn the full force of our governmental machinery against American securities. Similar Russian and Hungarian securities are allowed access to our market without let or hindrance. Can it be that the government thinks there is more trade for Germany in those countries than in the United States, or that we politically are better friends with them than with the Americans?"

The Wail of a Sentimentalist

John Galworthy is no doubt a fine novelist and a competent playwright, but he is out of tune with modern militarism and his protestations against the use of aeroplanes as a part of military equipment has a purely sentimental value. Decrying what he calls "the prostitution of the conquest of the air to the ends of warfare" he utters this soulful but altogether piffling cry: "If ever men presented a spectacle of sheer insanity," he writes, "it is now—when, having at last triumphed in their struggle to subordinate to their welfare the unconquered element, they have straightway commenced to defile that element, so heroically mastered, by filling it with engines of destruction. If ever the gods were justified of their ironic smile—by the gods, it is now! Is there any thinker alive watching this still utterly preventible calamity without horror and despair? Horror at what must come of it, if not promptly stopped; despair that men can be so blind, so hopelessly and childishly the slaves of their own marvelous inventive powers. Was there ever so patent a case for scotching at birth a hideous development of the black arts of warfare; ever such an occasion for the powers in conference to ban once and for all a new and ghastly menace? A little reason, a grain of common sense, a gleam of sanity before it's too late—before vested interests and the chains of a new habit have enslaved us too hopelessly. If this fresh devilry be not quenched within the next few years it will be too late. Water and earth are wide enough for men to kill each other on. For the love of the sun, and stars, and the blue sky, that have given us all our aspirations since the beginning of time, let us leave the air to innocence. Will not those who have eyes to see, good will toward men, and the power to put that good will into practice, bestir themselves while there is yet time, and save mankind from this last and worst of all its follies?"

Kent Swatted in San Berdoo

The San Bernardino Sun which is quite a conservative journal, had occasion a few days ago to refer to Congressman "Bill" Kent of Kentfield and this is what it said: "If any regular had spent money as did the Congressman from the second district,—well that sort of investigation sent Congressman Sibley, of Pennsylvania, to his grave." It will be recalled that Congressman Sibley paved his way to the House of Representatives with thousands of dollars spent most scandalously. There is therefore a most serious implication in the editorial remark from San Berdoo. It touches the integrity of "Bill" Kent as a seeker of public office. It is referred to here so that he may have an opportunity to reply to it, if he sees fit to vindicate his fair fame against this form of attack.

The Passing of the Ranchos

Gradually the big ranches of the Sacramento Valley are passing to the control of those financially able to subdivide and open the lands to settlement in small tracts. The operations of the Pittsburg Syndicate in Glenn and Colusa counties, the sale of the Haggin Grant near Sacramento and the purchase by Frank L. Vanderlip and his New York associates of the 16,000 Los Molinos rancho near Chico are only three of many such subdivisions. Ranching, points out the Sacramento Bee, is giving way to farming in this fertile valley. And it considers the change decidedly for the better. With the scientific farming which the young agriculturists of the State are learning at the university experimental stations this subdivision of the big holdings appeals to the Bee as most beneficial to Northern California.

The Orderly

By Georges De Lys (From the French)

The French had been driven from the park and were streaming across the level plain. They had held the position for two hours, standing stubbornly against all attacks, but had been forced to give way at last under a rush of fresh troops. Now all order was broken and they were scattering like whirling leaves swept by the wind.

A thin column of smoke was vanishing from the abandoned walls; other columns, still nearer, dragged along the ground and obscured the top of the walls here and there. The steady whistling of bullets had succeeded to the first scattering shots.

A grove stood in the midst of the bare fields, and the fleeing soldiers sought its shelter with mad, reckless dashes in which many fell, mortally wounded; those who survived rushed on in a still more reckless retreat.

Captain Revordy, hurried along with the others, did not waste his strength in struggling against the irrestible torrent. Every effort was strained to bring together the scattered soldiers, and he succeeded in placing himself boldly at the head of the retreat, in leading it to friendly shelter of the trees and in making a stand there where others might rally.

The soldiers reached the spot worn out, with hot throats, their heads throbbing from the tumultuous rush of blood. As soon as they touched the edge of the grove they threw themselves into the nearest thicket, keeping close to the ground and crawling along the hollows of the ditches. With shouts and gestures Revordy summoned the officers and, aided by a few brave men, he held back the rout, formed the ranks, assigned each one to his place and prepared to make the last stand, the last defense.

A sergeant whispered something of importance in his ear; the cartridge boxes were nearly all empty. The captain then gave the order: "Let no one fire until I give command!"

That calm voice aroused new courage in the men, for he breathed his own courage and energy into them. The captain was a short, thickset man, with strong limbs. His face was burned by his many campaigns, for Revordy had fought from the Crimea to Mexico, and there was the dull red hue of copper under the brown tan, while from this glowing face blazed out a pair of large, clear, prominent eyes.

Some one shouted, "Here they are!" The enemy had formed under the shelter of the walls and the defeated soldiers noticed that they were preparing for a new attack. The Germans drew closely together at the hoarse commands of their captains; then the lines shook and moved forward.

Revordy watched the approaching enemy. They were moving straight toward the little silent wood, where there was no sound save the tense breathing of his men. They were scarcely three hundred yards from the first trees, advancing in dark, straight lines, making an easy target; then the captain gave the command: "Fire!" The edge of the grove seemed to burst out into sudden flame as it poured forth its volleys; then all was lost in smoke. But their ears told them what their eyes failed to see; they heard the hoarse shrieks and groans of the dying; then the frightened trampings of a disorderly retreat shook the frozen ground, growing more and more distant, until they ceased.

Then Revordy thundered out: "Stop firing!" The smoke passed away, entangling its spiral whiteness in the branches of the trees, and when it had grown clear they saw only a heap of brown bodies lying in furrows; the enemy had retreated to the park, and was already under cover of its walls. Other troops attacked them on the flank, and Revordy strengthened the position of his little company, grouping the squads about the sides. Then, encouraged by the support of the struggling companies who were gaining ground, the first assailants decided to risk another attack from the front. The volleys again made fearful havoc in the ranks; they wavered an instant, but the empty places were filled and the advance continued, for the men were encouraged, carried along by the enthusiasm of the German captain at the head of the line. But suddenly there was confusion. The chief had fallen, and the enemy had lost the soul which animated it.

"That's what you can call a true weapon!" shouted a proud voice. Revordy turned around and recognized his orderly:

"What! Did you do it, Frechou?"

"Sure, captain. I tell you that this primer can be depended upon!"

The officer smiled at the soldier ,and the same thrill of pride warmed their hearts, united by a common danger and the love of a common cause.

Revordy's attention was soon turned to a new danger. On the left the enemy was invading the little grove and threatening to cut off the retreat. The firing was growing less frequent. Gloomy men were looking with desperate faces in their empty cartridge boxes.

The captain shouted: "Bayonets to the cannon's mouth!" The soldiers rose, for they understood him. "Comrades, we must pass over the bodies of those men! Forward!"

Revordy raised his sword, and his soldiers advanced against the threatening wing. The brave captain staggered and fell with a bullet in his stomach. The impulse, however, had been given; the Frenchmen jostled, fell over, sprawled through the living lines of human breasts, until they had crossed the last one.

The Germans stopped to rest in the position they had so dearly purchased. Far off in the distance, the little company which survived their last volley was disappearing, while a few French stragglers were rallying about it. Suddenly they noticed that one of these isolated forms was growing larger, that it was approaching them, and making straight for the little grove. Soon the figure was clearly outlined, and the astonished victors saw that it wore the uniform of a French soldier.

In the meantime the major had collected the remnant of his battalian. When he saw the man approaching he gave orders to allow him to come past the range of their rifles—to capture him without injury. Soon they realized that the soldier was without arms, that he was advancing with a brisk step, a calm countenance and with his head held high.

At the enemy's first challenge he answered simply:

"My captain."

The major had him brought before him and questioned him:

"Who are you?"

"Frechou, Jacques Frechou, soldier of the third regiment, Captain Revordy's orderly."

"What do you want?"

"My captain, who fell when we charged."

"What! You escaped, and have come back to us again?"

"The captain ordered us to force our way through your troops. We obeyed his order. I am his orderly. It is my duty to take care of him if he is sick, or to bury him if he is dead."

The Prussian looked at the man with a kindly eye: "Your captain is not dead. We have brought him in from the field, and you may take care of him. Muller, take this man to the French captain!"

Frechou bowed low: "Thanks, major. There's the making of a Frenchman in you!"

The major smiled and said nothing.

The bullet which had struck down Captain Revordy had just been extracted. Exhausted by the operation, crushed by the defeat, he lay with closed eyes, realizing in the bitterness of his soul that he was vanquished, powerless and a prisoner. Must he die here among the enemy without one word of farewell to those whom he loved?

"Captain!" The word sounded like a carol of joy in the ears of the wounded officer; he opened his eyes and saw his faithful orderly standing by his side.

"Is it you, Frechou?" Then his happy cry of recognition was stifled by a sudden sadness: "They have captured you, too."

The soldier drew himself up: "Not a bit of it, captain! We stepped right through them, just as you ordered. Sergeant Rastaire led the others back to the battalion. When I saw everything was all right, I came back to you."

The officer held out his hand: "Thanks, my brave comrade." Frechou took it, overcome by his emotion. After a little he continued: "The Prussian commander—a decent sort of a fellow, if he is a Prussian—has given me the right to care for you. You will soon be cured now."

Revordy closed his eyes: "Cured! Yes, and forever. Well, at any rate I shall not die alone."

"You must not talk like that," murmured the orderly, trying to keep down his own grief.

"Yes, my friend, I ought to talk about it. My wound is fatal. Tomorrow you will bury me. Let my cross remain on my breast, and keep my pocketbook for old time's sake. Come, now, there isn't much in it!" he said, as Frechou made a gesture of refusal. "I shall sleep on French soil, but it is still covered by the enemy! Oh, the cruelest part, Frechou, of it all is that I can no longer help to chase them out of it!"

Revordy became silent, a mist swam before his eyes, and his mind began to wander. When he felt the end near he murmured: "Your hand, Frechou!" He died, soothed by the brave, faithful grasp of his comrade's hand.

Frechou bought various pieces of cloth, red, white and blue, with the money he found in Revordy's pocketbook. In rough soldier fashion, he sewed these strips together, so that the captain's winding-sheet was a flag. An armed German company attended his funeral and paid the last military honors to this officer who had died for his country. Frechou followed the bier, upon which lay the worn, shabby coat whose gilt

Old Sleuth on the Job

The capture of the dynamiters by Gumshoe Burns abounds in all the elements of good old-fashioned melodrama. It reminds one of the most thrilling performances of Old Sleuth. As narrated by the reporter of the Hearst newspapers who was taken into the detective's confidence in time to celebrate the great achievement it reads like one of the old yellow-backs that made us pop-eyed in the days of our youth. A good story, it must be admitted. Detective Burns is deserving of applause and felicitation, and the whole country must rejoice at his success in rounding up the most dangerous scoundrels that have been abroad in this country for many a year. I hope, however, that I may be permitted to indulge in an aside—an unobtrusive chuckle. All melodrama touches my risibles.

The Ways of the Tribe

With the detective in his variety I am intimately acquainted, having studied him at close range through a period of years, when, as a police reporter I was in touch with his doings, the companion of his hours of leisure, his humble associate in the investigation of crime and in the pursuit of criminals. As a cub reporter there was enchantment for me in the dim haze of mystery that enveloped crime, and I had keen admiration for the men whose business it was to penetrate motives, decipher clues and gather evidence of guilt. I believed for a time that every successful detective was a M. Dupin or a Sherlock Holmes. That is what every detective wishes you to believe, and to induce this belief all detectives employ dramatic expedients to give color and thrill to their achievements and to remove them as far as possible from the domain of the commonplace. As a matter of fact there is nothing more commonplace than the business of a detective, nothing more mechanical than the methods by which detectives accomplish their ends, and if you become familiar with those methods you can extract a great deal of amusement from their melodramatic performances. Detective William J. Burns is typical of the whole tribe of detectives. If he is singular in anything it is in his alertness for dramatic effects. He is the most theatric of all living detectives, and for this reason he is more successful in capturing crooks than in convicting them. When he gets into court and all his performances are laid bare then the jury begins to grow sceptical. I do not dispute that the men captured by Burns are guilty; but the probability of their conviction is another matter. If such a detective as the late I. W. Lees had made the capture I would be more confident of ultimate success. Lees was never satisfied with merely catching a crook. His greatest pride was in his triumphs in court.

The Detective's Friend

Detective Burns would have us believe that he has been on the trail of the dynamiters ever since the blowing up of the Times' building in Los Angeles. Reading between the lines of the newspaper stories it is clear enough that it is a case of the pitcher going to the well too often. Dynamite outrages have been occurring all over the country since that awful tragedy in Los Angeles. By their repeated audacities the murderers supplied the authorities with many clues. Besides, the probability is that the big rewards induced treachery. Very likely when the truth comes out we shall learn that what is now represented to be detective ingenuity is nothing of the kind. The first aid to the detective is always the stool-pigeon. In San Francisco his name was Roy and he came to Burns just as the great detective was on the point of despairing, folding up his tent and stealing away.

The Ingenuous Wood

Knowing as I do both the theatric detective and the enthusiastic, gullible cub reporter who is always eager to make his story as sensational as possible, I have derived much entertainment from the Examiner's accounts of the capture of the dyamiters. The Hearst papers were given the inside track by Burns, and out of gratitude, to borrow from the vernacular of the local room, "they played him up big." No detail was omitted that might serve to impress readers with the masterly, almost clairvoyant ingenuity of the detective. In the first instalment we were told that when the dynamiters were hunting for game in the Wisconsin woods Burns's men were hunting there also; when the dynamiters were at the theatre, the detectives were at their elbow. I was reminded of that story of other days—pure fiction—that young Burns tracked Mayor Schmitz through Europe and sat with him in music halls in Berlin and Paris. A hint of the truth about the capture of the dynamiters came in the second instalment when Captain Stephen Wood, Chief of the Chicago Detective Bureau, told of the full confession that had been made at the home of Detective Reed. Evidently Burns, who was in Ohio, was not aware that Wood had taken the reporters into his confidence. When he was questioned about the confession doubtless he supposed it was mere rumor. So he said, "I have made no attempt to get confessions. I don't need them. When one has a case as strong as this a confession would only hamper one in court." To be sure, and when one knows that a confession has been made one marvels no longer at the detective's ingenuity in uncovering "plants" that he has been told about.

So Easy!

The reporter who was with Burns was in ignorance respecting the confession. He had merely received instructions by wire to find out about it, the supposition being that Burns would be as truthful as Captain Wood. So we read, "As in Indianapolis Burns was sure of his ground before he made a move. He knew exactly where the explosive was to be found." And again: "Burns spent the day moving about Ohio, finding dynamite plants which, he declares, were made by McNamara. He found them with as little seeming difficulty as one picks up pebbles on a sea-shore." How necromantic! Very much so, till we consult the prosaic, candid Captain Wood: "The plants found since the Indianapolis arrests were told of in the confession."

Real Melodrama

By reason of what was confessed Burns obtained a warrant to search for certain books in the office of the Iron Workers' Association. He knew what was in the safe. The reporter who accompanied him supposed that he was after another plant. The reporter describes what happened: "'I am Burns, the detective,' he said. And again: 'This safe's got to come open,' said Burns, as he looked at his followers. 'I'll tackle the job myself.'" Then, according to the reporter Burns took a drill and went to work. Says the reporter: "It reminded one of the thriller scene in Jimmy Valentine, except that this Jimmy was the greatest detective in the world instead of the greatest stage safe cracker." An attorney protested against the opening of the safe. What did Burns do? The excited reporter tells us: "Instead of speaking to the angry attorney he bit his sandy mustache." The reporter continues: "He was drilling into possible death, but not a muscle quivered. There were tense moments until the drill bit through." In addition to all this we learn, but on whose authority I don't know, that when McNamara was arrested he said: "Billy Burns is the only man in Chicago I fear. I wonder if he's here now." If this isn't material for a good melodrama I'm dreaming.

An Incredible Story

My contemporary, The Knave of the Oakland Tribune, tells a story in explanation of the award of the flower concession in the ferry building for three thousand a year less than the highest bid. He says that the successful bidder shrewdly supplied floral decorations at cost price for "an entertainment given by a person very, very close to Governor Johnson"; also, "that the decorations were of such a character as to in every way please the hostess." All of which was done at the suggestion "of the politically wise men of the harbor front." A very interesting story; but one that must excite the indignation of every friend of the most righteous, the purest of gubernatorial dispensations. It goes without saying that if Governor Johnson should hear of this scandalous story he would immediately order an investigation. A man of his inflexible integrity will not ignore the imputation that he is subject to the improper influence of a person who accepts floral decorations at cost price. Who is this hostess "very, very close to Governor Johnson" by whom the Governor has been suggestionized? The story is incredible, and perhaps for that reason it may not be deserved worthy of investigation.

The Rivalry of Marsden and Percy

I hear that there is considerable rivalry between City Engineer Marsden Manson and City Attorney Percy Long as to which shall bulk most conspicuously in the approaching hearing on Hetch-Hetchy before Walter Fisher, the new Secretary of the Interior. Marsden is perfectly willing to admit that Percy has done wonders in the fight to bring Hetch-Hetchy water to San Francisco and Percy is equally enthusiastic in proclaiming the value of Marsden's services to the municipality. But they differ on one point. Percy considers that Marsden has merely acted as his assistant while Marsden thinks that Percy was his coadjutor. Each thinks that it will be for the best interest of the cause for the other to subordinate himself when the hearing is had. But subordination is not listed in the catalogue of either's virtues. Playing second fiddle is a form of musical diversion to which neither is warmly attached. Consequently there will be heartburning before the question of precedence is settled.

"Honesty, my son," said the millionaire, "is the best policy."

"Well, perhaps it is, dad," rejoined the youthful philosopher, "but it strikes me you have done pretty well, nevertheless."

A Bold, Bad Critic

Of the professional standing of Mr. Albert B. Chandler of the St. Louis bar I haven't the faintest knowledge, but from the manner in which he writes I am quite certain that his bump of reverence is imperfectly developed. Mr. Chandler has been criticising the code of ethics adopted some time ago by our Bar Association. Writing in the legal publication called "The Docket" he takes the liberty of making fun of that code. To him it is a scream, the best joke he has come across in a long time. Bold bad man! Apparently he doesnt know that Mr. Charlie Wheeler, and other lawyers of the loftiest ideals helped to formulate that code. Surely if he had known this he wouldn't have poked his jibes at the edifying instrument. For Mr. Wheeler and the men who collaborated with him on that code were seriously impelled when they set their minds to the drafting of this legal decalogue. I know whereof I speak when I declare that most positively they did not go to work in the fashion the irreverent Mr. Chandler would have us suppose. Most assuredly they had no thought of "paraphrasing the Sermon on the Mount and the Marquis of Queensbury rules to form an up-to-date code of honor for forensic combat." On their behalf I resent Mr. Chandler's slighting reference to "these San Francisco reformers." I repudiate his deduction that the fault with our code of ethics is that it does "not fit the case in this day and time;" that its formulators would "put the Recording Angel into court to anticipate the final judgments of the Lord;" and that their work is a "sort of Utopian caprice." I scorn his conclusion that under the new code "we must have Puck and the fairies to hold court for us." Is Mr. Chandler of St. Louis making euphemistic reference to some of our sacrosanct benchers?

Patigian Wins

Once more a fine tribute has been paid to the genius of our premier young sculptor, Haig Patigian. To him has been awarded the contract to sculpture the monument which is to be erected at the junction of Grant avenue, Market and O'Farrell streets to commemorate the rebuilding of San Francisco. This award was made by a committee of artists in whose judgment the design submitted by Patigian surpassed in significance, grace and expression the designs of twenty-five competitors among whom was Robert I. Aitken of Paris and New York, designer of the Dewey monument in Union Square. Patigian's conception is a granite monolith, thirty-one feet in height surmounted by a bronze phoenix, with a bronze figure of Industry in an attitude of rest standing at the base of the shaft. The model is a very graceful composition that speaks a language that all can understand.

He's Up and Doing

Last week I reported that many of our preachers were alarmed at the coming of that star pulpit performer, Rev. Charles Aked and that Dr. Rader was one of whom it was predicted that because of the prospect of vacant spaces in the pews at Calvary he would lose some sleep in quest of a hobby for a counter-agency. It appears that Dr. Rader's insomnia has already borne fruit. Last Sunday it was reported in one of the dailies that Calvary was "in the midst of innovations." The pastor is to have an assistant to superintend the Sunday school, a medical clinic is to be established and a church employment bureau. Verily the counter-agency is already in operation. Now let us see what the other clergymen will do. Dr. Rader has done his best to rouse them out of their lethargy. Last Sunday night he preached on the question, "Are the Preachers of San Francisco Amiable Nobodies?" Perhaps after looking them over Dr. Aked will be kind enough to tell us what he thinks about them —not omitting Dr. Rader.

How Dr. Aked Became Famous

Dr. Aked has been telling some of his new friends here how he first won renown as a pulpiteer. As a young man he was called to a church in Liverpool which had sunk into insignificance and possesed a congregation of only sixty-five. His nephew was with him at the time and one morning after a midnight supper the two went fishing, arriving at the fishing pond at about the hour of three. "Most opportunely for me," says Dr. Aked in telling the story, "a man had drowned himself.' Finding the clothes on the bank of the pond Dr. Aked dived into the water and brought out the unfortunate. The inquest was written up at considerable length in the newspapers and the fact that a clergyman went fishing at such an ungodly hour attracted considerable attention. The result was that when Dr. Aked preached his first sermon in the moribund parish the church was packed and the police had to regulate the crowds, just as they did on Easter Sunday when he preached his first sermon here. Shortly afterwards Charles Bradlaugh, the atheiest, died and Dr. Aked advertised that he would preach a sermon about his career. Again he had a packed church. From that time on, the doctor says, he filled the church every Sunday. At the time of the Boer war he espoused the unpopular side. He was mobbed on the street, efforts were made to kill him and his house was wrecked. But he went on preaching to crowded congregations. Naturally Dr. Aked believes in advertising.

Who Is This Versifier?

By the way, certain members of Dr. Aked's new congregation are indignant about a poem recently published in the New York Sun which, rightly or wrongly, they regard as a slur on the reverend gentleman's acceptance of his "call" to this city. The poem was signed "R. H. Titherington" and the indignant Congregationalists are demanding information about the man who so styles himself. They are also asking with considerable heat why the New York Sun should publish such a set of verses right after Dr. Aked left the metropolis. They think that the paper has gone out of its way to slam their new pastor. And they point out that Dr. Aked is not receiving $15,000 a year, as the poem says he is. In order that the anger of the parishioners of Dr. Aked may be appreciated it may be just as well to publish the poem. It is called

Elbert Hubbard as a "Vode"

Elbert Hubbard filled a recent column of the Examiner with his experiences of the vaudeville stage. As a result of his experience he advises wouldbe "vodes," as he calls them, to refrain from following their ambition. He thinks vaudeville is to much of a strain. "That twenty minutes, afternoon and evening, burns up all your phosphorus, and between times you are getting ready for that awful twenty minutes. No good player ever grows blase and calloused. That twenty minutes is standing right out before him from the minute he awakens, and the better you play the more the thing stands on the footboard and leers at you. During that intense twenty minutes the actor is carrying ten thousand volts on a line that is only built for a thousand. Inside, you are ready to burst. Outside is the vacuum which you yourself are obliged to fill, or else be smothered by the lack of reciprocal pressure which holds the planets in space." All of which is interesting as indicating a state of mind. It tells us that Hubbard thinks he is a good actor and that his experience as a "vode" had an almost cosmic significance. Or perhaps the reference to planets was a modest way of confessing that he was a star.

The Joke's on Wallie

Occasionally Waldemar Young, the Chronicle's genial collector of "bits of color," displays a lack of erudition, with the result that his readers extract a laugh which he did not intend. For instance, on Monday "Wallie" published the following lines:

"Larger fleas have smaller fleas
Upon their backs to bite 'em,
And smaller fleas have smaller fleas,
And so—ad infinitum!"

"This is so true," commented Wallie, "that new or not, I take it from the morning's mail with glee and use it, giving 'A Reader" who sent it, full credit." Is it possible that "Wallie" did not know that the original of these garbled lines is very old? If he will only turn to Dean Swift's poems he will find the original which runs as follows:

"So, naturalists observe, a flea
Has smaller fleas that on him prey;
And these have smaller still to bite 'em;
And so proceed ad infinitum."

In the same poem from which these were taken "Wallie" would have found a couplet with which he might very appropriately have rebuked "A Reader," whoever that plagiarizing chap may be:

"Libertas et natale solum;
Fine words! I wonder where you stole 'em.

Speaking of Plagiarisms

Speaking of plagiarisms reminds me that Rudyard Kipling has just been accused of this offense. The accuser couches his charge in euphemistic terms. He says "The Recessional" is "heavily indebted to tradition," taking some of its language from the Bible and Watts' familiar hymn, "Oh God, our help in ages past." More specifically attention is called to the resemblance between the lines

The tumult and the shouting dies,
The captains and the kings depart, and these lines in Lowell's "Commemoration Ode:"

Great captains with their guns and drums
Disturb our judgment for the hour,
But at last silence comes;
These all are gone.

The line, "Dominion over palm and pine," seems to have been borrowed from Emerson's "Woodnotes:"

And grant to dwellers with the pine
Dominion o'er the palm and vine.

All of which may be perfectly convincing but will not disturb Kipling a bit. Did he not sing years ago:

When 'Omer smote 'is bloomin' lyre,
He 'eard men sing by land an' sea;
An' what 'e thought 'e might require,
'E went an' took—the same as me!

The market girls an' fishermen,
The shepherds an' the sailors, too,
They 'eard old songs turn up again,
But kep' it quiet—the same as you!

They knew 'e stole; 'e knew they knowed.
They didn't tell, nor make a fuss,
But winked at 'Omer down the road,
An' 'e winked back—the same as us!

Lackaye's Borrowed Gem

For many years it has been taken for granted that Wilton Lackaye, moved by the tragic unfulfillment of Maurice Barrymore's brilliant career, wrote the following lines as his epitaph:

He walked beneath the stars,
He slept beneath the sun,
He lived a life of going to do
And died with nothing done.

Whether Lackaye ever claimed these lines I cannot say, but certainly they have been attributed to him time and time again without eliciting any disclaimer of authorship on his part. Whenever he comes to San Francisco somebody digs them up and prints them as his and he has never protested. As a matter of fact they are very old lines and were written for the tomb of John Aubrey, the English antiquary. Lackaye may have first heard them from Joseph Jefferson who was fond of quoting them.

Emerson or Hubbard?

While on this subject it is interesting to note that there has been a great pother in the East over the authorship of the following: "If you write a better book, or preach a better sermon, or build a better mousetrap than your neighbor, though you build your house in the woods, the world will make a beaten path to your door." Most people think that the lines are Emerson's but they are not to be found in any of his published writings. Someone wrote to Elbert Hubbard who prides himself on his knowledge of Emerson's writings, for a solution of the mystery and got a characteristic response. Hubbard said that he had written the sentence himself and palmed it off as Emerson's. "I have given as much to Emerson, Schopenhauer, Nietzsche and Whitman as I ever took from them," he modestly admitted. "That they are dead and cannot receive my gifts in exchange for theirs is not my fault." So here we have plagiarism turned topsy-turvy. But it is hard to believe that if Hubbard had written so good a sentence he would have attributed it to another. The Fra does not move in that self-sacrificing way his wonders to perform.

MURPHY, GRANT & CO.

Olga's New Kiss

I have the authority of Miss Nethersole that the kiss with which she brings the first act of "Sister Beatrice" to a close is a very different sort of a kiss from that which she made notorious in "Carmen" and "Sapho." For the benefit of students of the interesting science of philematology, a science which is by no means neglected in these days though very little is written about it, I will quote what Miss Nethersole told an interviewer. "The Carmen kiss," she explained, "was an expression of the violent love she felt, the warm-blooded sensuality. It had to be more or less colored with the illusion of sensuality. But the Sister Beatrice kiss is an entirely different kind of kiss. It is a symbolical kiss. It is meant to express the renunciation of the woman to the love which she cannot avoid. It is meant to express the surrender of the soul, of a soul which up to that moment had been devoted to the service of religion and would be henceforth devoted to the adoration of a man. It is a beautiful episode in a beautiful play, that kiss." I trust my readers appreciate the difference. One was a body kiss; the other is a soul kiss. But the lips are used in both cases. The symbolism makes all the difference. But the effect is probably the same.

Poet Bashford Strikes Oil

Let us sit up and take notice of Herbert Bashford, poet and dreamer by virtue of temperament, newspaper drudge by reason of certain sensual appetites that will not be denied. Bashford is one of the lesser lights of our innumerable literary colony. Long ago he got himself between book covers having had the good fortune to find a rash publisher with the courage to take a chance with his poems. In his slender moments of leisure he looked up the technique of the drama and tried his hand at play-writing, the result being a pot-boiler or two which were accepted for provincial production. Encouraged by evidence that the children of his genuius were actually able to stand on their own feet behind the footlights he took himself seriously and went in for dramaturgy with enthusiasm. One day with play under his arm he appeared at a temple of Thespis in San Jose where the works of the highbrows of the drama are made to edify the common people at ten cents a throw. He submitted his play to the manager who liked the title "The Woman He Married." "A play with such a title," said the manager, "must be full of heart interest. I'll produce it." And he did, and the play ran for weeks to packed houses. I heard so much about the play that I ran down to see it. The play held me to the wind-up. It also held Virginia Harned who came down from Reno where she had slipped off the Sothern yoke. Virginia has been starring in that play ever since, and Bashford has been rolling in wealth. His royalties have never gone below six hundred a month since Virginia took hold. A pretty good practical poet is Bashford, and singularly enough his poems have poetry in them.

More Papers for Hearst

From Seattle comes word that William Randolph Hearst is negotiating for the purchase of the Post-Intelligencer, the big daily of the northern city. Hearst feels that his political plans will be assisted by another paper on the Pacific Coast and he has definitely turned to Seattle, having decided that Portland is not a good field for one of his yellows. The owners of the "P-I" are willing to sell if they can get their price, but they want Hearst to pay for the good will of the paper which means nothing to him; so there has been a halt in the business. Meanwhile, on the other side of the world, there is a revival of the rumor that Hearst is to have a paper in London. In fact I learn that it is the gossip of Fleet Street that Hearst has owned the Weekly Budget for some months past. It is said that Hearst paid $15,000 for this small paper. Its appearance has been altered and a comic supplement made one of its features. Hearst emphatically denies that he owns the Budget. He says that it was purchased by Blakely Hall who was formerly a Hearst correspondent in London and that Hall had made arrangements with the Hearst News Syndicate for the use of the comic supplements. "I have no intention of entering the newspaper business in London," says Hearst. But the wise ones persist in regarding this as the language of diplomacy.

Geraldine Bonner's Play

Miss Mary Austin and Miss Geraldine Bonner are not the best of friends, literary and social jealousies having from time to time arrayed them against each other. So it was not to be expected that Geraldine would enthuse when Mary's "Arrow Maker" was produced at the New Theater. Similarly Mary is no doubt unimpressed by the production of Geraldine's play at the Playhouse, Brady's new theater in New York. Geraldine's play, written in collaboration with Hutcheson Boyd, is a farce called "Sauce for the Goose." By the way, Geraldine is fond of collaboration; she collaborated with handsome Elmer Harris on "Sham" which was given here by Florence Roberts. According to the New York critics "Sauce for the Goose" is not an epoch-making play. One of them says, "It hardly seems to have body enough to promise any very prolonged popularity in this city. A pleasant little farce, with many neatly turned phrases, and an occasional moment that is really ludicrous, it is still conventional in theme and treatment, and almost always quite obvious as to what will happen next. It is, in other words, rather thin sauce with hardly enough spice to make it permanently palatable." After detailing the plot which presents time-honored complications, the critic sums up: "It is equally true that there are no especially striking developments, so the general result is merely another of those agreeable little farces which lend themselves fairly well to the skill of good comedians, provide a couple of hours of diversion, and, in the end, hardly make a ripple on the surface of the general theatrical sea. In this particular case something less of interest results from the fact that almost all of the characters are in themselves unimpressive, if not to say downright silly. The wife is a goose, the husband we should describe by a title nearer that of a certain domestic quadruped beast of burden, the adventuress is so apparent a fraud that only people of extreme mental sluggishness would have been deceived by her, and the others do not particularly matter. It will be evident, therefore, that the serio-comic happenings in a household of this sort cannot take any very strong hold upon the sympathy. And especially when it is remembered also that the main situation is one of the most familiar friends of the overworked dramatist."

Those Secret Indictments

Ever since the Grand Jury of Los Angeles returned some thirty indictments which were placed on the secret file, speculation has been rife in local labor circles as to the identity of the persons against whom the true bills were returned. It has been whispered that two very prominent labor leaders of this city are among the indicted, but of course time alone will tell whether this sinister whisper has any basis in fact. There can be no doubt however that gumshoe men have been busy among the labor organizations of this city. I know of at least one prominent labor man here who has been persistently shadowed ever since the Los Angeles "Times" explosion.

To Abolish Stanford

"Have you heard that there is a movement on foot for the abolition of Stanford University," a certain editor of a morning paper asked me the other day. Knowing him to be something of a wag I encouraged him to out with it. "It's to be abolished on the ground that it is a Biblical antithesis," he continued. I responded with the interrogative look which is de rigueur in cases of this sort. "Why, yes," he concluded, "a biblical antithesis. You see, if you cross Jordan you get hell." As Macuulay said about his toothache, the agony has abated.

Sarah's Entourage

The divine Sarah comes to us with much human impedimenta. In her entourage is a female companion who has shared her comings and goings for twenty years, a physician, an English tutor (for Bernhardt thinks that she is still young enough to master our language), two maids and a valet. The valet sounds unusual for a woman, but nevertheless several actresses indulge in this masculine luxury. Mrs. Pat Campbell would as soon have thought of traveling without "Pinky Panky Poo" as without her valet. The unfortunate Mary Scott created quite a sensation at the old Grand Opera House by employing a masculine "maid" in her dressing room.

A Rare Jewel Collection

A most beautiful and unusual collection of rare jewels, with Roman and Egyptian antiquities, is that of Signor Perera, who occupies space for a few days only at the Paul Elder & Company art rooms, No. 239 Grant avenue. Signor Perera was at one time Consul for Italy; he resigned this position to take up the work of collecting Egyptian antiquities. Every year he makes a trip to Egypt where he gathers some of the finest specimens. These rare gems he has set from his own designs into the most exquisite jewelry, each piece having a particular individuality, the historical association, as well as the artistic points, being taken into careful consideration in the setting. The collection is quite different from anything of the sort ever seen here before, and the San Francisco art lover has an unusual opportunity to view or to obtain for permanent personal enjoyment very wonderful historical jewels. Among the rarest pieces are several Roman gold necklaces about fifteen hundred years old in the condition in which they were found. Some of the other ornaments of pure gold were found in Egyptian sarcophagi. Invitations have been issued to visit the collection, and it is hoped that no person who is interested will miss this opportunity to examine these wonderful works of art which will be taken away next Monday.

A Puzzled Ticket Man

It was at the pay-box of a suburban moving picture show, and the middle-aged spinster, ere putting down her sixpence, demanded of the red-faced showman:

"Surely you can answer my perfectly plain question: Are there any suggestive or indecent films in the programme?"

"Oh, I can answer yer," was the response, "but I wanter know which way to do so to make yer a customer!"

Clothing Talks No. 1

PROFITS

Ordinarily on Men's Clothing there are two profits — one which goes to the manufacturer, out of which he must pay for his expensive selling organization and his extensive advertising campaigns in addition to his overhead costs. The other profit legitimately belongs to the retailer, but the consumer pays for both ultimately.

If the manufacturer could or would sell direct one profit would be eliminated or if the retailer could manufacture his own goods one of the two profits could be cut out. This is exactly what happens to "Wood" clothing, the kind we sell.

S. N. Wood & Co. make it. We are manufacturers and sell to other dealers as well. We distribute it at retail, too. Sell our own product. See the point? One profit is cut out. One only left instead of two. This MUST MEAN and does mean one of two things. Either you get the SAME SUIT cheaper here than elsewhere or the price being equal you get a better constructed—better wearing suit here than in any other shop. We know these to be facts—the question is do YOU know it? If you do you are a "Wood" customer. If you do not we want a chance to convert you by showing you our Suits at $18.50, $22.50 and $25.00.

P. S.—This argument applies to Boys' and Youths' Clothing also. We make our own goods in these lines as well.

A Contretemps at the Claremont

High society across the bay has been wearing a broad grin since the night of the Dernier Cri dance at the Claremont Country Club. But there are two representatives of that fashionable herd who have not been in the mood to share the mirth of their friends. One is a fair and modest maiden, the scion of one of the wealthiest of Oakland's first families, who, on the night in question, emulated the beautiful Mlle. de Maupin. She appeared at the dance in the regulation evening dress of the unskirted sex, and without being recognized slipped into a room where several men were smoking and sat down. The men took a casual glance at her, and never dreaming that a woman was in the room went on with their conversation. Presently into their midst dashed the impulsive Archie Proctor full of a subject which is never introduced in polite conversation, and with no curb on his tongue he rattled on at such a lively rate that the claw-hammered maiden had no time to escape till he had turned at least three periods. In a state of panic she made her exit with the same precipitancy with which Proctor had entered, and of course she was discovered before she had disappeared. The contretemps is now the talk of Oakland.

Puffing the Aristocracy

Is there so much sanguine credulity in society as the bavardes of the daily press appear to think? This is the question that I ask myself every time I read any of the extravagant puffery by which the newspaper sycophants of our provincial aristocracy pay tribute to a lady of wealth. How thick and threefold they lay it on with their bouncing epithets, their hackneyed images and their absurd comparisons! Is it some accomplishment they wish to extol? then invariably is the possessor told that she takes rank with some celebrated professional; that if she so desired she might make a fortune out of her talents. Is it her beauty? then it is like unto that of Psappha the Lesbian, or Lady Hamilton or Diane de Poitiers or some other historical personage renowned for her pulchritude. Thus is reputation made to prance while merit mortified and abashed limps behind. A typical specimen of the sort of thing to which I refer I came across in one of the Sunday papers. I read that Mrs. Kohl "possessed a voice of operatic range and quality, a voice of unusual sweetness and tenderness," that it was "a revelation"; that "had fate compelled its possessor to rely on her own resources for a livelihood instead of lavishing her with great wealth, Mrs. Kohl would be in the class with Gadski, for their voices are of the same quality and timbre." Here we have sublimated, twofold nonsense—something that doesn't mean anything united with something that isn't true. The town is full of voices of operatic range and quality, sweet voices and tender, but it is not to be said of them that they are of any use for stage purposes. There is something else besides range and quality of voice essential to success on the operatic stage, something quite as important as range and quality. Not long ago a Miss Wilson came to town with a voice of range and quality, a voice with sweetness in it and tenderness. The daughter of a Cabinet officer, doubtless she too had been puffed by newspaper sycophants. Indeed she must have been, for she told us that she had been compared to Tetrazzini. It was probably the puffing that she received that caused her to venture upon the professional stage. And what an awful calamity that venture was! I heard Miss Wilson sing in public, and my heart was touched—with pity. I thought to myself, that is what comes of puffing. I have heard Mrs. Kohl sing. She has a nice voice, but she does not give promise of entering Gadski's class. I don't know her, but she gives me the impression that she is a sensible woman, and so I fancy I know what she thinks of the hubdub that I have quoted.

The Brewer-Cudahy Nuptials

For the Brewer-Cudahy wedding Tuesday the Catholic church at San Mateo was filled with the country set. It was of more importance from a social standpoint than any marriage of the year with the exception of the Irwin-Crocker wedding, but not more than two hundred guests gathered at the edifice and only sixty were entertained at the wedding breakfast. Members of the Brewer family from Boston and a number of the Chicago Cudahys came west for the event. The presence of a group of pretty children at the reception was an innovation. The bride's intimates number several of the young married women of San Mateo and Burlingame and they were invited to bring their little ones. Mr. and Mrs. Tom Driscoll who sat at the bride's table had their five-year-old son with them, the Burton Harrison children went with Jennie Crocker and the Howard children were there.

Miss De Sabla's Luck

Miss Vera De Sabla who caught the bride's bouquet was besieged with congratulations and there was a great deal of jollying about the next engagement but Miss De Sabla refused to commit herself. Edward Cudahy and his bride will not desert California but announced to their friends at the wedding that they intend to spend every summer in San Mateo. Miss Amy Brewer will make her home with them and their winters will be spent in Chicago. The bride has been

Soporific Suffragettism

At one of the suffrage meetings of the week I am told on good authority that a practical talk on politics sent several of the most prominent supporters of the cause sound to sleep.

Nothing of this kind happened at the Aked meeting, where the attention was held for two hours of speechifying about the superiority of woman and her rights. I am led to believe that such talk is agreeable to suffragettes while on the other hand they weary of political discussion. It was in explaining the referendum that the speaker of the day sent his hearers to sleep. They proved to be uninterested in dry subjects not pertaining directly to woman's emancipation.

A Threatened Split

A split in the suffrage party is threatened, I am told, by some of the zealous ladies who fear the danger of weakening their cause. It is no doubt a critical time in the crusade. Suffragettes, it seems, are separating themselves from suffragists and there is a growing dissatisfaction among the suffragists whose complaints were first heard over the way they were treated at the Aked meeting when social lines were publicly drawn. The boxes were reserved for society women while workers for the cause were slighted. They are being snubbed on all sides, they say, and women like Mrs. Sullivan who has been head and front of the Votes for Women Club for many years and stands for the principles of Susan B. Anthony are forced into the background while the calcium is turned on a few society women newly recruited who give but little of their time to the actual work. This is the plaint of the suffragists against the suffragettes who they declare wish to make a great crusade for woman's rights into a society fad.

The Other View

The other side of the story, I am told, for which Mrs. Elizabeth Gerberding, Mrs. Lloyd Baldwin and other leaders stand, is that a necessity for the social support exists, and attractive women are more apt to plead the cause with success and win sympathy for it. But these ladies would be indignant if it was suggested that they drew their inspiration from Power's comic pictures of Ysobel the Suffragette in the Hearst papers. Mrs. Austin Sperry and Mrs. Lillian Harris Coffin are between the two factions and would like to reconcile them but the suffragists are sore, in vulgar parlance. The leaders say that time will close the breach and the work of each faction will supplement that of the other.

Maude Fay Not to Wed

As I suggested last week, it was just as well that the many friends of Miss Maude Fay did not show too much haste in cluttering the cable with messages of felicitation when they read in the Examiner the story of her alleged engagement to Prince Luitpold of the royal house of Bavaria. It turns out that the story is untrue. In a cablegram to her family here Miss Fay denied the story. As far as I can make out it was sent to the Hearst papers as part of the regular European correspondence of Vance Thompson, a journalist who is not too scrupulous about his facts when he is dealing with royalties and other prominent people. Instead of using it under Vance Thompson's name, however, the Examiner "played it up" as a "local story," thereby increasing its verisimilitude. It seems to me that there are now two reasons instead of one for felicitating Miss Fay. In the first place her operatic career will not be cut suddenly short and those who regard her as among the great singers of the near future will have an opportunity to find out whether their judgment is sound. Personally I sincerely hope that it is. In the second place, the old-fashioned among us are never too pleased when a splendid American girl marries into the European nobility. The old blood of some of the European houses runs none too pure and the blood of the Wittelsbachs, bluest of the blue though it may be, has a heavy taint in it.

The Vivacious Mrs. Henry

The charming and vivacious Mrs. Kate Voorhies Henry has been almost as much in the public eye of late as her beautiful friend the Princess Kawananakoa who is sometimes called by the irreverent who are weak on pronunciation "Princess Can o' Cocoa." Mrs. Henry, it has been blazed from the housetops, was divided between the soft call of love and the lure o' London town and the coronation of his majesty King George V. It seems that the lure o' London and the coronation triumphed. I feel a little sorry for Mrs. Henry who, I doubt not, did not court the widespread publicity which her cardiac and social plans have received. But 'tis one of the penalties of possessing beauty and charm and good social position that the possessor must move in the glare of the newspaper calcium. I feel sorry also for Mrs. Henry's two sisters, Mrs. Haldimand P. Young and Mrs. Thomas Porter Bishop who are quiet and retiring and always shun the forefront of events. It is pretty generally believed that the sighing swain who pitted his devotion against the fascinations of London in coronation week was young Chapman of the Family Club. But others have pointed to the fact that that irrepressible gray-haired youngster Frank Unger has been very attentive to Mrs. Henry. He was in Honolulu while Mrs. Henry was the guest of the Princess Kawananakoa and was much in their company. So too was Harry Macmillan who achieved fame as a suitor for the hand of Edna Goodrich before she entered into her shortlived romance with Nat Goodwin and we know now that there was nothing in the rumor of his devotion. It is so easy to start these stories.

The Voorhies Family

The late Doctor A. H. Voorhies, the father of Mrs. Henry, came to this city some thirty years ago with his wife and family, migrating from the sunny South. They went to San Jose where they lived for a short time and subsequently moved to San Francisco, occupying an apartment in Bush street. At that time they had only two daughters, Marie (now Mrs. Young) and Kate (now Mrs. Henry). This will enable mathematicians to make some sort of an estimate of Mrs. Henry's age. The present Mrs. Bishop, Mrs. Guy Scott, Lelia and Grantland Voorhies were all born in this city. Dr. Voorhies was an oculist of exceptional abilities and after many years of hard work built up a splendid practice. Mrs. Voorhies inherited a comfortable fortune and built the home in California street where the doctor died two years ago. She is a traveled and cultivated woman. Kate married Malcolm Henry about fifteen years ago, having made his acquaintance in Washington while on a visit to her aunt Mrs. Bailey. He is a descendant of Patrick Henry and though rich in the possession of a wide-spreading family tree has little of this world's goods. He is a clerk in the federal employ in the District of Columbia. When the separation between his charming wife and himself took place, it was sincerely regretted by the many friends of both.

She Was Looking for Brains

After the newspapermen's show at the Valencia last week, there was a midnight dance at the Press Club. The rooms presented a very attractive appearance and were filled with a jolly crowd of revelers who did not turn their thoughts to taxies and the homeward flight until the new day was pretty well advanced. There is an informality about the dances at the Press Club which is delightfully distinctive. Owing to the nature of a reporter's duties it is difficult for him to get into formal togs unless he does so at six o'clock; so on these occasions when the ladies are welcomed to the Press Club there are almost as many tweeds as black coats and white ties in evidence. But that becomes a matter of very small moment when the fun commences and to the credit of the ladies be it said, they always don their prettiest frocks when they accept the hospitality of the scribes. On this occasion the costumes were a delight to the eye and to the artistic sense, a compliment which, it goes without saying, applies with equal force to the ladies themselves. One very beautiful and very attractive girl who commanded a great deal of admiration on this occasion, had confided to a bosom friend the reason why she accepted the bid to the Press Club. "I am tired of the stupid men one meets at the assemblies," she imparted; "and I am going to the Press Club to see if I can't get acquainted with some men of brains." No doubt her wish was gratified. But, to her great confusion, her confidant thought it would be great fun to whisper her purpose to some of the newspapermen and the discreet "jollying" to which she was subjected in consequence made her resolve never to speak her mind in that fashion again. Her name? I refuse absolutely to give it. But the next time you go to a society vaudeville you will undoubtedly see her and applaud her talents.

An Original Entertainment

I don't know of any club except the Press Club which would think of giving a dance at midnight. And I cannot name another club which, attempting such an innovation, would carry it through to a successful issue. Most of the guests attended the show at the Valencia before attending the dance. But seats for that show were exhausted a week before it took place and many were unable to attend. So there was a great deal of astonishment in staid residence districts and at the fashionable apartment houses when young ladies of the utmost propriety of conduct, properly chaperoned of course, started downtown near midnight's witching hour when they are usually in bed. The palm of original ity which must be awarded to this dance belongs also to the entertainment at the Valencia. It was the product of Press Club brains. It was a minstrel show and olio, all the numbers written and produced by members of the club.

The Bavardes Are Sore

I understand that the bavardes of the morning papers who are inclined to be sensitive at times, are not altogether pleased at the treatment they received from the Press Club satirists. The souvenir program of the entertainment was a miniature edition of a Sunday paper and the men who wrote the society pages extended themselves in their efforts to burlesque the piffle which is dished up to readers with Sunday morning's coffee and rolls. I understand that certain bavardes have seen a malicious slant at their handiwork in these satirical articles and have expressed themselves as deeply offended at the banter. Practically the same thing applies to the dramatic critics whose lucubratory characteristics were deftly taken off in imaginary criticisms of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." But they will all, bavardes and critics, recover from their attack of peevishness before the new moon.

Miss Jennie Crocker or Who?

Deep is the mystery which encompasses the arrest down the peninsula of a young woman who, when charged with speeding, declared that her name was Miss Jennie Crocker and that her companion in the car was Mrs. Walter Martin. Miss Crocker, when interviewed on the subject, declared that she had not been stopped by the "auto cop." Now who has been taking her name in vain? Hillsboro and San Francisco are full of curiosity to pierce this riddle of personality. The two ladies had their golf sticks with them, so it is probable that they had been playing on some links not a thousand miles from the scene of their overhauling by the minion of the law on his motorcycle. This should provide amateur detectives with a clue to their identity. The fact that neither had money in her purse is not surprising. Even Miss Crocker might have been found with no money about her. Because she is a millionaire it does not follow that she carries gold certificates with her wherever she goes. But as this was not Miss Crocker the point is irrelevant. It remains to be found out what bold young woman has been taking her name in vain. It also remains to be explained why the officials of San Mateo County did not detect the imposture. Is it possible that these men do not know Miss Crocker when they see her? What surprising ignorance!

Joshing the Hotels

Guy Rowell, house printer for the St. Francis Hotel, seems destined to blossom forth as the Simeon Ford of local hoteldom. He has recently uncovered a pretty talent for humor. Rowell was entrusted with the makeup of a hotel guide for the banquet of the Hotel Men's Association which took place at the St. Francis last week and he rose to the occasion by poking fun at all the principal hotels in the city. His gibes were so neatly turned that his victims were the first to compliment his efforts with the loud guffaw. Of nearly every hotel in his guide Rowell gravely says that "it has housed more notables than all other hotellic structures in America," that being a statement to which hotel press agents are extremely partial. Of the Fairmont he says, "It stands like the storied strongholds of the robber barons of the Rhine. (N. B. This robber baron parallel should not be carried farther)." The Bellevue is "a monolithic poem in cement." The Cadillac has "every convenience, including running water" and is therefore in a position "to clean guests with expedition." The Granada is "situated directly upon the bay shore, at Sutter and Hyde streets, as shown on our souvenir blotter" and the "P. A. Y. E. taxi company has a stand at the door." The menu card of the Normandie is "kidded" thus: "The management has inaugurated the custom of giving a funny story with each meal and on holidays an entire volume." The Martinet is located "upon that speedy municipal public carrier, the Geary street railroad." The Victoria is "the preferred residence of more than nine-tenths of the nomadic elite." The Grand is "the select habitat of society." Of Del Monte he says, "It is needless to mention that there are NO other resort houses in the State." The Grand Central is "patronized by the visiting nobility exclusively." At the Gloster "Johnnies can watch the Columbia stage entrance" from every room. At the Bachelor Hotel "only chanteclers are served in the fowl line." The Palace's presiding genius "has sometimes been mislabelled King Edward and Lucullus, but as both these gents are dead ones the titles are absurd." And so on down the line. This hotel printer has a gift that he should not hide under a bushel.

Did the Bishop Smoke?

When Dr. Creighton was bishop of London he rode in a train one day with a small, meek curate. Dr. Creighton, an ardent lover of tobacco, soon took out his cigar case and said, with a smile:

"You don't mind my smoking, I suppose?"

The meek, pale little curate bowed and answered humbly:

"Not if your lordship doesn't mind my being sick."

Figg (sententiously)—To him that hath shall be given, you know.

Fogg—Yes, the man who has a head gets ahead, I've noticed.

The Nethersole's Double Bill

Edward F. O'Day

It is a good many years now since the late lamented Frank Stockton set the world of fiction readers arguing about the lady and the tiger. That dispute was one which, from its very nature, admitted of no definite settlement. You had exactly as much right to grasp one horn of the dilemma as I had to grasp the other. Paul Hervieu hit upon an analogous situation when he sate him down to write "The Enigma." It is a play of two acts divided by a comma and concluded with a question mark. A close reading of the lines might make that question mark unnecessary; but from the presentation of the play at the Savoy one gathered that the author would be perfectly content if the audience left the theatre in an uncertain state of mind. If that be a correct diagnosis of his intention, "The Enigma" is a dramatic joke constructed on satirical lines. On any other assumption—and the room for doubt was unintentionally enlarged at the first production by the players' imperfect mastery of their lines—"The Enigma" remains interesting but loses the factitious attraction which gives it a Stocktonian charm. We are introduced to a French shooting box occupied by two brothers and the beautiful wives. Two male guests have been put up in sleeping chambers detached from the lodge but not far away. There is an intolerable deal of talk in the first of the two acts, but it serves the purpose of acquainting us that one of these guests is holding nightly clandestine meetings with one of the wives in the living room of the shooting box. Is it Lenore or Giselle, Miss Nellie Malcolm and Miss Olga Nethersole? We are not told. We are given to understand, however, that the guilty wife, if found out, will be punished terribly by her husband. At moments throughout this act the sense of impending doom is arrestingly suggested, but the illusion is spoiled by too much talk. However, we get action in the second act. As the curtain rises the lovers are just separating after their usual clandestine tete-a-tete. In the dark we see a woman in a white deshabille retreating toward her bed chamber while the Lothario prepares to take himself off. Which wife is retreating? Is it Lenore or Giselle? We can only guess. Then the awkward things begin to happen. The brothers, up at an ungodly hour for the purpose of potting a poacher, discover the Lothario in the house. Why is he not in his own sleeping chamber? He tells a perfectly transparent lie and fails to "get away with it." Husbandly jealousy is aroused. The wives are summoned from their beds. Both plead innocence. Why the very idea! They unfaithful to their husbands! They wouldn't think of such a thing! Then in a sweet feminine way they accuse each other. Of course one is lying, but which one? Lenore or Giselle? The husbands send them to their rooms with the intention of administering the "third degree" individually. This gives the Lothario a chance to slip away and blow his head off with a convenient shotgun. When the shot is heard Lenore rushes downstairs distracted. She learns that the Lothario is dead. "Dead! Oh my love! Dead! Oh, let me also have love's sweet deliverance!" she screams or words to that general compromising effect. Assuredly it looks very black for Lenore. But Giselle rushes in also and she too is distracted. though instead of screaming she moans. Apparently screams are guilty while moans are innocent; or perhaps it was that compromising speech which settled the matter. At any rate Giselle's husband clasps her to his breast and implores her forgiveness, which she sweetly grants, while Lenore's husband denounces her as a guilty helpmate. But he too is induced to forgive her in a sort of way. "You shall be punished by living with me," he says fiercely through his black whiskers. And there's an end on't. Now this is all very well. It provides a mildly interesting entertainment. But was Lenore guilty or was it Giselle? There are nice arguments on both sides. That compromising speech has a damning ring, but women in hysterics say a lot of things that must not be taken too literally. Personally I must confess to a queer state of mind. In practically all the plays in which I have seen her Olga Nethersole has been sinned against and sinning. In "Sapho," "Carmen," "Camille," "Adrienne de Lecouvreur," "Sister Beatrice," and, if my memory is sound, in "The Labyrinth" by this same Hervieu, she is the victim of her own or another's passions. So it is natural to suspect her when suspicion is in the air. One firstnighter suggested to me that Miss Nethersole, Giselle in other words, must have been the guilty wife because she wore a cloth of gold gown and an aigrette in her hair. "When a woman goes to spend the summer in a shooting box and enfrocks herself for dinner in cloth of gold and aigrettes, she is not in the same class with Caesar's wife," explained this astute individual. But I scorn the argument as frivolous. Never having visited at a French shooting box I have no idea how elaborate the toilettes are. And I have known so many chaste hearts beating under cloth of gold! Frankly, I give the whole thing up. But I am glad neither of those women is my wife.

NINA DIMITRIEFF

* * * * *

It is a far cry from the pentagonal mystery of Hervieu's "Enigma" to Maeterlinck's "Sister Beatrice." When I learned that the Belgian playwright had drawn "Sister Beatrice" from the same legend which gave unfortunate John Davidson the material for his poignant "Ballad of a Nun," I was intensely interested. The theme of that poem is distasteful to certain religious susceptibilities, but it is so transfigured by imaginative beauty that one cannot resist its appeal. If Maeterlinck, with his wonderful delicacy of touch has succeeded in transferring that story to the stage in all its beauty, I told myself, "Sister Beatrice" ought to be a wonderful play. But my hopes were dashed when I saw it. Evidently the demands were too great, even for Maeterlinck's powers of delicacy. Instead of being appealing the play proved offensive. It went so close to the verge of sacrilege that there was no pleasure in following its progress. I do not think that I am unduly sensitive in such matters; but when a spectacle with religious significance degenerates into the grotesque, despite the almost painful efforts made to keep it within the bounds of reverence, I can see no reason for it. And "Sister Beatrice" is grotesque. The crudity of the story which could be deftly concealed in a poem, becomes nakedly fantastic in a play. For a nun to break her solemn vow of chastity and leave her convent with a paramour is a terrible tragedy; to the Catholic mind a far more terrible tragedy than for a wife to seek the arms of an adulterer, for the nun is, in the mystic language of piety, the Bride of Christ. But such a tragedy is legitimate material for the dramatist. Let him be careful, though, how he treats it; for there is no subject on which people of cultivated minds are so sensitive as on those connected with religiou beliefs. Maeterlinck was no doubt very careful, but I think he has failed just the same. When the paramour is riding to the convent gate to claim his mistress, it is offensive to see that mistress, a nun in her nun's weeds, prostrate before a shrine of the Blessed Virgin and apostrophizing her immaculate purity. No sense of any struggle against temptation is conveyed. Indeed there is no struggle. The nun allows herself to be stripped of her habit; she kneels again at the shrine with her lover, praying and sighing and once more dwelling on the purity of her patron; then, before she crosses the threshold of the cloister, she almost expires on his lips in a long lingering kiss. All this, we have been told and will forever be told, is symbolical. "All Maeterlinck's plays are symbolical." It is the cant of criticism. Granting that it is true, (a great concession), for one who penetrates the meaning of the symbol how many hundreds are there who see only a very fleshly situation? The second act carries extravagance to its limits. The figure in the shrine takes life, assumes the robes and the appearance of the erring sister and performs her duties. The duties are performed miraculously. The bell tolls matins though no hand touches the dancing rope. The chapel doors open at a gesture. The altar candles light at a wave of the hand. A clothes basket takes motion and bumps across the stage. These are miracles, but unlike any miracles of which I have ever read, they have no motive. They edify nobody, not even the audience which is merely amused. Why should it not be amused? These things are not impressive when they are done at seances or by parlor magicians. They remain trivial when they are performed by the Blessed Virgin. Later on, more miracles occur. Flowers fall from Heaven on the altar and garlands appear from nowhere in the hands of the nuns who chatter and romp like youngsters around a maypole. One must be very impressionable to be awed by such trivialities. And one need not be a religious crank to feel that the central figure in all this is distinctly out of place. In the third act the recreant nun returns, repentant, to die with laborious slowness. The nuns surround her and allow her to die without benefit of clergy, which was an oversight the good sisters should not have been allowed to commit even by a thaumaturge like Maeterlinck. I was unaffectedly relieved when she finally breathed her very last. And when I heard a woman behind me whisper, "If this is Maeterlinck, the Follies for mine," I overlooked the inelegancy in the patness of the criticism. Miss Nethersole is not a nun at any stage; she is just the Nethersole we have known for years in "Sapho" and "Carmen" and the rest. With an actress like Viola Allen who played the "The White Sister" in the role, there would be less of incongruity; but even then I doubt whether the play would "get by," to use an expressive vulgarism. "Sister Beatrice" may be all right for the closet, but it is not for the stage. Until I have dulled my memory of it I shall not be able to read John Davidson's ballad with proper appreciation.

Gossip of the Theatre

A Great Dramatic Singer

Will Greenbaum has introduced to us another of the world's great artists, the gifted German baritone, Alexander Heinemann who was heard last Sunday afternoon at Scottish Rite Auditorium and again Tuesday night at the St. Francis under the auspices of the St. Francis Musical Art Society. Heinemann is a man of rare temperament, high-strung emotions and exceptional dramatic force, all of which impart distinction to his singing. His voice is clear, resonant and true, and he uses it as the master musician does his instrument—with that virtuosity which seems spontaneous and effortless. It is a voice rich in quality and susceptible of the most delicate shading. His programs are chosen with the most exquisite taste. In German classic songs his artistry is impeccable, especially in those the music of which give colorful settings for powerful dramatic pictures formed of noble words. The dramatic intensity of some of the songs in the Heinemann programs was never revealed to us till we heard this great singer whose combination of intellect and feeling puts him in a class by himself. Heinemann is fortunate in having John Mandelbrod for an accompanist. This man is a musician whose magnetism reinforces that of the vocalist with whom he is always in perfect sympathy.

Blanche Ring at the Savoy

Olga Nethersole will make her last appearances at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and evening in "Sister Beatrice" and "The Enigma" and on Sunday evening Blanche Ring, one of the younger musical comedy stars, will make her first appearance here, presenting "The Yankee Girl" by George V. Hobart and Silvio Hein. Miss Ring has a number of good situations, a lot of snappy dialogue and a goodly variety of songs. Among these are "I've Got Rings on My Fingers" and "Yip I Addy I Ay." "Top o' the Mornin'" and many others are also on her list. Associated with Miss Ring is a company of exceptional talent. Blanche Ring's engagement is limited to two weeks.

The Bernhardt Repertoire

Three changes have been made in the order of Mme. Bernhardt's repertoire as announced last week. "La Sorciere" will be given on Thursday, instead of Friday; the second performance of "Madame X" on Friday instead of Saturday; and "La Tosca" on Saturday night instead of Thursday. It is said that the object of the change is to avoid giving two Sardou plays, "La Sorciere" and "La Tosca," on successive evenings. Bernhardt will open her engagement with Rostand's "L'Aiglon." On Tuesday night she will be seen in "Camille." On Wednesday afternoon she will give "Madame X." On Wednesday night she will appear in "Le Proces de Jeanne d'Arc" by Emile Moreau, produced for the first time in Paris, November, 1909. Her repertoire for the rest of the week is as follows: Thursday, "La Sorciere;" Friday, "Madame X;" Saturday, matinee, "L'Aiglon;" Saturday night, "La Tosca;" Sunday, "Sister Beatrice.'

The Russian Symphony Orchestra

The series of seven concerts by the Russian Symphony Orchestra with Modest Altschuler and fifty of the finest instrumentalists in America assisted by a quartette of splendid singers will commence this Sunday afternoon at Scottish Rite Auditorium. For this opening concert a remarkable program has been arranged. The evening concerts will be given Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday nights and at each there will be at least three novelties besides standard works and vocal solos. Among the interesting new things to be heard are Richard Strauss' "Salome," Victor Herbert's "Irish Rhapsodie," a number from the new Herbert-Redding opera "Natoma," Edgar Stillman Kelley's Chinese Suite "Aladdin," suites by Glazounow, Ilyinski, Arensky and other modern Russian composers. In addition to the opening matinee there will be others on Saturday afternoon, May 6, with Pepito Arriola as an added attraction and a special farewell program on Sunday afternoon, May 7.

The Russian Orchestra at Greek Theatre

Under the auspices of the University the Russian Orchestra will give two special programs at the Greek Theatre. The first will be given next Thursday afternoon, May 4, with an all Russian program which will include Tschaikowsky's immortal work "The Symphony Pathetique" and Rachmaninoff's Fantasie "The Cliff," besides two vocal numbers from Russian sources and half a dozen orchestral gems. Visitors from San Francisco will find the 2:20 and 2:40 boats most convenient. The second concert will be given Saturday night, May 6, with a Russian and Wagnerian program and a special feature will be the rendition of the "Quintette" from "Die Meistersinger" by Madame Nina Dimitrieff, soprano, Madame Lealia Joel-Hulse, contralto, Mr. Frank Ormsby, tenor and Mr. Bertram Schwahn, baritone, all of whom travel with the orchestra, assisted by Mr. Bentley Nicholson, tenor.

Clarice Vance at the Orpheum

Sam Chip and Mary Marble, two well known musical comedy stars, will head the Orpheum bill next week. Their contribution will be "In Old Edam," a one-act comedy by Anna Marble Pollock aptly described as "a delft dialogue" with ditties. With them is that admirable comedian John W. Dunne. Clarice Vance, one of the brightest lights of vaudeville, will bring her jolly personality and characteristic coon songs. A dancing act including ballroom waltzing and whirlwind dances, will be presented by the Marvelous Millers. Gladys Clark and Henry Bergman will introduce "A Baseball Flirtation." Next week will be the last of Arthur Deagon, Clay Smith and the Melnotte Twins, Goleman's Canine and Feline Actors and Bert Coote in "A Lamb on Wall Street."

"The Lily" Coming

"The Lily," David Belasco's dramatic sensation of last season, will follow Madame Sarah Bernhardt at the Columbia with Nance O'Neil, Charles Cartwright and a Belasco company. It will be presented the same as during its run of a year in New York. "The Lily" is a play in four acts, adapted from the French of Pierre Wolff and Gaston Leroux by Mr. Belasco.

"A Woman's Way" at the Alcazar

"A Woman's Way" which is announced as the Alcazar's offering next week, commencing Monday night, will afford Izetta Jewel and the regular company unusual opportunity for impressive individual and ensemble acting. It was written by Thompson Buchanan, author of "Lulu's Husbands" and other successes, and served Grace George as a starring vehicle throughout two seasons. When that clever actress appeared in it here the critics unanimously pronounced it a charming comedy.

Mary Garden

Beautiful Mary Garden, the "Sara Bernhardt of the opera," will give three concerts at Scottish Rite Auditorium, the dates being Sunday afternoon, May 21, Thursday night, May 25 and Sunday afternoon, May 28. She will sing arias from her great succeses, such as "Thais," "Louise," "Natoma" and "Salome" and will have the assistance of Signor Arturo Tibaldi, violinist, and Mr. Howard Brockway, pianist-composer. In Ooakland she will sing at Ye Liberty on Tuesday night, May 23, Manager Greenbaum buying off the stock production for the occasion.

Hotaling's Last Week at Ye Liberty

With a fine production of "The Merchant of Venice" next week, the special season of Richard Hotaling with the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will come to a close. The clubman will be seen again in his original and remarkable characterization of Shylock. This role is considered by some Hotaling's finest dramatic achievement. The play will be splendidly cast throughout and the mounting will be complete in every regard. The regular stock season will be resumed with "Our New Minister" the following week.

The Countess Knuth's Recital

The piano and vocal recital of Countess Claire Knuth in the Scottish Rite Auditorium on the evening of Thursday, May 11, promises to be one of the most interesting musical events of the season. Countess Knuth is a newcomer to San Francisco. At present her home is in San Jose with her husband, Count Viggo Knuth, cousin to the Empress of Germany and of the same family that produced the late Queen Victoria of England. The Countess Claire arrived in America less than four months ago from Copenhagen where, since her graduation from the Royal Danish Conservatory of Music, she has been engaged in public concert and recital work. Assisting Countess Knuth in her recital will be Victor de Gomez, the cellist. A program requiring extreme skill has been prepared in which the Countess will show her versatility both as a vocalist and pianist.

No Idle Time on His Hands

"Squire," asked the visiting friend, "how do you manage to occupy your time in this little village?"

The only justice of the peace in Skedunk leisurely bit off a large chunk of plug tobacco and chewed it in silence a few moments.

"Bill," he said, with judicial solemnity, "I can beat any man in six counties pitchin' horseshoes."

The Most Enduring Kind

"Madam," began the traveler, politely, "have you a piano?"

"Yes."

"Oh, I am selling an attachment which——"

"We have one already."

The traveler took a long breath and attempted the fence.

"May I ask what make it is?"

"Sheriff's."

And the shorn lamb felt that, for once, his wind was not sufficiently tempered.

The Pocketbook

Henri Lavedan (From the French)

M. Cerceau moved cautiously, like a mouse, the whole length of the rue d'Assas. As he was coming out of his office some of his friends had prevailed upon him to go to a cafe, and he had lost nearly three francs at dominos. Now he was hurrying home, having learned by former sad experience that Madame Cerveau expected him punctually at her dinner-hour. He grew even more timid as he reached the door. What a scene there would be!

He climbed the stairs slowly, for he was covered with perspiration, and was breathing heavily. When he reached the second story he heard a cough above him. Raising his head he saw his wife bending over the railing with a light in her hand, and he trembled still more. He continued climbing, however, trying to conceal his fear under the mask of a smile. She was standing on the landing, and the lighted lamp she held in her hand gave her the appearance of a vestal virgin. Monsieur Cerveau had already bent his humble head ready to submit to all her scoldings; but to his great astonishment she only said:

"Here you are at last! I have been watching so impatiently for you!" Then seizing him by the arm: "If you only knew! I have such a wonderful thing to tell you. Come!" They entered their room, and Madame Cerveau closed the door, repeating: "You will see, you will see!" Then she laughed, a forced, nervous laugh.

"You worry me, Leonie. What is the matter with you?" cried Cerveau.

"Why, nothing is the matter, but listen. Such an extraordinary thing happened to me an hour ago. You have read novels, haven't you?"

"Of course. What do you mean?"

"Can't you guess? Just try to guess."

"Tell me what it is, I beg of you. You are torturing me."

"Yes, that's true. No one could guess it. Well, as I was coming back from the faubourg St Honore, this is what I found while crossing the Champs Elysees." With some difficulty she drew forth from the depth of her pocket a black stuffed thing which she held for a moment as though trying to decide how much it weighed. Then her face grew grave, as if she were about to do something important, and she held the object toward her husband with a gesture that said, "See, and give your opinion."

Cerveau took it and said, after he had turned it over and over again: "It's a pocket-book."

"The inside—look inside!" commanded his wife.

He opened it carefully. Several slips of paper dropped out. As he was not examining it quickly enough to suit her, she snatched it from his hands. "Give it to me. There!" She opened the first piece of paper her hand grasped. "Do you understand? These are foreign shares. I don't know how much money each one represents, but I'm ready to wager they mean quite a sum."

"Yes, yes, they do," stammered the amazed Cerveau. "It is very strange. They are certainly foreign shares. And you found this?"

"Yes. In the Champs Elysees. I stepped on it A little more and I would have fallen."

"Somebody must have lost it."

"Of course."

"If you wish, we will take it to the police headquarters after dinner. It will give us some place to go for our evening walk. What do you say?"

"Why, of course. I had no idea of keeping it," she answered impatiently.

They sat down at the table, both out of temper, like persons who have a disagreeable task to perform. Suddenly she said to him:

"Morin, who is at the Bourse, is going to lunch with us tomorrow. I am rather curious to find out through him the value of those papers. Suppose we wait a while before we give them up. There is plenty of time."

He was overjoyed at finding her so willing and readily consented.

They told the story to Morin the next day, and after he had carefully examined the papers, he exclaimed: "Russian—Austrian railways. This is luck! They are worth at least forty thousand francs!"

Forty thousand francs! They both jumped to their feet. Why, that was a fortune. "And you know," continued their friend, "in a few years they will double their values. I'm well acquainted with these things." Then he laughingly added: "Heavens! if I were only in your place!"

Cerveau was thoroughly shocked and interrupted him: "Oh, Morin!"

"Well, you may be right after all," answered the man from the Bourse. "Honesty is too complicated a thing for me to understand."

He seized his hat and left them somewhat coolly.

In the afternoon they went to headquarters, gave up the pocket-book and returned relieved and pleased with themselves. Then life resumed its ordinary course, and eight monotonous months passed by. Towards the middle of the ninth month, Madame Cerveau gleefully said to her husband: "Would you believe it? The other day I went to find out who had called for the pocket-book. It has not been claimed! It is still there!"

"What difference do you suppose that makes to me?" he asked.

"Don't you know? The difference for you, the difference for us is, that if nobody appears within four months, as one year will have passed since we gave it up, the money will belong to us."

"Is that true?"

"Of course!" And she clapped her hands.

From that moment they lived in the most painful and continuous excitement. Cerveau would mutter each morning as he dressed: "If only the owner does not put in an appearance!" And each evening, on returning from his office, he would say: "Has he shown up?" They made so many visits that the chief grew weary of seeing them. They began to think that Providence was working for them as time went on, and they would startle each other by declaring together: "We shall have it!"

They could not sleep at night. They would seat themselves by the bed, and by the dim light of their candle they would build air-castles. They wavered between a farm in Beauce or a villa by the seashore. They had already decided to name the latter "Villa Leonie." In any case they would have a man-servant; they would buy a great deal of silverware. They would live to be very old, and would never be sick. Then, when they suddenly realized that this precious treasure did not yet belong to them—that they might lose it at the last moment, they would become furious, as if they were under the immediate danger of being betrayed, of being robbed. At times they would grow tender and would say with tears in their voices: "Our poor money!"

One evening, in a confiding moment, he said to his wife: "At any rate, we shall not have stolen it."

Only one week remained before the end of the time so ardently desired. Cerveau resigned his position. What was the use of working, now that he was rich? He saw on the fourth page of a newspaper: "Swiss chalet for sale at Petites-Dalles." He bought it for ten thousand francs, and promised to pay in fifteen days.

At last, January twelfth, which was the happy, the blessed day, dressed in their best they both went to police headquarters and, after having signed their names, tremblingly received the pocket-book from the officer. The long waiting was over and they went to the church and offered thanks by lighting a candle in that sacred place.

They had invited Morin to dinner, planning to surprise him, and if the truth mush be told, in no wise sorry that they had an opportunity of crowing over him.

They gave him no hint of their good fortune until the dessert was brought on and then they gave full vent of their joy, telling the good news with joyous, excited cries. Cerveau brought forth the pocket-book which was hidden back of the handkerchiefs in a bureau drawer. Morin took it and cast his eyes over the papers.

"Russian and Austrian railway shares!" he exclaimed. "They've gone down during the last six months, my poor friends. Why, you will be lucky if you get three hundred francs for them now! Didn't I tell you that would happen?"

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Prices continue to back and fill awaiting the decision in the trust cases with the trend of the market lower. Steel has been the target for the bears and on rumors of a cut in finished steel products the professional element concentrated its efforts on this stock and prices have yielded a couple of points. Speculation in stocks is at a low ebb, nearly all the business is confined to the local crowd and sentiment seems to be changing to the bear side. The long delay of the Supreme Court in handing down so important a decision is a disturbing factor and the rank and file of the trade would welcome any kind of a decision in order to get this factor out of the market. The underlying conditions are all in favor of a better market. Money is cheap and a drug. Crop conditions could not be better and it looks as if we would harvest an abundance of everything. This will be reflected in the market a little later on.

Wheat—There has been no change in the general legitimate position of the market but all the bearish influences have been known so long that they have been more than discounted and have been worn threadbare as price-making factors. Briefly summarized the winter wheat crop outlook is fine on an unprecedentedly large acreage, spring wheat seeding has begun under splendid conditions of weather and soil and the domestic call for old wheat is of a listless, hand to mouth sort, with nothing to stir it to life. Export outlet continues lacking for the reason that our nearest competitor, Canada, is underselling, and India, Australia and Argentine are doing likewise. Reciprocity with Canada is progressing precisely as expected and indicates that the Canadian wheat soon will be competing here directly, the same as it already is in Europe. The leading spring wheat millers appear to have overbought both cash and futures and are taking their losses in the flour rather than in the wheat market, somewhat to the disarrangement of the winter wheat miller trade. Thus far this year the visible supply of wheat at the centers of accumulation has been decreasing steadily as compared with steady, though small, increases at this time last year. From now to the end of the crop year the decreases will have to be liberal to keep pace with those of a year ago.

Corn—Europe took another spurt of buying corn in America last week, the first of real importance since the buying of early winter based on the crop failure in Argentine. The buying at that time was overdone. Much of the corn arriving in Europe later was winter shelled out of condition and did not go far with the consumers. The European buyer has found that the Danube would be a poor reliance and has sold little. The foreign demand has come at an opportune time to take care of the winter fleet that moved out of Chicago with the opening of navigation last week. The bulk of this corn has already been disposed of, and there have been further sales of corn for June shipment.

Cotton—The feature of the advance during the past week has been the continued good trade demand in Manchester, unseasonable wet and cold weather in the south and the increasing strength of the statistical position together with continuous buying of July and August by the bulls of last season. The short interest has been materially reduced which has somewhat weakened the technical position of the contract market but on the other hand the demand for account of bullish spinners seems insatiable, and we hear that bulls have not yet completed their lines and stand willing to absorb all speculative offerings, which would seem to preclude the probability of more than the usual temporary setbacks of from 10 to 20 points in the near future, at least until more reassuring crop reports are forthcoming from the south.

Could Be Trusted

The late Lord Young of the Scottish bench was responsible for enlivening many a dull case. One of the best remarks that ever fell from his lips was the reply to a counsel who urged on behalf of a plaintiff of somewhat bibulous appearance:

"My client, my lord, is a most remarkable man, and holds a very responsible position; he is manager of some waterworks."

After a long look the judge answered:

"Yes, he looks like a man who could be trusted with any amount of water."

one of them. But what is a dead Gladstone to a living Aked? I longed to say something about the possible relation of illiteracy and intellectual intolerance, but I was too utterly crushed beneath the blow. In my heavy dogmatic garments I shivered, despite the warmth of the doctor's tone and the doctor's smile. Finally I gathered my sharded dogmas together and asked, pleadingly, almost piteously, as one begging for mercy:

"How about baptism? Do you regard it as a sacrament?"

"As a sacrament, but not as an essential," replied Dr. Aked calmly. "Its necessity is a matter between the individual and his God. In my church the baptized and the unbaptized sit together."

"But don't you inquire whether they have been baptized?" I asked weakly.

"Whether they have been sprinkled as children with a little water? Or immersed as adults?"

There was unfeigned astonishment in the doctor's voice.

"Why, I would never think of inquiring! It is of so little importance!"

Plainly any further questioning would have made me an object of commiseration. But having made heavy inroads on Dr. Aked's condescension I did not want to draw upon his pity. So I went away, feeling very old-fashioned as I took my leave of this clergyman whose religion, like his clothing, is cut to the mode of the moment. But as I went something which had been suggested by his words on baptism bothered my bewildered mind. Finally it came to me—a sentence from the Bible still literally interpreted by the "illiterate" among whom the "old view" of the Bible is not "dead and gone." It runs something like this:

"Go therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost."

was all tarnished, and the soldier's cap, faded by the rain and the mud. Frechou walked erect in his French uniform, trying to conceal his grief from the enemy's curious glances.

After the ceremony was over the major sent for Frechou.

"My lad," he said, "I shall not take advantage of your noble spirit of devotion in coming here. You are now free to go when you please." At the same time he presented the French soldier with a safe-conduct.

"Thanks, major," anwsered Frechou, as he made him the proper military salute.

In a few moments he was on his way back to the French camp. Thanks to the safe-conduct he passed through the enemy's lines without any difficulty and, once outside those lines, he hurried on in his eagerness to join his regiment. On the way he thought of his captain whose body was lying yonder in the midst of the enemy. Oh, how gladly he would fight from now on to regain that bit of territory!

Then his mind dwelt on the German major. He was puzzled at the generosity of this Prussian. Could it be true that this officer had sent him back free, without one condition? That German was certainly a fine fellow! Frechou had kept his safe-conduct in his hand all the time, and his curiosity was aroused to learn the name of this man who was so different from the other eaters of sauerkraut. He opened it and read the name: "Marchal."

The name astonished him. It was not German, arousing none of the bitter hatred with which anything Tuetonic fills the Frenchman. Who could this man be, commanding the troops of the enemy and yet bearing a French name?

And more than his name was French; there was something that had made the orderly, entirely ignorant of that distant Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which drove so many staunch French Huguenots to other lands, utter the cry which the major had answered with a smile:

"There's the making of a Frenchman in you!"

While not the longest, one of the most interesting automobile tours made during the past season in the East was that of Ty Cobb, the champion right-fielder of the Detroit Tigers, from Philadelphia to Atlanta. The trip was made in the Chalmers car presented to Cobb by Hugh Chalmers as a reward for his making the highest batting average in major league base ball last year. The car was equipped with Diamond tires.

In extending its sales activities to the French capital, the Packard Motor Car Company has departed from a long established policy which limited its field to the United States, Canada and Mexico. Herbert Hughes who came up through the Packard shops and now ranks as a technical expert, will look after the selling end of the enterprise in Paris as well as aiding Packard tourists in getting through the red tape of the continent. Up to the present time the Packard establishment in Paris has been devoted to extending Packard service to owners who had taken their cars abroad.

Auto Notes

The automobile seems to have particular attractions for the stars of the theatrical firmament. Recently Lew Dockstader's leading minstrels made appearance on San Francisco streets in a big Oldsmobile touring car. The machine was equipped with Diamond tires.

Ray McNamara, the noted Premier pilot who took his car through last season's Glidden tour with the best score of all entries, is in San Francisco making headquarters with the Cartercar Auto Co., local distributors for Premier machines. He states that when he left the factory it was in a flourishing condition and working to its fullest capacity in an endeavor to keep abreast of orders.

S. G. Chapman, local distributor for the Oakland, Hupmobile and Abbott-Detroit, reports that a feature of his trade this season has been demand for the Oakland "30" car. This machine made its first appearance a year ago last winter at the New York national automobile show and experienced such a demand in consequence that the factory had to send out word to agents to stop booking orders for it until those then listed were filled. According to Chapman the Oakland "30" roadster has particularly large sale this year.

Captain Cole, president of the Pacific Motor Car Co., reports that demand for Stevens-Duryea cars is greater this than during any previous season. In reply to insistent calls for immediate shipments the Stevens factory are putting models en route for San Francisco with all possible dispatch. Three shipments, carrying a number of fore-door, torpedo and Berlin types, are now on their way to the local distributors.

In announcing its 1912 line of cars, the Packard Motor Company of Detroit supplements its well established Packard "30" and "18" with a Packard "Six." This new Packard, like the others, is made in a variety of open and enclosed styles so there is a complete line of each of the three sizes.

Chief Iserman of Kenosha, Wisconsin, has given out a statement in which he says that a Rambler fire truck has now been in service five months, during which time it has answered thirty-nine alarms and made as many more trips on inspection runs. The total cost of upkeep for the five months, including gasoline, oil and water, is $6.85 or $1.37 per month.

The Pioneer Automobile Co. has had a particularly busy week shipping cars to their country dealers. Whitmore of Stockton has just taken a shipment of three machines for that city and placed orders for three carloads more. Phillips of Sacramento has received four carloads of Chalmers and Hudsons within the past few days. Three machines were placed on boat for shipment to Eureka. Two more cars were billed through to Rio Vista besides shipments to Fresno, Modesto, Visalia and Santa Rosa.

The President of San Salvador has recently placed an order for two Lozier cars, one a limousine to be used on state occasions, the other a Lozier Lakewood touring car for the personal use of the President in touring the republic.

C. C. Hildebrand, assistant general manager of the Chalmers Motor Co. and E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Company, have just returned from a visit to the Sacramento, Stockton, Fresno, Modesto and San Jose subagencies for the Chalmers cars. "I am greatly impressed," says Hildebrand, "with the wonderful promises that this season offers for prosperity in Northern California. Everywhere we found prophesies of record crops this year. It is evident that the automobile trade is to be the largest ever experienced in the out-of-town territory."

"Flowers From Medieval History"

Last year Paul Elder and Company of this city started "The Companion Series" with a pretty volume of handy size called "By the Way," which consisted of travel notes from the able hand of Agness Greene Foster. Now the second volume of the series has been published. It is "Flowers from Medieval History," a series of essays on the French Gothic written by Minnie D. Kellogg. Miss Kellogg was a member of a well known San Francisco family who died while her charming book was on the press. This fact gives it a melancholy interest altogether aside from its unquestioned worth as a contribution to the study of a fascinating department of art. Like its predecessor in the series this is a book which it is a delight to hold in the hand; a delight also to the eye of the discriminating booklover. It is printed on mellow-toned American drawing paper and tastefully bound in semi-flexible book linen. The illustrations are a great feature, being duotone mezzogravure prints of subjects pertinent to the text. Miss Kellogg displayed an unusual insight into the spirit of the past and her rendition of the quaint medieval legends will linger in the memory of every reader. The book is introduced by practical itineraries for cathedral trips in Normandy. Two of these are arranged for the traveler whose time is limited and one more complete for the motorist. The scope of the essays may be gleaned from some of the chapter headings: Mystics as Builders, The Golden Madonna of Rheims, The Mystic Cathedral of Chartres, The Grandniece of the Grand Inquisitor and Stray Leaves from Old, Old Books. Miss Kellogg's treatment may be gauged from the following bit about the Children's Crusade: "A veritable allegory of the Age of Faith was presented on the great stage of history in 1212, when two enormous armies of little boys and girls started from France and Germany singing, to march to the Holy Land; if any of these children turned back, none of them seem to have found their old homes. As far as is known to history, one child alone returned as an aged pilgrim, to tell the tale,—how the bones of the children strewed the mountainside;how they had been embarked on unseaworthy vessels to be sold into slavery; how few, how very few, ever reached their goal; how few, how very few, ever remained pure and holy. Connected with this tragedy was a horrible pope and a horrible doge, but now they seem but foils to the purity of the children, it was all so long ago. And that the mystic beauty of that little legion may live lyrically in our life, the Twentieth Century has set their pathetic march to music in stately oratorio; for pure aspiration is the melody of melodies, the veritable flower of history." The book is one which the traveler with a love of art will find of the utmost value. It is interesting to note that the next volume of the "Companion Series" will be "Comfort Found in Good Old Books," the series of essays now appearing from the pen of George Hamlin Fitch in the Sunday Chronicle.

A Fine Story by Gustav Frenssen

Just about often enough to keep hope from dying out completely, there comes along a book which calls for capitals. One does not complain of the average output of the publishing houses, which is all good enough of its kind and provides pleasure if not profit for the average reader, as the average play suits the intellect of the average playgoer, but there are a few others who would welcome better things. If merit were a gauge of recognition, "Klaus Hinrich Baas" would be hailed at once as an achievement. It is a translation from the German of Gustav Frenssen, the work being done by Esther Everett Lape and Elizabeth Fisher Read. "Klaus Hinrich Baas" is the story of a selfmade man, the son of Holstein peasants, who raised himself by his own efforts to the status of a prosperous Hamburg merchant, and though we have novels enough on the same subject written by American authors, there is almost nothing in common between them and this admirable piece of work. Our Americans are successful because they are merciless. They place before them the accumulation of a fortune and they neither stop nor stoop until it is accomplished, usually through speculation or "law honesty" which enables them to gouge their competitors, but Baas rose step by step through industry, foresight and a certain peasant persistency allied with caution which was in his blood. Though some of the incidents are unconventional, to say the least, they are related with such matter of fact simplicity as to deprive them of any hint of eroticism. The author, Gustav Frenssen, is familiar with the life which he depicts. He is a native of Holstein, and like the Baas, the name appears in records as far back as records have been kept. Like his hero, he, too, is of humble birth, his father having been the village carpenter, and his education has been self-acquired, or at least through his own efforts. He was pastor of a Lutheran congregation until his books attracted general attention and fashionable folk began to elbow his humble parishioners from their pews. Then some of the strait-laced took exception to the unconventionality of his stories and he resigned to devote himself to literature. It will be a long and weary wait before any English-speaking preacher will give us such work as this, a convincing plain narrative of what might easily be facts, without preaching or moralizing. Those who are familiar with the author's Jorn Uhl will find "Klaus Hinrich Baas" a worthy successor. Published by the Macmillan Company.

A Good War Book

The strongest testimony to the interest and popularity of Major Robert Stiles' "Four Years Under Marse Robert" lies in the fact that this is the fourth time since its appearance in 1903 that it has gone to print. Major Stiles has not attempted to write a history of the civil war or even a complete history of the Confederate Army of Northern Virginia, but as he was one of the first to enlist and saw a good deal of active service, being fortunate enough to escape both wounds and capture until shortly before the surrender, his reminiscences and recollections have the interest which only experience can furnish. After reading "Four Years Under Marse Robert" one can well understand Sherman's reference to "the fury of the non-combatants," for no one who has passed through such experiences or whose nearest and dearest have been subjected to such horrors could regard even a trifling war as a diversion. A good book for any one to read and an excellent supplement to the digest of the school histories. Published by the Neale Company.

What's in a Nickname

That vociferous yellow journal, the Philadelphia North American, has come to the conclusion that a nickname for the common enemy is essential to the cause of Progressiveness. A very good nickname has been in use for some time, one that grew out of the vitals of the issue, and it has the merit of originality and peculiar significance. The epithet "standpatter" was coined in a moment of inspiration. It is distinctly an Americanism, and as such it has a claim on us that is not to be ignored. But the editor of the North American regards "standpatter" as inadequate to describe those persons who are satisfied with the existing order of things. He has decided to call them Tories, thus exhibiting a preference for what is old while affecting to be champion of the new. But for that matter the penchant for nicknames is itself very old. The history of politics and religion is the history of nicknames. It has been said that nicknames are "the talismans and spells that called and set in motion all the combustible part of men's passions and prejudices which have been so much more effectual than reason in the grand concerns and petty details of this turbulent life." Men who have reason on their side have no use for nicknames, which, after all, are but relative terms, each nickname having its countersign and deriving its force from its antithesis. A Tory implies a Whig. Does the editor of the North American wish to imply that he is a Whig? The Whigs were once known by the cant name of "the Talents" which was successfully applied in derision as a stigma, causing them to be held up to ridicule and to become obnoxious to the public. But if the "Standpatters" are to be known as the Tories for the reasons advanced by the editor of the North American then it would be fitting to designate the opposition as Jacobins. The spirit that animates the apostles of the new Democracy is the jacobinical spirit. It is the spirit that has animated factious politicians since the dawn of history, the spirit that appeals to the turbulent inclination of the multitude, incessantly persuading it that the Constitution of the moment is bad for the very reasons which constitute its excellence. The quarrel between this spirit and the standpat spirit is the ancient irreconcilable quarrel of Conservatism and Innovation. The editor of the North American and all the clan for which he speaks would have us believe that Innovation has always been in the right and Conservatism always in the wrong. This of course is far from the truth. Because there can be no progress without experiment, without periodical dissatisfaction with the existing arrangements of society, it does not follow that the reformer is always in the right. We know that quite frequently he has been in the wrong, that he has brought much mischief into the world, that in risking the indisputably good for a chance of better he has precipitated nations into abysses of misery. As Emerson tells us it is characteristic of reform to kick with hoofs, to run to egotism and bloated self-conceit and to end in hypocrisy and sensual reaction. It is the business of conservatism to check this kind of "reform run mad," to stand by the past which has baked the loaf when they to whom the bread has given strength would demolish the oven.

Our Innovators

Politics as it is practiced in Washington these days means all for power under the guise of a zeal for the public interest. Questions of political economy that once divided powerful parties are now of minor importance. The paramount question now is not one of policy but of fundamental principles: whether we should approve visionary schemes of unattainable perfection and reconstruct the fabric of government or stick to the institutions under which the nation has grown great and prospered. This is an issue that ought to give us pause. It is an issue that calls for calm and unimpassioned discussion, but never did it arise in any country without breeding a furious party spirit, without filling the political arena with men inflamed with the heat and pride of controversy. Our leading politicians today are typical of the period in which they have come to the front. The grand contest in which they are engaged is one of precedence and infallibility. As is invariably the case, on the popular side, the side that directs its appeals to popular ignorance, popular egotism and popular prejudice, are men who would tear their country to pieces to prove that they are the only persons fit to live in it; men who pose as angels while raising hell; who could not be otherwise than intolerant even though they were championing the cause of toleration. These men are the prophets of reform, the apostles of innovation. They would make for us a new government. Now to make or repair the constitution of a State with an eye to the due distribution of its powers is a matter that requires not only a knowledge of human nature and of the science of government but the most delicate skill united with a religious regard for the rights of all elements of the community. Consider the character and attainments of our leaders of reform; ponder their qualifications for the task of improving on the workmanship of the incomparable geniuses by whom this government was founded. Isn't the very circumstance that a La Follette and a Bourne, a Bryan and a Woodrow Wilson, are the head, front and inspiration of all the energies that have been consecreated to the work of tearing down and remodeling the edifice of State enough to fill any intelligent man with the gravest apprehension? These are men who by their conduct have made it obvious that politics with them is the science of exigencies. Statesmen these that while affecting to be mindful of the next generation are preoccupied with thoughts of the next election. They have studied the science of government not half so much as their own interests, and they are skilled in nothing so much as the game of politics and the business of conducting a campaign.

The New Jersey Candidate

Governor Woodrow Wilson left home this week to swing round the western circuit. "It is announced on the Governor's behalf," says the Examiner, "that this tour is not a campaign in any sense"; also, that "he will discuss political issues on the trip only in a broad non-partisan sense." How singular that the distinguished gentleman in whose behalf this disingenuous announcement is made should hold the opinion that the people are not suspectible to the artifices of the deceiver! The whole country knows that Governor Wilson is hotfoot after the nomination for President. His campaign was opened months ago. He has been cultivating public affection with consummate art and much energy. Since his election to office he has been devoting as much attention to politics as to the duties which he is sworn to perform. To pretend that there is no political significance in the business which has taken him from home is to say the least indicative of a tendency to subterfuge. Governor Wilson believes of course that the people will not doubt the sincerity of his announcement. And yet he was quoted in last Sunday's Examiner to the effect that the people are very shrewd and very quick to comprehend a tendency. "The only thing you have to prove," he says, "is that you really mean to serve them, that you mean what you say, and that you are not in the least afraid of the man that is crooked." And he adds, "I have heard men of large affairs declare that it might be a good thing to set up a monarchy in America because the votes of the masses are too difficult to manage. I have heard this doctrine preached again and again by men who ought to have known better." Yet the Woodrow Wilson boomers tell us that this gentleman is not a politician in the common acceptation of the term. They tell us he is an eminent and respectable scholar, a model of dry judgment, of clear and passionless equanimity, a genuine patriot concerned for the future of his country. This is not the impression we have received of the ex-president of Princeton University. A scholar he may be; doubtless he was a principled citizen of high ideals in the days when as a private citizen he was numbered among the personal friends of Grover Cleveland; but if we are not very much mistaken the job-chasing virus is now in his system, and he would sacrifice principle to gratify his ambition. This is no hasty judgment. We have watched Woodrow Wilson in the course of his evolution. It is because we believe him to be a scholar, because we know him to be a student of history, because Grover Cleveland found him to be a congenial companion, that we now size him up as the spoiled darling of the mob playing the game of selfish calculation with his ear to the ground and his eye alert for opportunity. Fancy a man having political principles and qualities of heart and mind that would one day endear him to Grover Cleveland and the next to William R. Hearst! Assuredly the scholar who was once on terms of intimacy with Cleveland is not precisely the same individual who today merits the confidence and applause of our illustrious Proteus of journalism and politics and who coddles the mob with the kind of flattery that has been the staple of demagogues in all ages of the world's history. Some minds are so constituted that no sooner do they apprehend the tendency of their times than they feel the temptation of their times. Typifying the practical politics of his day, Woodrow Wilson is going about echoing the superficial notions of the hour, and there is an awkward insincerity lurking in the very felicities of his expression. Does anybody one degree removed from imbecility believe that Woodrow Wilson believes the people are so sagacious and so just that they are fit to be governed by what Edmund Burke described as "the most shameless thing in the world—a pure democracy"? Will flubdub about the intelligence of the multitude and warnings against monarchical tendencies be accepted as non-partisan sentiment when they emanate from an aspirant to the Presidency whose political faction has for its slogan "Let no Republican institution stand in the way of the absolutism of the majority"?

His Fatal Indiscretion

It is said that the rough treatment which M. Bernstein, the playwright, has received in Paris may be justly attributed to the anti-Semitic feeling which was revealed when the Dreyfus affair held public attention. This hypothesis seems hardly reasonable in view of the fact that Jews are as prominent in the theatres of Paris as managers and mummers as they are in French art and French finance. The greatest French actress, Sara Bernhardt, is a Jewess. So is Mme. Simon. Guitry and Tarride are Jews. Successful authors like Coolus, Tristan Bernard and Porte-Riche are Jews. Several of the leading dramatic critics are Jews. The real name of the critic who signs himself Ernest Lajeunessee is Kohn. No hostility has ever been exhibited toward any of these persons or toward their performances. Why then was Bernstein's play "Apres Moi" withdrawn after its premiere? Why did the Camelots du Roi mob the theatre? Doubtless the Camelots hate the Jews, but they could not have stirred up much feeling against Bernstein had it not been that he was a deserter from the army, and what was worse, had he not insulted the army. Bernstein was a popular success long before the production of "Apres Moi." He has been producing plays for ten years, and he is recognized as a man of great talent. But not till "Apres Moi" was put on did the people of Paris learn that he was a deserter from the army. Immediately after the premiere, a well-known journalist, M. Urbain Gohier, published a letter which he had received in 1900 from Bernstein who was living in Brussels. The most offensive passage in the letter was as follows: "I am a deserter from the army, and I am proud of being one. I deserted after seven months under the flags, seven remarkable months which cost me first a deal of money, and later on, when my money ran short, bitter irritation. I suppose it is useless to tell you that most of my officers were either forgers or blackmailers. I have run away to Brussels." The publication of this letter created a great sensation in Paris, affording a fine pretext for appeals to latent prejudice against the Jews. The Comedie Francaise was mobbed by the Camelots du Roi who deny that their action proceeded from professional jealousy. They take the position that as the Comedie Francaise is a national institution endowed by the State it should not be open to a man who has set an example of anti-patriotism and insulted the French army. There is certainly much to be said in support of this sentiment. Bernstein has pleaded that his desertion was a youthful indiscretion, and that he had taken advantage of the first amnesty to return to France and join his regiment again. But his enemies have learned that he rejoined not his regiment but a favored corps in which there is very light service from which nevertheless he was exempted through the influence of Madame Simone le Bargy. So Bernstein did not improve the situation by his defense. But even had he expiated his desertion he could not wipe out the insult to the officers of his regiment. As a playwright he must remain tabu in Paris, but the publicity he has received will enable him to put money in his purse in foreign parts. He is one of the most prolific of dramatists, and his plays are not for the high-brows. There is no intellectual appeal in them. He strikes at the nerves and has yet to miss fire.

The "Third Degree" in India

The "third degree" as administered by the police authorities in India is now the subject of investigation in the House of Commons. Few things show more distinctly the English character than the jealousy with which individual rights have been guarded under the British flag. For centuries the English have been a peculiarly jural nation. The inquisitorial trial has never found favor in England, nor any method of ascertaining the truth other than that provided by the rules of evidence. But far away from the seat of government in India where the authorities deal with a peculiar class of criminals they have resorted to practices that would be tolerated in no country where the principles of Anglo-Saxon justice prevail save, perhaps, in the United States of America. It was because of these practices that to make the law in fact what it is in theory the Evidence Act of 1872 was passed. It contains these words: "No confession made to a police officer shall be proved as against a person accused of crime." This law was designed to prevent secret police inquiries such as are conducted in this country, but lately it has been learned that the law has been obeyed in the letter but not in the spirit. Whilst confessions to policemen are in name inadmissible they are in fact admitted every day by a simple device. The policeman who has, by fair means or foul, obtained a confession from a suspect, takes him before the nearest magistrate and gets that functionary to record the confession after duly inquiring from the suspect whether the confession is voluntary. Of course the prisoner who has had a confession wrung from him will not divulge the fact when he knows that he is to return to the custody of the police. And it is because of this state of affairs that the Government of India is once more under investigation. In this connection it is worthy of note that the methods of prosecuting officers have been somewhat improved in this State. The dynamite suspect who confessed in Los Angeles was told by the district attorney that he would be given no promise of immunity. In other words he was not bribed to make a confession. For that reason his testimony will carry some weight. It was not so long ago that testimony was purchased with immunity in this city and the men who confessed indicted for not giving the right kind of testimony, having failed to adapt their testimony to the subtleties of the prosecution theory. Nor were they indicted for perjury, but for the crimes that had been condoned. And one of them who subsequently changed his testimony to fit the case was forgiven and the indictments were dismissed. How incredible does it all seem as we review the circumstances now that our passions have subsided! Yet we who induced such enormities when blinded by passion have now under consideration a proposal to take unto ourselves the power of recalling our judges that we may make more of them as responsive to our caprices as were the two that outraged the decencies of civilized society.

Our Intellectuals

From the New York Times we learn that since the days of George Bancroft and Andrew W. White the American post at Berlin has been considered "the special oyster of the intellectuals," and that consequently "the selection of a man like Seth Low, Nicholas Murray Butler or Benjamin Ide Wheeler" would give satisfaction. Shade of Motley! is this the best we can do in the way of "intellectuals" at this stage of our history? Seth Low is the amiable gentleman who made a fizzle of municipal politics in New York; Nicholas Murray Butler is the gentleman who paraded his erudition at a German university in a great array of borrowed plumage, reciting as original an essay in Latin written for him by Professor Peck; and Benjamin Ide Wheeler!—well Benjamin Ide Wheeler is the Panjandarum of Berkeley who believes that T. R. is the reincarnation of the Homerican Mars and who expects to go to Teddy when he dies. "To be honest as this world goes," says Shakespeare, "is to be one man picked out of ten thousand." To be an intellectual as this country goes is to be a pedant picked out of ninety million worshipers of a fetish called higher education. Verily mankind liveth but for the few and to justify those ambitions which make "flies of men and wildernesses of whole nations."

Perspective Impressions

The author isn't the only man who has his hard-luck story turned down.

One may admire Bernhardt immensely and still be unimpressed by Consul Merou's poetry.

Sarah Bernhardt is a melancholy person. She used to sleep in a coffin; now she has a doctor for a traveling companion.

After they have shortened the Decalogue the biblical reformers might give us the Sermon on the Mount in tabloid and abbreviate the Lord's Prayer.

Supervisor Bancroft's objection to horse cars is that "it is difficult to carry on a conversation while riding in them." And what worse fate can befall Bancroft than that of encountering a bigger noise than himself.

At Bernhardt's age camera courage might give way before caution and go unrebuked.

Says Representative Lemuel Paggett of Tennessee: "What part the aeroplane will take in the next conflict between nations I am not able to state." How shortsighted!

Mr. Hearst asks: "What is the recall that it should be so much opposed?" It's a contrivance by the general use of which the influence of the yellow journalist will be greatly increased.

"Bushy hair," says Gavin McNab, "is the dark ambush of a fogbound mind." Whereupon former Mayor Taylor felt that his whiskers were not unwrung while Judge Lawlor betrayed the emotions of a galled jade. A case of two ducks with one barrel.

No man is more blessed with riches than he who can give every man his due without impoverishing himself.

The Grecian ladies counted their age from their marriage not from their birth. Perhaps that's what Sarah Bernhardt intends to do.

The man that believes the Democrats are going to slash the tariff is that wonderful, incredible mortal, the average citizen, whom you can convince of almost anything if you first assure him that you favor the recall because you have faith in his intelligence.

Now it is said that John Hays Hammond hopes to be Taft's running mate next year. For elasticity the Hammond leg is without a peer. There is no length to which it cannot be pulled while the Hammond conceit holds out.

A Ballad of Trees and the Master

(Published by Request))

Into the woods my Master went
Clean forspent, forspent,
Into the woods my Master came,
Forspent, with love and shame.
But the olives they were not blind to Him.
The little gray leaves were kind to Him,
The thorn-tree had a mind to Him
When into the woods He came.

Out of the woods my Master went,
And He was well content,
Out of the woods my Master came,
Content with death and shame.
When Death and Shame would woo Him last,
From under the trees they drew Him last;
'Twas on a tree they slew Him—last
When out of the woods He came.

Such a Notable Utterance

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: You have repeatedly said that the direct primary and the other devices of the new Democracy were so warmly advocated by Mr. Hearst and other demagogues of journalism because they will increase the prestige and influence of these pestiferous molders of public opinion. I was reminded of what you have said when I picked up the Examiner last Sunday and found that John Temple Graves had been interviewing statesmen in Washington for the purpose of eliciting encomiums on his employer, Mr. Hearst. Wouldn't it nauseate you to read the drivel of these populistic statesmen who have been kowtowing to the great mogul of journalism! Populism is already bearing fruit. It doesn't require a telescope to see the apotheosis of Hearst in the distance. Have you been reading the stuff to which I refer? There was more of it Monday; all apropos of a bum speech made by the shrinking violet in New York. Thus Mr. Graves, former candidate for Vice-President: "The notable peace utterance made by Mr. William Randolph Hearst in his speech at the Aeronautical banquet in New York on Thursday night has given risc to cordial and approving comment at the capital today." Indeed! What was this notable utterance? Mr Hearst said there would be no war; that war belonged to the black barbarism of the past and that aeroplanes belonged to the white peace of modern civilization. O! a most notable utterance. Notable enough to startle the whole world. Positively a world-shaking utterance! So brilliant, so profound, so original, bespeaking a most monumental intellect. It is the utterance of a prophet of the old school, a towering scholar of the pregnant present. Let it be megaphoned to the four winds to be carried to the remotest corners of this universe. Carnegie? Pshaw! the Laird of Skibo had better look to his sheet-metal thunder, now that Jupiter himself has shaken his locks and spoken in his voice that halts the spheres. Naturally so notable an utterance did give rise to approving sentiment in Washington, especially as John Temple Graves of the Independence Leg with writing pad in hand went about prodding the pliable statesmen. What statesman of this Democratic era will keep silent when invited to speak for publication? Assuredly no garrulous Champ Clark. Listen to this noble Populist who is said to measure up to the requirements of the Big Job: "I regard Mr. Hearst's peace speech as a most fortunate and important declaration. Am glad he made it. It is inspiring," etc., etc. This is the sort of approving sentiment that Mr. Graves evoked exclusively from those statesmen who pronounce the direct primary and the recall inventions of God for the redemption of the nation.

Yours truly,
—A Roundhead.

Some Lipograms

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Perhaps "Hibernian" would appreciate a specimen or two of lipogrammatic verse. The lipogram as you know is a species of verse in which a certain letter either vowel or consonant is altogether omitted. One of the earliest poets to try this kind of verse was the Greek poet Lasus (538 B. C.) who wrote an ode upon the Centaurs and a hymn to Ceres without inserting the letter "S" in the composition. The most difficult form of the lipogram is the one that contains but a single vowel, as for example:

Persevere. ye perfect men,
Ever keep the precepts ten.

Here are two more specimens:

The Russo-Turkish War

War harms all ranks, all arts, all crafts appal;
At Mars' harsh blast, arch, rampart, altar fall!
Ah! hard as adamant a braggart Czar
Arms vassal-swarms, and fans a fatal war!
Rampant at that bad call, a Vandal band
Harass, and harm, and ransack Wallach-land.
A Tartar phalanx Balkan's scarp hath past,
And Allah's standard falls, alas! at last.

The Fall of Eve

Eve, Eden's empress, needs defended be;
The Serpent greets her when she seeks the tree.
Serene she sees the speckled tempter creep;
Gentle he seems—perverted schemer deep—
Yet endless pretexts, ever fresh, prefers,
Perverts her senses, revels when she errs,
Sneers when she weeps, regrets, repents she fell,
Then, deep-revenged, reseeks the nether Hell!

The authors of the foregoing are unknown.

Yours truly,
—Antiquarian.

XX—WILLIAM DALLAM ARMES

By Edward F. O'Day

One is apt to think of a university professor as a leisured person passing a life of scholastic retirement, emerging for an hour or two every day into the quasi-publicity of the lecture room but speedily returning to the preferred society of learned volumes, with orders not to be disturbed. Perhaps that is the life desired by university professors; perhaps some of them actually attain it. Most certainly Professor William Dallam Armes of the University of California does not.

Professor William Dallam Armes is the university impresario, the presiding genius of the Greek Theatre. Everything that happens in the Greek Theatre happens under the auspices of Professor Armes. Theatrically speaking he is the resident manager, the cashier, the box office, the press agent, sometimes even the stage director. To all intents and purposes, it may be said, Professor Armes IS the Greek Theatre—all except the cement work, the acoustics and the audience. He is responsible for the half-hours of music on Sunday afternoon and the whole hours of music on other occasions. Bernhardt and Maude Adams, Nance O'Neil, Margaret Anglin and William H. Crane were "his" stars when they appeared at the Greek Theatre. He is preparing now for Bernhardt's second appearance and after that he will have Miss Marlowe and Mr. Sothern on his hands. So intimately is Professor Armes connected with the Greek Theatre that when the University authorities lent the theater to the Pacific Theological Seminary in order that that eminent seminarian Colonel Roosevelt might deliver an Earl lecture, they lent Professor Armes with it.

It strikes me that Professor Armes is overworked; that he needs an assistant. He's going all the time and some of his tasks are hardly in consonance with the popular notion of professorial dignity. But he takes a great delight in them just the same. He doesn't complain of overwork. On the contrary, he tells of it with a frank enjoyment which shows how much he loves every crowded busy hour of the day. He is not even ashamed to act as an amateur policeman.

"It's all in the day's work," he says.

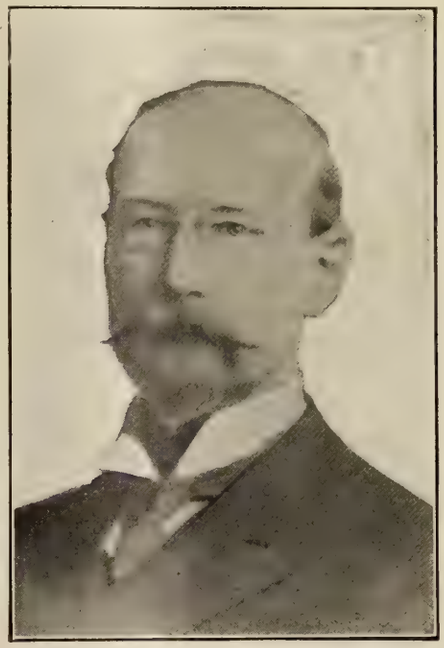
That Professor Armes does not balk at police duty I learned by the evidence of my eyes. I was standing with the professor at the lower entrance to the Greek Theater while the cadet band was giving the half-hour of music. He was telling me about the day Colonel Roosevelt spoke there.

"I found that a number of mischievous boys in the crowd had mirrors and were dazzling the eyes of the guests of honor on the stage," said the professor. "So I sent four policemen in plain clothes into the crowd with orders to confiscate the mirrors and put the offenders out. What do you think? One of the mischievous persons was a woman of fifty! But out she went just the same!"

While the professor was talking I noticed that some boys in the upper tiers of the theater were throwing paper darts on those below them. Here, thought I, is a chance for the professor. And it was.

He ran over to the special policeman and pointed out the mischief-makers on the farther side of the theater. He gestured with a cane and was not a bit disconcerted by the attention he attracted. The policeman started for the seat [illegible] and the professor hurried after him. [illegible] and pairs of eyes followed them. It was a diversion, an unexpected number on the program and the crowd enjoyed it. When the policeman and the professor finally located the offenders, there was a pause. Evidently they were surly and unwilling to leave. I had visions of a lively row. Suppose they should assault the policeman and the professor? But no; they got up and went out, looking very crestfallen, while the crowd cheered. The policeman and the professor ran after them and a hundred people or so deserted the music in anticipation of a scrap. But there was none.

"It would be funny," mused the professor when he returned after this trifling incident, "if one of those chaps was really the captain of the football team. But no doubt the man who said so was mistaken."



WILLIAM DALLAM ARMES

Evidently the friend of Bernhardt and Maude Adams and all the illustrious others, does not know the captain of the football team. But athletics is not art and the busy entrepreneur of the Greek Theater cannot find much time to spend in the Stadium. The professor's day frequently crowds into the night.

"I see where I don't get much sleep from now on," he confided. "The time that Bernhardt was here before there was a night when I didn't go to bed at all but just worked right through from one day to another. But I don't intend to do that again. As it is my days are filled up. I lecture every day including Saturday from eight to ten and devote the rest of the day to my dramatic work. I've been so busy during the past year that I've only had one day's vacation. I was ill for six weeks but I worked just the same. Do you know, I don't even see the great performances in the Greek Theater. When Maude Adams was playing 'As You Like It' I was in my office with her manager, closing up the accounts."

The professor's office is his bed room at the Faculty Club. It is the workshop of a busy man. Books line the walls and packages of posters, hand bills and programs clutter the floor. A collection of cigar boxes serves for a filing cabinet. On his table is a box office chart on which he checks up the seats for the Bernhardt performance as they are sold. With lively interest he produced pictures of the wonderful Sarah and of Miss Marlowe and Mr. Sothern.

"When they come here I'll have these autographed and add them to my collection," and he referred me to the walls. Autographed pictures of Maude Adams, Nance O'Neil, Billy Burke and other stars occupied the space not preempted by books.

"Some time I'll have this office fixed up in true theatrical style," he said.

It was a characteristic speech, I thought. This man's heart is in the theater. He loves it. Actors and actresses have a fascination for him. He is unaffectedly pleased with the work which brings him in touch with them. And he is proud of his friendship with theatrical folk.

"It's a strange life they lead," he mused. "They make friends quickly, go away for years, perhaps, and return to take up the acquaintance where it was broken off. In the meantime you may receive a picture post card, but they never think of telling you where you may write to them. I've even received post cards from them in Africa."

So evidently the players like Professor Armes too. John Drew came to see him once and came again bringing Miss Billy Burke. Richard Mansfield sent him a greeting a month before he died. These things are meat and drink to him.

He told me of the innumerable players who want to appear at the Greek Theater. Even a prize fighter wanted to give a performance there.

"Once a manager said to me in New York, 'You're going to have a great season in your Greek Theater.' I told him that we hadn't booked a single performance. 'Why, to hear them tell it,' answered the manager, 'every soubrette on Broadway who is going to San Francisco is going to play at the Greek Theater.'"

A lot of his time is given to the penning of diplomatic epistles to ambitious stars, explaining why it will be impossible to allow them to give performances there.

"One manager said that he would spend a thousand dollars on the performance. I told him we allowed the students that sum for their little affairs and that if he would make it five thousand we might consider the matter."

So you see, it is a costly honor. Professor Armes says that both Maude Adams and Margaret Anglin lost money on their performances.

"But the advertising is invaluable," he explained. "Their managers did not expect to make money. It was a labor of love. Why, night after night Miss Anglin came to Berkeley after her San Francisco performance and worked for hours just to get the proper light effects. I've been at the Greek Theater with her till half past two in the morning. I thought I would

Reno Divorce Publicity

There was consternation among those members of the Reno divorce colony who had not yet filed their suits when they learned recently that the first move had been made to stop the practice of sealing complaints in divorce actions. For several months the newspapers of Reno, Carson City and Goldfield kept up an agitation against the concealment of the allegations in divorce complaints, on the ground that it opened the way to fraud in the service of summons upon the defendant. Frequently the plaintiffs in divorce suits claim they do not know the whereabouts of the defendants and secure from the court an order to publish the summons in the local newspapers. No hint is given as to the former home of the couple in the published statement, nor does it develop until the action comes to trial. If the whereabouts of the defendant has been designedly concealed by the plaintiff in order that a contest may be avoided, it is too late to get into touch with that defendant, and a judgment is usually rendered in favor of the plaintiff upon default of the defendant, who probably knew nothing of the action being brought. It has just been held that when the complaint is filed in the county clerk's office it becomes a public document and should be accessible to inspection.

The Virtues the French Admire

The idea that Frenchmen, especially residents of Paris, have loose ideas about the marriage tie and womankind in general is dissipated through a unique newspaper test. "What is the most excellent point in woman?" a paper asked of its readers. The paper asked each person to name the ten virtues he prefers in a woman. Sixty virtues have been named. The seven first have always been at the top of the poll since the beginning of the ballot, in the following order: Goodness, orderliness, devotion, thrift, gentleness, intelligence and amiability. This is a tribute to the essential solidity of the French people. First of all they ask for goodness, and secondly for orderliness, in their women! The former virtue has scored 21,308 votes, and the latter 18,470. The fact that devotion comes third, with 17,904, would tend to show that many of the voters are men. It will startle some hasty judges of French character to find that only 2,306 voters mentioned elegance as one of the ten most excellent things in women, which takes only the thirty-first place on the list. It will surprise everybody to learn that pride is asked for in women by only 528 voters, and that its place is fifty-second on the list. But perhaps the most instructive point of all is the sixtieth and last virtue, meekness, for which only ninety-six men voted.

Libel in Germany

If there are journalists in this country who are gravely dissatisfied with the existing libel laws, they should console themselves with thoughts of what might happen to them on the other side of the ocean. Thus in Berlin, the other day, two editors of the Morgenpost were fined $25 each, as an alternative to ten days in jail, for publishing a story, made out of whole cloth, in which no names were mentioned. According to this veracious narrative, an officer, who was also a count and owned a castle, had grievously wronged a young girl, the daughter of a sergeant, and driven her into an insane asylum. Her heart-broken father, after marking the count for life, died of apoplexy in the most approved manner. In short, it was a most charming melodrama, and, like most melodramas, entirely imaginative—as both the editors had to confess on the stand. Now, in American yellow journals the skill of the writer in "faking" so charming a yarn would have been richly rewarded; in Berlin, the two men responsible had to answer for libelling every officer in the Imperial army who is a count and owns a castle, and the service is full of them. Every officer of the army, the prosecuting attorney insisted, was injured by that publication, and the court agreed, substituting fines for the imprisonment asked by the state. If there is a touch of the comic in all this, it will none the less make many Americans wish that our libel laws could in some way be extended so as to make newspaper "faking" an uncomfortable trade in this country.

The Study of Leprosy

Mr. John Jackson, a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society of Great Britain, has brought to the Missionary Exposition at Boston an exhibit showing the recent developments of medical treatment of lepers in India, China and other Eastern countries, and predicting a cure of their disease. The bacillus of leprosy was identified by Dr. Hansen of Norway thirty years ago. In the time that has since elapsed the specialists have endeavored in vain to make cultures of the germ. But the professors at the United States Government Research Station at Molokai, Hawaii, have lately succeeded in developing the bacilli of leprosy to the third generation. Mr Jackson informs us that "this clears the way for a further stage of experiment, namely, the actual search for a serum that would prove a real remedy." As it required thirty years, however, to develop the cultures, Mr. Jackson believes that the development of a remedial serum may cover an extended period. The ground for encouragement that this process may be hastened lies in the fact that medical research is becoming well endowed and has brought into its field a capable and numerous body of investigators.

Detective and Thief in One

The public's faith in the infallibility of the French secret police has been greatly shaken by the accidental discovery that one of Paris's most dangerous criminals, who went under the name of "Nick Carter," and who had vainly been sought for all over France, was, in reality, a Police Inspector named Warze, one of the best detectives that Prefect Lepine has had at his disposition for over three years.

After having gained for himself the reputation of being the shrewdest man on the force, Warze began to mix with doubtful characters, and, for the last twelve months, has been the chief of one of the worst gangs of thieves operating in the capital. The most sensational robberies which have gone unpunished lately were due to this band, whose elusiveness baffled every effort.

Some months ago the police decided to get at the bottom of the mystery of these burglaries and placed the matter in the hands of Warze himself. Needless to say that Warze, once in charge of the investigation, enjoyed a fine holiday and employed his leisure in scheming ever more daring robberies, all the time sending long, detailed reports, which convinced his chiefs that he was following different good clues. In private life Warze was known and respected as a quiet, gentlemanly man. The almost incredible double life of this Arsene Lupin and Raffles thrown into one might have continued for a long time had he not been given away by a petty thief arrested the other day for a small robbery.

Snobbery at School

The recent todo at Annapolis over the case of Miss Beer who received a public apology for the slight put upon by the cadets who refused to dance with her at a hop because she was a governess, need not excite too pessimistic feelings. Snobbery is a weakness of the young and the hard knocks of life eradicate it from all but the incurably mean. In England there is probably more of it than here. Thus a writer testifies in a letter to a London paper: "I come in contact with a large number of lads, and I can speak with certainty of the evil effects of snobbishness on the life of the young. One lad I know, a tradesman's son, of more than average ability, refused point blank to go to Oxford, although his parents were people of ample means, preferring his liberty in the cramping conditions of a city office. Another, whose father has made a large fortune by combined genius, perseverance and honorable dealing, has been sent to one of the younger universities, presided over by a scholar of world-wide fame, where he is not so likely to be "looked down upon." Still another, now reading for one of the learned professions, whose father was a London merchant of comparative wealth, distinct ability and universally recognized integrity, confessed to me that his life was made so unbearable at a boarding school much patronized by the sons of small army men, doctors, lawyers and indigent curates, that he begged his parents to send him to another school, with such earnestness —vowing that he would run away if his request was not acceded to—that at length he was permitted to have his way. This high-spirited and sensitive lad endured at the hands of his schoolfellows, who were for the most part inferior to him, as a matter of fact, in almost every possible respect, indignities quite incredible to those who may not be conversant with the particularly vicious sort of cad one meets at these "schools for the sons of gentlemen."

The Signal

W. Garchine (From the Russian)

Simeon Ivanov was a gate-tender on the railroad. The little cottage where he lived and worked was eight miles from the nearest station. Not far away, the chimney of a big spinning-mill loomed vast and black against the sky. Not another dwelling was in the neighborhood, with the exception of a few huts for the railroad laborers.

Simeon Ivanov was a sickly and feeble man. He had gone through the war with Turkey as captain's orderly. After having discharged their duty, they both, captain and orderly, returned home unwounded. The officer took leave of the man and returned to St. Petersburg. As for Ivanov, he came back to his village, where sad news awaited him. His father was dead, his little child dying and his poor wife, exhausted with hard work and misery, was on the point of succumbing. Ivanov courageously started in to work, but everything seemed in league against him. The little one whom they loved so tenderly faded away and died in spite of their care, leaving a terrible void behind him. Everything seemed to be on the point of ruin. In despair the poor souls decided to leave the village and to seek their fortune elsewhere.

One day Ivanov found himself on a railroad train and, in passing a station, he thought he recognized one of his former officers in the station master. He looked at him eagerly, and the man, turning, seemed equally surprised to see Ivanov. He hurried over to gree him.

"Your name is Ivanov, isn't it?" asked the station-master.

"Yes, my captain," answered Ivanov joyfully.

"What are you doing here, old comrade?" said the other.

Then Ivanov told him all his history, his misfortunes, his misery, his despair.

"Well," said the station-master, trying to hide the emotion he felt at the recital; "where are you going now?"

"That is more than I know, myself, my captain."

"But how is that? You don't know where you are going?"

"That is the exact truth, my captain," replied Ivanov in a trembling voice. "I haven't an idea where I am going, nor where to go. I want to find work, no matter at what, so that we need not starve."

The station-master gave him a look full of pity, then, after reflecting for a few moments, he said in a very friendly voice: "Listen, old fellow, stay here for a little while. You are married? Where is your wife at this moment?"

"She is a servant in the house of a lawyer in Koursk."

"Well, then write to her to join you here. I will get a pass for her. In a very short time one of our little houses will be vacant, and with it the post of a gate-tender. I will ask the general-manager to give this post to you. Have courage, old friend, and count on me!"

"Oh, how is it possible to thank you, my captain!" cried Ivanov, overcome with gratitude.

He was established at the station forthwith. While awaiting the departure of the gate-tender whose place he was to take, Ivanov tried in every way to make himself useful. He sawed wood, carried water for the kitchen, swept the platform of the station and watered the flowers.

In a few days his wife arrived. Ivanov put their slight baggage into a hand-cart and took it to the new home. The little house was new and warm and had a mite of a garden attached to it; on the sides spread a piece of ground, rather less than two acres, and in the midst of this was an immense tree, whose shade covered the entire yard. The poor souls were in a heaven of delight over their new surroundings; they built a thousand air castles, each more beautiful than the last; they would buy a horse and perhaps a cow as well; then they could sell butter and eggs in town.

Could it be that their good luck, so long awaited, so eagerly desired, had come at last?

The next day, Ivanov received all the accessories necessary for the business of a gate-tender —two little flags, one green and the other red, some English wrenches for the bolts on the rails, a cord, a big broom, and a little time-card which showed the passing of trains. At first Ivanov could not sleep at nights. He pored over his schedule and feverishly watched the clock. Two hours before a train was due he would leave the house and inspect minutely every inch of track, try all the screws and then go back to sit on his door-step, eyes alert and ears open to the slightest sound, expecting each moment to hear the whistle of the locomotive. Then, little by little, he grew accustomed to his new position, and his nerves steadied themselves. Didn't he know his time-card by heart?

Summer came and his work grew lighter. There was no more snow to sweep away, and, morever, the trains of this line were not very numerous.

Two months passed thus. Ivanov began to get acquainted with his fellow-workers, the neighboring gate-tenders. One of them was an old man, grave and silent, who was awaiting his retirement. The other, the one who was stationed nearer to Ivanov, was young, very tall and emaciated, pale and nervous.

The first time that the two neighbors met on the tracks, Ivanov humbly doffed his cap. The other looked at him askance. "Good morning," he said, then turned his back and walked away without another word.

The next day Ivanov met the wife of his strange neighbor.

"Well, friend," said he; "your husband is not much of a talker, is he?"

The woman did not reply immediately. After an instant of thought, she said: "What would you want him to talk about? Each to his own affairs in this world. And may God help us all!" And she, too, walked away.

Yet, by dint of patience and good humor, Ivanov finally triumphed over his comrade's peevishness. Almost insensibly they drifted into a very close friendship. Often they walked together to inspect the track, then, seated on the grass, pipes between their lips, they confided to each other their various haps and mishaps.

Basil spoke seldom, but, to make up for his silence, Ivanov, a born talker, held forth on every possible subject— his wife, his father, the beloved child snatched from their arms only too soon, his birthplace and his poverty.

"Yes, neighbor," he was fond of saying; "I have suffered much since I came into the world. There are people who have luck, who live happily, free from care. Ah, well, I, who have never harmed anyone, have never had any luck. Nothing succeeds with me!"

Basil did not reply immediately; he shook the ashes from his pipe against the edge of the rail, rose, and said with a sigh:

"It is not luck, neighbor, that is against us; it is men. There is not, in all the world, a beast more wicked, more dangerous, than man. Even wolves will not eat each other. A man would gladly eat one of his fellows—eat him alive!"

"Hum! Wolves are not quite so tender-hearted as you think."

"Really? Well, all the same, I repeat that if men were not so cruel and so greedy, there would be some chance of happiness on this earth."

Ivanov sat thoughtful.

"I don't know, I'm sure," he said at length; "you may be right about it. But, in any case, if we are unlucky, it is the Almighty who orders it so."

"If that is your tune," answered Basil passionately, "I have nothing more to say. If you try to lay all the blame on the good God, if you have not the courage to battle, yourself, against your troubles, then you are nothing but a rag!"

He turned on his heel and walked off without a word of farewell. Ivanov rose in his turn. "Neighbor," he said reproachfully; "why do you speak so roughly?"

But Basil failed to hear him. Ivanov watched him fixedly until his lean silhouette disappeared around a turn. When Ivanov reached home he said to his wife: "What an odd fish that neighbor of ours is!" and repeated the conversation to her.

Yet the friendship did not suffer from this outburst. The next day they met again on the track, shook hands and took up the same conversation.

"Well, brother, if it were not for man, we should not be passing our lives in these miserable huts," said Basil.

"Heavens and earth, man, what do you want? They are pretty good places to live in, after all!" replied Ivanov.

"They are, are they?" cried his friend. "What a fool you are, to be sure, my poor Simeon! For having lived so long you have drawn very small profit out of life. You may have looked at much, but you have certainly seen little! Think, for just a moment, what existence must be for us poor people, whether we live here or elsewhere. The rich prey on us, they suck our blood while we are young and strong, but once we become old we are cast aside like useless rubbish. How much do they pay you a year?"

"Not much, to tell the truth; twelve rubles."

"And I get thirteen and a half. Permit me to ask, why this difference? In justice we should each receive twenty rubles a month in addition to our light and fuel. Who, then, allots us these twelve or thirteen rubles? Answer me that, if you can! And you dare pretend that it is possible to live decently on such pay? Understand me, it is not a question of the two or three miserable rubles, more or less, that we receive! Last month I happened to be at the big terminal station. The president of the road was there, just passing through. I saw him—I had that great honor. He got into a private car and stood looking out of the door at the common crowd! Oh, I am not going to stay long at this job, I can tell you. I am going to get out of here, no matter where I go!"

"And where will you go? Here you have a comfortable fireside, you have a little corner of ground, your wife is industrious, devoted and faithful."

"A corner of ground, you say! You have not seen this famous corner of ground. It is nothing, and worse than nothing. Listen to me! Last

Where Sounds the Surf

(Rondeau)

By Henry McDonald Spencer

Where sounds the surf its melody
From time unto eternity,
From western shores to weird Cathay;
There would I watch the dolphins play
Like nymphs in flashing ebony.

How happy might we mortals be
To join the Nereids' revelry
And in their golden caverns stray,
Where sounds the surf.

The waves, untamed of time, are free,
As when they bore the Argosy;
The billows surge as on that day
When, wet and wanton, from the spray
Arose the goddess of the sea,
Where sounds the surf.

Moore Getting 'Em Together

Charles C. Moore has been in no hurry to accept the presidency of the World's Fair Executive Committee. His is really a case of the office seeking the man, and in this instance without doubt the very best available man was sought and found. But Moore is not eager for honor. He is eager, however, for the success of the Fair, and on his return from the East he signified his willingness to accept the presidency provided he could be assured that there were others who were capable of self-sacrifice. He resolved to do some interviewing, to find out what men would pledge themselves to co-operate with him and give him their time as well as their advice. To every man who urged him to accept the position he addressed this question, "Well what are you going to do?" Talking it over with one member of the committee to whom I am indebted for the information he said: "I think I have a pretty good conception of what this position will cost me in time and money. If I decide to take hold I know I shall be appalled at the prospect. I'm not going to take hold unless I am made to feel certain that you and the others will work in harmony with me and with one another." Harmony is the keynote of all Moore's heart-to-heart talks. He insists that all recollection of the late unpleasantness incident to the grand work of civic regeneration must be extinguished.

He's a Hustler

In all probability with Moore as president the conclusion will be reached that there will be no need of a director-general. Moore is a man of rare administrative ability. In his line of business he has few peers in all this country. He has competed with the biggest mechanical engineering firms in the United States, and more than one of them has had to take a back seat. He goes in for the finest talent, and no price is too high for the man he wants. He has had former admirals of the navy on his staff. And Charley Moore is a San Franciscan from the ground up. As a boy he learned his business in a little shop south of Market street, and his office is still below the main trolley. He is a hustler by nature, a great organizer, and a man of inexhaustible energy.

Question of the Hour

I quote:

Is it a frame-up? still remains the question of the hour in this town, where there is supposed to be bitter opposition to union labor. It was the question when the news of the arrest of the McNamara brothers and McManigal first came over the wires Saturday night, and it is the question today, when the case seems to be tightening and strengthening its grip on the three prisoners in the county jail. Surprising and significant is this attitude of doubt and suspended judgment. Given any other crime in which twenty-one lives had been sacrificed, and the showing already made against the three suspects, would be sufficient to inflame public sentiment to an almost dangerous degree.

The foregoing is from the Labor Clarion, you conjecture, or from the Voice of Toil or from some other authorized mouthpiece of trades-unionism. You are wrong, gullible reader. It is from our own kept Bulletin of April 28. It purports to be from that journal's Los Angeles correspondent. Labor unions are powerful in San Francisco. By them may circulation be stimulated, and Mr. Older is thus and therefore playing to their gallery. And thus are we afforded an excellent illustration of the truth of the epigrammatic bon mot which made Mr. Older famous as a wit in the circle which he adorns. "There is no sewer through which I'll not crawl for a dollar," said Mr. Older proudly beaming on his company; "but of course if it is too small to crawl through, you will have to make it worth my while to enlarge it."

Because It's Burns

Not the least singular part of the Bulletin's statement, however, is that it is true. Public judgment is suspended: the people do ask, "Is it a frame-up?" And why? Solely because one William J. Burns stands sponsor for the arrests. Had the same arrests been made, the same story told, by the Pinkertons, the chief of police of Los Angeles or of San Francisco there would have been no public hesitancy or dubiety. The character of the arresting officer would have carried conviction of the honesty of his motives and the integrity of his statements. But Burns, the same Burns caught by Rabbi Kaplan doing a little sleight-of-hand work with Ruef's immunity contract in a safe-deposit vault, is again sleuthing for contingent blood-money as he did in San Francisco with all his old familiar machinery in good working order, and naturally the question falls from a thousand lips, "Is it a Burns frame-up?"

The Incredible

But the absolute and unfailing fatuousness of the Bulletin once more makes for the merriment of man. In kowtowing to the unions Editor Older fails to perceive that he is damning his former side-partner Burns. If the public fears a frame-up, as the Bulletin says, it does so only because Burns is so strongly discredited and despised as to be believed capable of a frame-up that would send innocent men to the gallows. It seems incredible that this is the same Burns from whom, according to the Bulletin of other days, Lancelot could have learned chivalry and Arthur kingly honor.

He Didn't Do It

Still from the tomb the voice of Biggy cries to remind us of "the deep damnation of his taking-off." William Murphy the engineer who was in charge of the police launch Patrol when Chief of Police Biggy was crossing the bay on the night of his mysterious death has gone crazy. He is obsessed with the hallucination that somebody has accused him of some awful crime. Incessantly he exclaims, "I don't know who did it, but I swear to God I didn't." The supposition is that he has been brooding over the Biggy tragedy. Nobody has ever suspected Murphy of having had a hand in Biggy's death. If his mind was affected by the tragedy it was doubtless because of the terrible shock he suffered when he learned that the man whom he believed to be the only passenger on the launch had disappeared in the darkness of the night. A Coroner's jury was convinced that Biggy's death was accidental; that he fell overboard without uttering a cry loud enough to be heard by Murphy. But the Coroner's jury didn't hear all the testimony. The written report made by Police Commissioner Kyle to Mayor Taylor was a piece of evidence that was suppressed. This report told the story of Biggy's interview with Kyle just before the chief went aboard the yacht. This report has never been made public. Mayor Taylor refused to receive it as official thus preventing publicity. In that interview Biggy told why he was being hounded by the Graft Prosecution which he had formerly served. The Evening Post charged that the man behind the conspiracy against Biggy was William J. Burns who wanted to give "protection" to vice. Burns threatened to sue the Post for libel. The Post dared him to do so, and he quickly left for the East. It is known that at the time of Biggy's death he was on the point of making sensational disclosures. And so one may harbor the thought that his death was not accidental without being suspected of romanticism.

Rader Up and Doing

Competition stimulates the energies of men in the pulpit as well as of men in the counting house. Witness the feverish endeavors of the Rev. William Rader, D. D., since the advent of the Rev. Charles Aked, D. D. Before the coming of Dr. Aked his contemporary Dr. Rader pursued the even tenor of his way in a path paved with tradition. He entertained his flock in the old familiar way, giving them their money's worth in sermons more or less platitudinous, but never attempting to vindicate his resourcefulness or his inventive faculty. He led a very quiet life. Calvary Presbyterian Church under Dr. Rader's guidance was safe, sane and conservative. The pastor cut no capers. He posed as a civic patriot occasionally but not any more so than the average minister who believes that he should be the expositor of political as well as religious sentiments. Now he is the busiest man in the whole parish. Apparently he has determined that Dr. Aked shall not monopolize the limelight. Two weeks ago he started a clinic for the indigent sick and an employment bureau for poor wage-earners. A little later he issued a dodger announcing "A Mass-meeting of the California Prison Commission at the Calvary Presbyterian Church" for Sunday evening, April 30, with himself, Rev. Martin Meyer, Hon. Samuel M. Shortridge and Charles Montgomery as the spellbinders of the occasion. "The public is earnestly invited," said Dr. Rader. "We don't want your money, but we do want your sympathy and influence to help bring about more merciful humane conditions."

Aked the Homeopathist

Dr. Aked must realize by this time that he is not the only headliner on the salvation circuit. In Dr. Rader he has a very keen and resourceful rival, a gentleman who has had some training in yellow journalism, having once been employed to give color and tone to the editorial utterances of the Boughten Bulletin. But Dr. Aked is still a novelty, and therefore he enjoys a big advantage. Dr. Aked is in demand about town. Last week he was the star performer at the Commencment Exercises of the Hahnemann College and proclaimed himself a homeopathist, paying enthusiastic tribute to homeopathy and Dr. Ward. Such high tribute did he pay to Dr. Ward that that modest gentleman was suffused with blushes. And so warm were the encomiums which he fashioned for homeopathy that his hearers wondered how he can reconcile his sentiments with those that he is expected to utter at the commencement exercises of the Cooper Medical College for which he had been already billed.

Bernhardt and Jean Richepin

Many are the old stories about Bernhardt that have been revived during the past week. That of her first meeting with Jean Richepin of the French Academy is worth repeating. Richepin had been a good deal of a vagabond, wandering about Europe and gathering the material for the stories and plays which afterwards earned him a fauteuil in the Academy. One night in Paris he went to see Bernhardt play and was carried away by her genius. He determined to meet her and made his way to the stage door. There he encountered the usual throng of caped and monocled johnnies waiting with their floral offerings for the great artiste. But when she appeared at the threshold Richepin cleared them away like so many figures of straw, lifted her violently into his arms and kissed her. Bernhardt started to uncork the vials of her wrath—and she can be terrible when she is aroused—but catching a glimpse of the handsome fellow with piercing eyes and blonde beard who was holding her captive, she changed her mind. She gave him her card, begged him to call a cab and allowed him to accompany her to her home. It was two years before the ardor of that sudden friendship cooled.

Sarah to Lady Brassey

Another facetious story goes that at a reception in London a blundering flunkey announced, to the consternation of everybody, "Mademoiselle Bernhardt and son." Lady Brassey came later and met the great actress who immediately introduced Maurice. "But Mademoiselle, I did not know that you were married," said Lady Brassey. "I am not and never was," Sarah replied. "Mais, votre fils—." "Ah! mon fils—c'etait une accident d'amour."

The Thinness of Her

When Bernhardt first came to this country slenderness was not as violently sought and as elaborately accentuated by our women as it is today. So the boniness of her was the subject of much jesting. An Oriental potentate who was invited to meet her in Paris, it was recalled, had remarked, when asked what he thought of her: "In my country we drown such women." "All flesh is grass," quoted a Chicago paper shortly after her arrival; "Bernhardt must have been raised during a drought." A minstrel joke of the day involved a guess as to what sort of a Christmas present Sarah received in her stocking. "A lightning rod," was the answer. Nobody ever thought in those days that Bernhardt would have the courage to exhibit her legs on the stage in such plays as "L'Aiglon" and "Hamlet." Her extreme thinness excited more interest than her art. One odesmith broke forth with:

"How thin is Sarah Bernhardt, pa,
That shadow of a shade?"
"My boy, she's just about as thin
As picnic lemonade."

A Boston paper was responsible for the following: "Sarah Bernhardt will come to this country to play Rosalind. As Sarah can't possibly play it for the sole purpose of showing her legs, it is barely possible that we may see a good performance."

Sarah's Regimen

We used, in those old days, to hear more of what Sarah ate and what she drank and how she managed to keep thin. The interviewers seem to be more scrupulous nowadays about asking for these domestic details. We only learn from one that she eats little bits of ham and spinach and from another that she soaks her toast in her coffee, not very enlightening for those feminine readers who long to get rid of their encroaching adipose. In former years she used to tell how she consumed vast quantities of fish and eggs "by the dozen, ten a day very often." And she used to confess her partiality for champagne. She was never much of a believer in fresh air, pointing out that she retained her fresh complexion despite the ten or twelve hours she spent every day in the bad air and artificial light of the theater. Even when she took her vacations at Belle Isle-on-Sea she never went out without muffling up her face to protect it from the breezes.

When Sarah Weakened

Nothing has distinguished Sarah Bernhardt from other women of international renown quite as much as her indifference to the opinion of Mrs. Grundy. She has always been quite frank in her unconventionalities. Hypocrisy is not in her. She has lived her life as she saw fit to live it and after many a hard fight has mastered public opinion and compelled the conventional to accept her as she offers herself. I can recall only one instance when she weakened before the clamor of the mob. That was when Oscar Wilde fell from his high estate and was loaded with the abuse of a pharisaical public. Shortly before he had written "Salome" for Bernhardt and she had put it in rehearsal. If she had produced it, or even paid him for it as she had agreed to do, the money so earned would have been very handy for his defense in court. But she did not dare to play it and repudiated the arrangements which she had made.

Her Bitterest Foe

It was only a short time ago, by the way, that Bernhardt's bitterest foe died in Paris in great misery. I refer to unfortunate Marie Columbier who attacked Bernhardt in a book called "Sarah Barnum" which gave a highly colored and, to a great extent, an untruthful account of Bernhardt's life. The men and women who had figured prominently in Sarah's colorful career were introduced under assumed names but their identity was easily established. The book was the outgrowth of jealousy, Marie Columbier being a rival actress. It circulated all over the world, but did not do the harm which it was intended to do. Marie Columbier was discredited, lost her professional standing and gradually sank lower and lower while Bernhardt's fame grew steadily.

Her Famous Coffin

It was Aurelien Scholl, one of the wittiest and best known journalists of the gay and naughty Second Empire period who gave to the world the story of Bernhardt's coffin, often considered the greatest press agent story ever published. It was in 1876 that Bernhardt, then "a mere scabbard of white silk," as Rostand called her, decided upon preparing for death. She was playing "La Fille de Roland" at the Comedie Francaise and every night she was prostrated with fatigue. She was haunted with the fear of death and had herself measured for a coffin, a delicately beveled and burnished toy of pearwood ornamented with her initials in silver and her motto, "Quand-meme." She showed the coffin to Scholl and he elaborated the story, telling of the souvenirs which Sarah had placed beneath the satin lining. He faked a love letter and affixed the signature of a rival journalist, nearly precipitating a duel.

"Do you think I am really your affinity?" asked Solomon's 985th wife coquettishly.

"My dear," said the wisest guy, "you are one in a thousand." He got away with it too.

Joaquin's Buttons

Moved by the published statements that Joaquin Miller was dying, statements which the tough old poet quickly disproved, Nat Goodwin was telling some friends at the Lambs Club of the costume in which he once saw Miller in this city. "He was arrayed gorgeously in a Klondyke reindeer suit and the buttons were all gold nuggets, each of the approximate value of $1700. I don't remember how many of those buttons there were, but I can see 'em yet. I have seen some pretty costly buttons on the front facades of some of the gilded youth on this and the other side of the Atlantic, but as far as I am a judge I think the old poet carries the palm in that direction, and I've done some button buying myself, both for feminine and other adornment." That man hasn't a soul above buttons who would deny Nat Goodwin's right to speak with authority on buttons, but who, I would like to know, ever heard of the gold nuggets that buttoned Miller's reindeer suit? Who except Nat ever saw them? I'm afraid Nat has been pulling the long bow.

His Funeral Pyre

But Nat Goodwin is not the only person who has been pulling the long bow at Joaquin Miller. One of the exuberantly gifted imaginative writers for the New York Sunday supplements has been telling what Joaquin Miller's funeral will be like. I learn that "when Joaquin Miller dies in excess of three quarters of a million people are to be treated to a spectacular cremation." There are interesting particulars. The funeral pyre is of solid masonry and adjoins the poet's home on "The Hights." Here also are cypress and cedar trees in the form of a cross "plainly visible from San Francisco and Oakland." And then we have a glowing picture of the dead poet figuring as the center of attraction in a spectacle observed by "nearly a million people." The idea is extravagant enough to fit into one of Joaquin's poems.

Kent Surprised Them

From one of the Washington correspondents I learn that the Republicans in the Congress are asking one another, "What kind of a Republican is this fellow Kent of California?" It seems that the question was elicited by Kent's tariff speech, a speech which was delivered when the House was "almost empty," I read, but which Kent's brother congressmen took the pains of perusing in the Congressional Record, that storehouse of literary tidbits. One of the expressions in the speech which caused wonderment was this: "Those who assume that the tariff is a means of creating prosperity or of creating wealth are much better at juggling and at picking coins out of the air than was Herman the magician. If we cannot tax ourselves rich, we can prove poker to be a productive industry." I wonder at that statement myself, for the simple reason that I am not quite sure that I get the drift of it. Kent's attitude on Canadian reciprocity also caused some surprise. Before the vote was taken he said: "It must be shown that the measure is not an undue discrimination against certain classes. It must further be shown that the measure is for the benefit of the average of those of our people engaged in occupations that fit our country, with less regard for occupations that are tariff-created and therefore exotic." Kent's Missouri attitude was removed, for he voted for the bill. Then he explained why he voted for it: "I do not consider it to be entirely fair, but believe it a step in the right direction, though taken with the wrong foot." All of which helps to elucidate, if not Kent's state of mind, at least the state of mind of those congressmen who are surprised at our Bill.

Politics on the Embarcadero

Those who find delight in tracing the complicated mazes of State and local politics should not overlook the situation on the water front. The salty breeze that blows along East Street or the Embarcadero, as it is now more elegantly designated, is surcharged with the stuff of storms. All is not well in the councils of the Board of Harbor Commissioners and those who have keen eyes for the shadows cast before by coming events are looking for a shakeup. The placidity of Governor Johnson's appointees was first publicly disturbed when Commissioner Joe Dwyer differed with Commissioner Marshal Hale over the awarding of concessions in the Ferry Depot. A mild remark made by Hale elicited from Dwyer the acid statement that "Mr. Dwyer was not accounting to Mr. Hale or to anybody else for the votes he cast" and in the asperity of the retort there was a world of things untold. Now it is being whispered that Hale is disgusted with his job and is already selecting careful phrases for a letter of resignation. It is being told that the commission is threatened with disruption on the reef of patronage. It seems that when he made his appointments Governor Johnson told the commissioners that they were to have a free hand in the distribution of patronage and that this gubernatorial promise turned out to be a joke, the humor of which Hale, for one, does not appreciate. I am informed that the exigencies of the United States senatorial contest were such that to insure the election of Judge Works the Governor had to cultivate certain friendships the symbols of which are jobs which the Harbor Commissioners must distribute regardless of their own friends and their own ideas about patronage. It will be exceedingly awkward for the governor to have a resignation fired at him so early in his term and undoubtedly he will do everything in his power to ward off the threatening trouble. We can but wait and watch developments.

The Governor and Tom Finn

Second only to the mayoralty contest in interest will be the mad scramble for the shrievalty. The three men who fought this fight two years ago, Sheriff Finn, Larry Dolan and Fred Eggers, are once more in the field and other redoubtable Richmonds are buckling on their hand satchels and passing out their pasteboards. Into this fight the Governor will find it necessary to inject his influence—once again on account of friendships made during the session of the Legislature. In the senatorial contest and in other matters of import Sheriff-Senator Tom Finn did yeoman's service for the Governor, lining up most of the San Francisco statesmen and voting them like the legislative sheep that they so frequently are. He believes in reciprocity and will expect the Governor to reciprocate by lending a helping hand in the shrieval competition. It looks as though the Governor will have "to come through." It is a distasteful situation for many reasons, chief of which is the undeniable fact that Finn is not a reformer in any acceptation of the term approved by the Governor and his sympathizers.

The political wiseacres are watching to see how the Governor will behave in what they insist on regarding as an unpleasant predicament.

A Chance for Charlie Hanlon

The rumor that Anna Held and "Florrie" Ziegfeld have separated, never to come together again, has been revived during the presence of Ziegfeld and the "Follies" company in San Francisco. Ziegfeld dislikes this story, but it will crop up as long as he continues to star Lillian Lorraine of whom Anna, as a rival artiste, is extremely jealous. Before leaving this city Ziegfeld stated that he would arrive in New York at the same time that Anna Held would arrive there from Paris, but friends of the latter insist that she has written letters declaring that she will never return to this country. No doubt she has designs on the Parisian stage. In the interests of domestic harmony I would suggest that Charlie Hanlon try his hand at reconciling Anna and "Florrie." Charlie is very friendly with husband and wife. More than that, he has been able to maintain terms of cordiality with Miss Lorraine in San Francisco without alienating Anna's esteem. He is therefore a diplomat and might succeed in keeping the Ziegfelds together.

Olga versus Sarah

In New York they are saying that Olga Nethersole "beat Sarah Bernhardt to it." This is not the language of art but the vulgar parlance of the irreverent stage folk who look at stars with a microscope that brings to light many hidden things. In unsophisticated San Francisco we were given to understand that the Nethersole offered "Sister Beatrice" as a pure and disinterested sacrifice on the altar of art. But in New York they put it differently. They say that when Bernhardt announced that she would give a performance of the Maeterlinck play here and then hold it for her repertoire in Paris, there was a long distance consultation between the Nethersole and her managers. They immediately secured the American rights to the play and Olga produced it. New York regards this as "putting one over," but as I have remarked before, New York hasn't much of a soul.

The Long Stage Waits

The audience which attended the first presentation of "Sister Beatrice" by Olga Nethersole at the Savoy could not understand the long waits between the first and second and again between the second and third acts. There was no change of scene and the interminable pauses protracted the play beyond midnight. I am told that it was a case of sulks. The Nethersole was not pleased with the size of the audience or with the reception of the double bill. She was particularly exasperated when some people in the audience laughed at what was meant to be serious business. So she punished the audience by keeping it waiting till its patience was exhausted and its appreciation for art dulled by sleepiness.

Fan—Are you a married man?
Dan—I don't know; the jury is still out.

Another Hearst Daily

That most prolific of journalists, William R. Hearst, is about to extend his influence to the Northwest. Negotiations for the purchase of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer have ceased, too much money having been asked for it, but Hearst will have a Seattle daily nevertheless. He has decided to start a new one. His only reason for trying to buy the Post-Intelligencer was that he wanted an Associated Press franchise. This he cannot have. But Hearst has a very good news service of his own, and he improves it with every new paper that he starts. Though Seattle already has two morning dailies it is the morning field that Hearst will invade. The Times of Seattle is one of the most prosperous dailies on the Coast.

"Bud" Fisher's Luck

The sale of the Mutt and Jeff plaster statuettes reminds me of the remarkable success which "Bud" Fisher has won as a sporting page illustrator. I am told that the manufacturers of the manikins paid Fisher a cash bonus of $40,000 before they placed their wares on the market. From his published book of drawings and from his vaudeville engagements Fisher has drawn other golden streams; and of course he

PROFITS

Ordinarily on Men's Clothing there are two profits — one which goes to the manufacturer, out of which he must pay for his expensive selling organization and his extensive advertising campaigns in addition to his overhead costs. The other profit legitimately belongs to the retailer, but the consumer pays for both ultimately.

If the manufacturer could or would sell direct one profit would be eliminated or if the retailer could manufacture his own goods one of the two profits could be cut out. This is exactly what happens to "Wood" clothing, the kind we sell.

S. N. Wood & Co. make it. We are manufacturers and sell to other dealers as well. We distribute it at retail, too. Sell our own product. See the point? One profit is cut out. One only left instead of two. This MUST MEAN and does mean one of two things. Either you get the SAME SUIT cheaper here than elsewhere or the price being equal you get a better constructed—better wearing suit here than in any other shop. We know these to be facts—the question is do YOU know it? If you do you are a "Wood" customer. If you do not we want a chance to convert you by showing you our Suits at $18.50, $22.50 and $25.00.

P. S.—This argument applies to Boys' and Youths' Clothing also. We make our own goods in these lines as well.

From what I hear, I am afraid that Fisher is not careful of his money. His prosperity has aroused in him a feverish desire for spending and he is an over-enthusiastic student of the giddy life that is lived along the Great White Way.

Exeunt the Goo-Goos

The Good Government League of which Isidor Jacobs is the presiding genius, is just realizing that it is dead. The Goo Goos, as they are irreverently called, committed hari kari more than two years ago when they were caught trying to tab the political views of voters by means of markings concealed beneath the postage stamps of their campaign envelopes. After that the league's power, whether for good or evil, disappeared but the organization lagged superfluous on the political stage, forever trying to resuscitate its influence. It was a rude shock when the members of the Municipal Conference refused to have anything to do with its meetings. Fondly enough the Goo Goos thought they recognized in the municipal conferees those pretensions to political rectitude of which Isidor Jacobs is the champion exponent and when the word went out that there was to be no communion between the two bodies, Jacobs and his associates nearly expired from astonishment and chagrin. I am told that Jacobs now definitely despairs of the welfare of his beloved city. But he is chary about expressing his despair in public places. He has kept in the background for some time, preferring that others in the league should receive the full force of the attacks leveled at the organization. The attacks, however, have been few; on the principle, no doubt, that de mortuis nil nisi bonum.

Bob Davis, Playwright

Our old friend Bob Davis who is actively engaged under the more respectful designation of Robert H. Davis in guiding the destinies of the Munsey publications in New York, has just produced a play. To be exact, it is a playlet and of the "thriller" variety. It is entitled "$1,000 Reward" and embodies a harrowing tale not unmixed with comedy, pathos and romantic love. The reward has been offered for "The Keno Kid" who had the misfortune to slay "Faro George." Pursued by the sheriff "The Keno Kid" comes to an adobe hut where an entrancingly beautiful and superlatively virtuous young lady of the alkali country resides with her father as chaperon. The worst thing about "The Keno Kid" is his name; he is really very lovable and it is a case of mutual devotion at first sight. Of course she believes him when he asseverates that "Faro George" drew first and therefore deserved to be slain. She gives him food and advises him to take a nap in her father's bed. He takes the advice, most unfortunately, as it turns out; for the sheriff needs that reward for campaign expenses and is hot on his trail. He comes to the adobe hut and handcuffs "The Keno Kid" while he is sleeping the sleep of the just. But things happen swiftly. "The Kid" and the girl disarm the sheriff, make him break the handcuffs and compel him to admit that he saw "Faro George" draw first. All the critics agree that this is the greatest play that has been written since "The Bandit" convulsed theatredom.

McClatchy Is Shocked

Charles McClatchy, the genial editor of the Sacramento Bee, who is traveling in Europe, is a good deal shocked by the marble and bronze nudity which he has been encountering in Rome. He can't just get used to it, having spent so many years in Sacramento where all the statues are clothed with the utmost decorum out of respect for the feelings of the modest legislators who sojourn there every two years. But Charley is doing his best to overcome his predilection for draperies. Thus he writes to his faithful subscribers: "You have to grow accustomed to many things over here—one of which is the startling nakedness of the public statues. They are certainly frankness itself. Nothing is omitted from the male figure that even a medical student could suggest. And now and then, in statue, in painting, or in tapestry work, you run across a representation of the female form divine which could do service as an illustration for a doctor's book. And fathers and mothers bring their little girls to these public places and public exhibitions, where they gaze upon these things by the hour, and seem to think nothing about it."

At the Bernhardt Premiere

On Tuesday morning I scanned the papers eagerly to see what the bavardes, those delicious emphasizers of the joy of living, had to say about the reappearance before a San Francisco audience of Madame Sarah Bernhardt. I was not disappointed in my anticipation of amusing reading. The bavardes are nothing if not independent in their investigations and individual in their impressions. They very seldom see things from the ordinary viewpoint. On this occasion their diversity of opinion is almost classic; certainly, it is worthy of comment. The bavarde of the Call, for instance, tells us that it was "a large and fashionable audience" and that the "gowns of the women were never more beautiful," which latter statement embodies extremely high praise, for San Francisco sometimes exhibits wonderfully smart first night audiences. The bavarde of the Examiner, on the other hand, remarks that "it was not the usual first night audience." "But," continues this cunning writer, "it was just as fashionable an audience." That is very nice of the bavarde, is it not? Then what perverse imp of scribbledom impelled her to continue the sentence with a disparaging "although"? There is as much malice in her "although" as there was virtue in Touchstone's "if." Read what she says: "Although one noted that the many laces, the silks and even the jewels were mostly of a fashion worn by the belles of a generation or two ago. Many doubtless were the same gowns and the same jewels worn by the women who greeted this incomparable grande dame on her first visit to San Francisco." After perusing that I can only express my feelings in an inelegant but heartfelt "Wow!" For if you recall, it was more than twenty years ago that Bernhardt first came to this city; so those gowns, those laces, those jewels must be very very old. How in the name of miracles were they saved through fire and earthquake? After reading that blast the comment of the Chronicle bavarde is mild. She merely remarks in passing, as though chary of giving details, that "the society element predominated" and that there were "beautiful gowns and many jewels."

The Culture of the Audience

That Bernhardt opened to an audience of unusual cultivation I am assured by these same bavardes. One says that there was present a large representation of the colony of students, scholars and literati in addition to the society folk who of course must not be mistakenly regarded as studious, scholarly or literary. Another tells us that scores of the women present had been studying the French dramas in the original all during the winter, but points out rather discouragingly for these martyrs to enthusiasm that even for those who did not understand a word of French the entire performance was perfectly plain, the language of the players being from the heart. French spoken from the heart apparently needs no translation. It is interesting to learn from another bavarde that the lovers of French art and literature, "of whom there are many in society," expressed their intelligent appreciation of the play. Now what is one going to gather from this complexity of bavardistic utterance? I find myself bathed not in light, but in darkness visible after conning these cryptic statements.

A Less Flattering View

However, as I was there myself, I feel that perhaps I may be pardoned for expressing a personal opinion based on observations. In the first place, it was not a very swagger audience. One couldn't compare it for a moment with a representative audience at a concert of the St. Francis Musical Art Society; or even with such an audience as invariably turns out for the first night of a Barrymore or a Drew or a Mrs. Pat Campbell. One missed a lot of beautiful women whose beautiful gowns add to the luster of many of our first nights. Where they were I am at a loss to explain, but I wouldn't be surprised if some of them who have seen Bernhardt many times here and abroad preferred the strictly American enchantments of Blanche Ring and her musical comedy company at the Savoy. As to those who were there, undoubtedly some were able to follow Bernhardt's rapid utterance with understanding. But they were either to the language born or wonderfully accomplished masters or mistresses of French. Hundreds about me read the printed argument of the play with eagerness and lack of shame, apparently not caring whether or not their linguistic shortcomings were exposed to the derision of the highbrows. I saw a lot of people applauding sentiments which they could not possibly understand and laughing at witty sallies which Rostand couched in a phraseology that was above their meager knowledge. And yet I would not say that there was a great deal of pretense. Several people had the courage to confess to me that they didn't understand a word Bernhardt or any other of the players declaimed. Others brightened perceptibly when they caught a "maís" or a "oui" or a "non" and seemed to feel that after all French was not so difficult.

Why Many Were Absent

I think I have an idea why so many of our smart first nighters were absent. It is largely the fault of the bourgeois element in our population. This element, as we all know, is not very swagger but it is intensely serious and loves the good things of art. It was responsible for the run on "L'Aiglon" in the book shops and the libraries, just as it was responsible for the exhaustion of the local supply of copies of the "Old Curiosity Shop" when the Dickens play was given by Max Figman at the Alcazar. It went to the box office in Geary street as soon as the seat sale commenced and stood patiently in line until it secured its tickets. Naturally it got some of the best seats in the theater. And if it couldn't afford to pay three dollars for a seat, it cheerfully paid less and didn't seem to mind if its financial deficiencies compelled it to sit in the balcony or away back in the gallery, for that matter. And so it happened that when hoi aristoi sent messengers for "the best seats in the house," hoi aristoi found that they were already sold and decided to stay at home. Perhaps hoi polloi should be blamed for its selfishness; then again perhaps it should not. Personally I like to see hoi polloi crowd hoi aristoi out of the good seats once in a while and I have noticed that the bourgeoisie can enjoy a good performance even if it does wear clothes that are a little old-fashioned. Our aristocrats, of course, could never enjoy Bernhardt except in garments of the latest cut.

Burlingame Did Not Turn Out

Neither Mrs. Eleanor Martin nor the members of her charming family were in evidence at the Bernhardt premiere, a fact whose social significance, if it has any, I am at a loss to fathom. Burlingame was not in evidence, although its leading citizens are insatiable first nighters. With the Martins, the McNears, the Taylors, the Magees and Miss Jennie Crocker were conspicuous by their absence. About the only representative of the clan was Mrs. Joseph D. Grant. Now why did they all stay away? Is it possible that they did not care to submit their minds to the intellectual strain of watching a French play? I am quite sure that if Mrs. Frank Carolan had happened to be in town, they would have appeared in force or else forfeited her good opinion. She wouldn't care to invite to that salon of hers to which we all look forward so eagerly any Blingumite who missed the Bernhardt premiere.

Young Mrs. Martin

What a wonderful woman is the Queen Dowager of San Francisco's smart set. As wonderful in her way is Mrs. Eleanor Martin as the distinguished French woman who is entertaining us this week at the Columbia where rapt audiences have marveled at the eternal youth of her art. Like the divine Sarah Mrs. Martin has grown old gracefully. Her heart has resisted the frigidity of winter's snows. Her gray hairs are like the soft light of the moon that silvers over the evening of life. Hers is a cheerful, kindly, sunshiny old age. As I saw her enter the concert hall at the St. Francis on the night of the Heinemann concert last week I thought of the many stories I heard about the keenness of her appetite for nocturnal diversion. In this respect she's the youngest woman in society. When there's anything doing worth while Mrs. Martin desires to be on hand. No early, luxurious couch for her. Rather the passing show, be the hour ever so late. Sometimes closed lids testify to a weariness of the flesh, but the spirit never falters. When Mrs. Martin appeared at the concert a murmur rose from the fashionable throng which I had not the slightest difficulty in interpreting. "Now start up the band," was unmistakably the sentiment. And presto! the singer appeared. Seated out in the front of her box Mrs. Martin beamed on the great vocalist and her applause was generous while it lasted—but, alas! as the night wore on Mrs. Martin faded into the background. I wondered whether the delicious music had summoned the gentlest of the deities.

Miss Dietrich's Engagement

So carefully did Miss Albertine Dietrich guard her engagement to John Jerome Alexander Jr. that even her most intimate friends were surprised when the announcement was made last week. Miss Dietrich is the daughter of Edington Dietrich by his first wife who was formerly Miss Allie Tucker, one of the most beautiful girls in Oakland's exclusive set. Miss Dietrich's aunts are Mrs. George McNear (Etta Tucker), Mrs. Edward Brayton (Ena Tucker) and Mrs. August McDonald. The first wife of C. O. G. Miller was pretty Mae Tucker who died years ago. Miss Dietrich's mother has been dead some years, since which time Miss Albertine, although very young, ran the household for her father and mothered her two young brothers until last year when her father married again. Young Alexander belongs to a prominent Portland family. No date has been set for the wedding as the prospective groom is still attending college. In connection with the secrecy of the engagement Miss Dietrich tells an amusing story. Her little brother, at the time her father contemplated marrying a second time, took it upon himself to station himself in front of the house and inform every passerby of the approaching nuptials. So Miss Dietrich profited by her father's experience and did not let her young brother into the secret until the night before the announcement when she called him to her, saying: "I have a great secret to confide in you, but you must promise faithfully you will not tell anybody." He solemnly promised, so Miss Dietrich said, "I'm going to marry John Jerome Alexander." The boy said, "Oh! how fine! I won't tell. Won't Mr. Alexander be surprised when he hears it!"

Dan Cupid is Busy

Engagements are still being announced and every week adds one or two of society's belles to the list of engaged girls. I am told another member of the Foster family of San Rafael, Miss Lou Foster, is betrothed to the brother of one of her intimate friends, a bride of last year, and that this may be announced before next winter. Society is disappointed at losing one large wedding of the year which will take place in Cleveland where Margaret Calhoun will become the bride of Paul Foster. The Calhouns went East this week to open their home in Cleveland and the marriage is planned for next fall. Lou Foster will go East to be one of the attendants. By this marriage two large families will be united. There are half a dozen young people among the Fosters and as many in the Calhoun family of whom Margaret is the first to wed. Of the Fosters Mrs. Kuechler, Mary Foster, and Mrs. Draper, Anna Foster, and Will Foster are all married and their homes on the Fair Hills estate near their parents make an interesting settlement which the Paul Fosters will join after their marriage.

At the Bohemian Club

Among the younger girls who attracted attention by their stunning appearance at the Bohemian Club on last Saturday was Miss Helen Grey who wore orchids which reached from her shoulder to her waist line, almost hiding her pretty face.

Miss Schultz's Bonnet

Miss Elyse Schultz has acquired the reputation of wearing lovely hats. She has a great variety of them and seems to appear in a new one at least once a week. Her Easter bonnet this year was a small black straw that fitted close around her face and had ear flaps of apple green. There was a mass of apple green tulle on the crown and only a fair youthful face could have been successfully framed in it. Her friend Jenny Lee has a violet hat this spring of rough straw turned up in front and decorated with small bunches of violets. The two girls were teaing at the Palace the other day in their new millinery.

Pity for a Pencil Woman

I have just heard a good story about a prominent clubwoman who helped sell pencils for the San Francisco Nursery for Homeless Children. She was stationed in front of the St. Francis on the first day of the sale and proffered her pencils to those who passed in and out of the hotel. An Eastern man who had arrived that morning was accosted and purchased two pencils from her. While she made change he noticed that the woman appeared to be intelligent and was neatly clad. His surprise at her vocation found expression in words which she repeated with great appreciation to her friends at the close of the day. "I should think a woman of your intelligence could find something better to do than selling pencils," he said kindly. Her reply was that it was the best thing she could find to do at the time.

The Bernhardt in "L'Aiglon"

Edward F. O'Day

The supremacy of this actress has long since become a tradition of the stage and there are none among us who may be so temerarious as to question her position. Only for us to raise our hats to her genius, as to that of a Siddons, a Rachel, a Ristori, paying our little unexacted tribute for the privilege enjoyed by our elders, the privilege, namely, of seeing her at her best. That privilege the inexorable march of time drumming along in its terrible pathway years and the fatigue of years, wrinkles and hardening arteries and a heart beating wearily in a withering breast, has denied us. We have been admitted just before the ringing down of the curtain, when the star is breathing short and quick from the exhaustion of a long though glorious performance and it is not for us to measure the waning powers by the severe standards that would have seemed meanly inadequate in the glorious yesteryears. Bernhardt vidi tantum? No, it is something more than that. The fire still burns fiercely in that aged bosom. The soul has not been constricted by the tightening grip of inexorable Time. But the tenement of the immortal spirit is verging to decay and almost one is tempted to pass the melancholy judgment, "vox et praeterea nihil." If one could sit with closed eyes and drink the music of that insuperable voice! If one could look only with the kindly eye of imagination! If one were not compelled, by the traditions of the theater and—let us confess it—by a curiosity not to be denied, to scan the figure, to study its every movement, to weigh the vigor of the spirit against the too obvious infirmity of the flesh! There sat near me one whose hearing was imperfect. For that person the voice of Bernhardt was scarcely a thing to reckon with. The sight of her was all. And I thought, Suppose conditions were reversed; suppose there were no Bernhardt to see but only a voice to hear? But no, that is going too far. There is much to see, much that it would be an irreparable loss not to see and remember. Not the physical contours certainly. There was nothing of the Eaglet there. The frail beauty of that too senstive plant flowered in Maude Adams but did not bloom for a moment in Bernhardt. (Surely when Rostand wrote the play for this aging woman he paid her an audaciously Gallic compliment, among all compliments ever paid to any women on her age the classic, the ultimate compliment, a compliment that the passing of a decade has turned to a grim, a jovian pleasantry.) Not her movements. For they are slow and carefully considered against the possibility of strain. How seldom she crosses the stage! Not more than twice or thrice in an act. How pitifully dependent is she on the support of judiciously scattered tables and chairs. How cunningly does she contrive that the flashing of a cane or the lashing of a whip shall give her almost constant contact with some bit of furniture that is stable and unyielding! And how heavily she leaned her distressed weight on the arms of her fellow players when it was necessary to smile through the ordeal of repeated curtain calls. But in her face, not scanned too closely—for then the sad lines that tighten about the eyes and relax about the mouth of one enriched and impoverished by age are unavoidably noticed—in her face, seen not too piercingly, there is the magic of perfect mimetic control. All the passions have been mirrored in that marvellous countenance, all the subtleties of civilization have molded its long curving lines, all the thoughts of the poets, the dreamers, the doers of ten Parisian lustra have put their impress there. It is the playground of a thousand fancies, the battlefield of a hundred emotions. Smiles dance across its brightness, frowns lower in its gloom; the flashes of hope, the headlong dartings of despair, hopes that kindle, doubts that paralyze, realizations that finally slay, all live their fevered tumultuous lives through the three short hours when the face of Bernhardt has become the face of the Eaglet. Yes, one must watch that face, that transfigured face, as well as hear that voice to know the best of the Bernhardt of today. And in what play could one wish to know her more than in "L'Aiglon"? For it is an epic of the stage, a flight on modern wings into those tremendous places where Homer and Milton abide at the right hand and the left of Shakespeare with all that is human for their footstool. It is the "Hamlet" of a paler century, embodying all that was great and all that was evil in the life and death and influence of a greater than Caesar or Alexander; embodying it with supreme irony in the puny form of a foredoomed boy. The pageantry of a hundred victorious stricken fields moves to its stately Alexandrine measure; the blood of a million victims saturates its living lines. It speaks to the soul like a trumpet. It begins with the happy chatter of women; it reaches its tremendous climax on a haunted battlefield that speaks with myriad voices to a haunted soul; it ends with death. Too much, this, for the face of an aged woman to express and for the voice of an aged woman to utter, wonderful though that face and that voice may be. Youth or the crafty simulation of youth there should be too. Bernhardt's time for that has passed, but nevertheless to see her face glow and darken like the face of the Eaglet, to hear her voice run the gamut of emotion like the voice of the Eaglet—this is much. It is to share personally in a great part of the tradition that is Bernhardt. A little later and it will be too late. Let us be thankful that we came before the last curtain fell.

BLANCHE RING
Who is making such a hit in "The Yankee Girl" at the Savoy.

Gossip of the Theatre

The Russian Symphony

Not for many moons has San Francisco had so fine a tribute paid to its love of music as that which is implied in the visit of Modest Altschuler and his big Russian Symphony orchestra. The importation of this splendid body of musicians to this city for a series of concerts is one of the most ambitious of the many Greenbaum achievements, and nothing short of the utmost enthusiasm on the part of music lovers will attest adequate appreciation of the enterprise. This symphony orchestra is one capable of the very highest effects. At the opening concert at Scottish Rite Auditorium last Sunday afternoon music was heard that was indeed a medium between the spiritual world and the sensual. This was especially so when Liadow's "Enchanted Lake" was played. It was like echoes of the invisible world, abounding as it does in notes of divine concord that might have emanated from a mysterious bourne somewhere between the region of thought and the domain of phenomena. Altschuler is a man of poise and poetical imagination under whose baton composers are interpreted con amore making you feel that you were bidden to a feast of pleasure rather than to a session of pedantry. While the feature of the performance was quality and swing Altschuler lured from his huge body of men pianissimos that were thread-like. The most pretentious piece on the program was Rachmaninoff's second symphony in E minor, a very elaborate work, impressive and stirring. In two "Caucasian Sketches" were introduced obligatos that were clean-cut and the technique impeccable. Some interesting music history will be made in this city during the stay of this big, robust orchestra with its masterly instrumentalists and magnetic leader. —L. V. R.

Blanche Ring in "The Yankee Girl"

For the pleasure which Miss Blanche Ring is affording the town in "The Yankee Girl" at the Savoy one cannot but feel deep gratitude. Sometimes one is inclined to think that there has been a surfeit of light musical entertainments, but the thought is banished by such offerings as this. The situations are unfailingly amusing, the lines and lyrics by George Hobart are bright, the music by Silvio Hein falls tunefully on the ear and the company is full of ginger. Miss Ring is an engaging stage figure. She is pretty, possesses the charm of an unassumed vivacity and smiles a crooked little smile that is irresistible. Her voice is equal to all the requirements of the music and her songs are given with so much gaiety of facial expression, so much liveliness of limb that it would be churlish to look for flaws. Having banished the adipose that troubled her a few years ago she presents a lissome figure that must be the delight of her modiste, for that artiste has provided her with gowns that even an uninitiate in the secrets of feminine attire can admire with intelligent enthusiasm. When she appears in tights, be it noted for the benefit of the esthetes, she reveals a pair of legs that are beyond reproach. What other musical comedy star of her magnitude is deserving of the same high compliment? I pause for a reply, but hear none. Emboldened by the silence, I take the opportunity of lamenting the fact that Miss Ring appears in those tights for only a few minutes. Let her not be afraid of critical eyes; she can bear inspection. Be brave, Miss Ring, no matter how many opera glasses are trained on your nether limbs! Harry Gilfoil is a very funny low comedian. Some of our supersensitive theatergoers don't like low comedians any more, just as they don't like tights. But that should be no discouragement. There are enough of us left with laughter on tap for players who know how to fall down stairs and to imitate animal noises, to make the continuation of the old traditions worth while. Two youngsters near me followed Gilfoil's antics with such overflowing enjoyment that they simply couldn't sit still. They either leaned forward, every muscle tense with pleasurable excitement, or leaped up and down in their seats in an ecstacy of joy. And all the time their eyes shone with merriment and their little voices pealed the sweetest music in the world. Those kids supplied the sort of criticism which shows like "The Yankee Girl" deserve.

Sydney Ayres at the Alcazar

Sydney Ayres who has earned favorable reputation as a leading stock actor in several Eastern and Pacific Coast cities will make his first appearance in San Francisco next Monday evening at the Alcazar, and Henri Bernstein's great play, "The Thief," has been selected as the medium of his introduction. In the cast with him are Izetta Jewel and the best talent of the regular company. Of all the Bernstein works there is none that achieved a more emphatic success in England and America than "The Thief." Unlike the average adaptation from the French, it subordinates a sex problem to real dramatic strength and its construction is exceptionally brilliant. The central figure, Marie Louise Voysin, is one of the most remarkable depictions of woman's indefinable vanities and impulses that has ever been drawn

"The Lily" is Coming

Following Bernhardt, a Belasco triumph, "The Lily," will receive its local premiere at the Columbia Theater next Monday night, May 8, with its complete New York cast headed by those distinguished artists Nance O'Neil and Charles Cartwright and including the favorities Julia Dean, Alfred Hickman, Ethel Grey Terry, Antoinette Walker, Oscar Eagle, W. C. Holden.

The Mary Garden Concerts

At last we are to hear and see Mary Garden, dubbed "The Sarah Bernhardt of the operatic stage." On the concert platform she is said to invest every "lied" or ballad with the same personal magnetism which she puts into her wonderful operatic interpretations and such simple works as Gounod's "Ave Maria" and "Annie Laurie" take on new beauties and meanings when given by her. With her we are glad to welcome Signor Arturo Tibaldi, the violin virtuoso, and Mr. Howard Brockwey, the eminent composer and pianist. The dates announced by Manager Will L. Greenbaum are two Sunday afternoons, May 21 and 28, and Thursday night, May 25, at Scottish Rite Auditorium. In Oakland Mary Garden will sing at Ye Liberty Playhouse on Tuesday night, May 23.

The Russian Orchestra's Final Concerts

This Friday night, May 5, the features of the program of the Russian Symphony Orchestra will be the "Prelude" to Act II of Victor Herbert's and Joe Redding's opera "Natoma," Edgar Stillman Kelley's Chinese Suite "Aladdin" and Beethoven's immortal "Fifth Symphony." At the Saturday matinee in addition to a beautiful program of orchestral works with Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony on it, Master Pepito Arriola will play the difficult "Concerto" in E flat by Liszt accompanied by the orchestra. A rare program of novelties has been arranged for the Sunday afternoon farewell. Tschaikowsky's "Symphony" No. 4, Conus' Suite "Child Life" and the "Prelude" to Humperdinck's "Koenigskinder" are among the good things promised.

The Russians at the Greek Theater

The Russian-Wagnerian festival at the Greek Theater this Saturday night promises to be one of the greatest musical events ever arranged in that wonderful auditorium. Altschuler and his fifty artists, assisted by five vocalists, will offer a program of Russian works by Glinka and Tschaikowsky, a complete ballet suit, "The Nutcrackers," the stirring "March Slav," excerpts from Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," "Siegfried," "Tannhauser," "Gotterdammerung" and "Die Meistersinger." The "Qintette" from the last named will be sung by Mmes. Dimitrieff and

Another Week of Blanche Ring

Blanche Ring will begin her second and last week at the Savoy this Sunday evening in "The Yankee Girl." Her bookings have been so arranged that she will stay over for an additional performance, Sunday night, May 14. Monday evening, May 15, the Savoy will be closed, and on Tuesday the distinguished Shakespearean stars, E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe, will begin a season of fifteen performances.

TO LEASE
Furnished house, choice location, corner lot fine marine view, modern residence, 14 rooms, 5 baths, house phones; elegantly furnished, can be had for one year or more. Address Box 44, Town Talk, San Francisco.

The Countess Knuth Recital

The piano and vocal recital of the Countess Claire Knuth will be given next Thursday evening, May 11, at Scottish Rite Auditorium. Particular interest attaches to the appearance of the Countess, aside from her musical talents, because she is a cousin by marriage of the Emperor of Germany and connected with other branches of the nobility of northern Europe. This will be her first appearance on the Pacific Coast. Victor Gomez, the well known local 'cellist, will be heard with her and Miss Mabel Shellbach of San Jose will be the accompanist. The instrumental selections include numbers from Rachmaninoff, Schumann, Beethoven and Sibelius and the vocal numbers will be from Schubert, Tosti and Gounod.

A Good Bill at the Orpheum

Anyone desiring a good laugh should see the one-act comedy which W. H. Murphy, Blanche Nichols and their company will present at the Orpheum next week. It is entitled "From Zaza to Uncle Tom" and tells the troubles of a road company. Mr. Murphy and Miss Nichols have played this skit over 1,100 times in New York. Among the recent important importations of the Orpheum are M. Golden and his Russian Troubadours who make their first appearance here next week. Eight men and five girls take part, all of whom excel as singers, dancers and musicians, their star feature being the playing of the Balalika. George W. Jones and Ben N. Deely will present their offering entitled "Hotel St. Reckless." J. Francis Dooley, a popular song writer and composer assisted by Miss Corinne Sayles, a dainty comedienne, will introduce a melange of fun and song which he quaintly calls "Pavement Patter." Next week will be the last of Clarice Vance; The Marvelous Millers; Clark and Bergman and Sam Chip and Mary Marble.

Pepito Arriola to Give Recitals

Pepito Arriola, the marvelous boy pianist, has been re-engaged by Manager Greenbaum for two recitals which will be given at Scottish Rite Auditorium on Sunday afternoon, May 14, and the following Saturday afternoon, May 20. On each occasion the gifted lad will play programs of the greatest musical importance and beauty. Special popular prices will prevail and children will be given the best seats at the rate of fifty cents. Pepito will also play in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse on Friday afternoon May 19, at 3:30. The same scale of prices will prevail.

In the Limelight

Wilson Mizner has been so successful with "The Deep Purple," his dramatization of the "badger game," that he has contracted to deliver six one-act plays this summer. He will write them when he has nothing more interesting to do.

Los Angeles is becoming quite a place for what is called, "trying it on the dog." Edgar Selwyn tried out his successful "Country Boy" there and will soon let the natives pass judgment on a new play. "The Dollar Mark" and "The Undertow" were among the other plays which were launched there.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The buying of stocks was a little more aggressive toward the end of the week and the short interest which had been growing nervous over the quiet strength of last week began to cover more freely. This resulted in substantial gains in most of the active issues and the movement has the appearance of being continued next week There is little expectation of Supreme Court decisions Monday but the street seems inclined to believe that they will be handed down May 15. There is nothing on which to base an opinion but it has influenced some outside buying for a turn in the interim. Trade conditions continue unsatisfactory pending Supreme Court decisions but crop prospects and unusual abundance of cheap money warrant higher prices for good dividend paying stocks later on.

Wheat—Deliveries on May contracts began this week and in all probability will continue to the last minute of the last business day of the month The open short interest is large. May has been traded in since June 12 last. There is a large residue that has accumulated at the various centers because of the fact that practically throughout the crop year the ordinary trade channels have been dammed up as far as the foreign outlet was concerned. This has not yet been opened. If a vigorous selling campaign is to be inaugurated it is hard to see where the buying field is to be found. Continental European stocks are still largely in excess of those of last year (which were counted excessive), and the total supply in and afloat for Europe reaches the enormous total of 109 million bushels or about 14 million bushels more than last year. Meanwhile Europe is getting weekly about two million bushels of foreign wheat above her estimated weekly requirements and Russia is due to begin her heavy spring shipments. It is too early to form any opinion of the ultimate wheat crop outlook. The concrete things known of it thus far are that the winter wheat acreage is practically the largest ever seeded and that the condition is fairly good. The spring wheat acreage has not yet been seeded but the great bulk of it is already in the ground under fine conditions, with evidence of at least a full acreage in our own northwestern states and a very largely increased acreage in Canada.

Corn—The effect of the advance in corn prices the week before last was vastly to increase the marketings at primary centers last week and to shut off a good part of the demand from abroad. The latter had nevertheless previously absorbed a great deal of property, and this grain is now moving, or will move later. Last weeks primary arrivals were double those of the corresponding week of both last year and the year before. This was a little remarkable in view of the fact that Spring work on the farm is fully under way, producers being therefore too busy to make the corn.

Cotton developed marked strength in the past week largely by professional manipulation crowding shorts and endeavoring to create alarm on account of the lateness of the season and the heavy rains along the central and western gulf regions. It is too early to figure on the planted acreage, as there is still plenty of time for this work. The lateness last year did not impair crop results. The rains of the past week have been unusually heavy along the gulf, but outside of a portion of Louisiana, the flooded sections are not factors in the cotton production. The market will have for some time the shortage of supplies to be used in lifting prices and should the spinners demand more than last year, the market will repeat recent performances. Selling of the new crop has been quite general and those who are not prepared to carry their sales against the rail of traders should not venture into the market. To the persistent seller who can finance his operations the market is very attractive in the new months.

never again see an actress work as Maude Adams worked until Margaret Anglin came."

Miss Anglin he considers a very great actress and Nance O'Neil too, but in an uneven fashion. But to see them he must cross the bay. He is too busy to watch their plays in Berkeley.

That is why I think he should have an assistant. Professor Armes should not be expected to do it all. Why should he have to superintend the ousting of mischievous boys who fling paper darts? Why should he have to worry about the distribution of programs and the filling of money orders for tickets? Why should he have to worry about missing chairs for the cadet band? Some of these details should be taken out of his hands. And yet, I wonder whether he would be pleased to see his labor lessened? I am not sure. He loves it all, loves it with the ingenuous love of a boy for a bat or a bag of marbles. And he admits he loves it. There is no pose about it. He does his work and lets it go at that.

Is the work well done? Well, they know about the Greek Theatre all over the world. Professor William Dallam Armes must find a bit of satisfaction in that undeniable fact.

spring I planted a few cabbages, and one day along came the superintendent. 'What have you here?' he called out roughly. 'How have you dared to plant anything without asking the permission of your superior officers? Dig these things up at once!' He was drunk," added Basil gloomily; "and probably that was why my cabbages displeased him. 'Three rubles fine,' he growled as he left!"

Basil sat silent, emptied his pipe and then, in a very soft voice: "A little more and I should have killed him!" he said.

"Oh, come, neighbor," said Ivanov; "you get excited too easily!"

"Not at all, old man, but I am just, and I want others to be just to me. Oh, he'd better not come back a second time, this thief of a drunkard, or I shall make a complaint!"

And Basil did, in effect, lay a complaint before the chief.

The chief of transportation was inspecting the road, for at any moment there was expected the arrival of a delegation of engineers and high functionaries from St. Petersburg. Some much needed repairs were made; telegraph poles were painted; everything was overhauled. Ivanov worked faithfully the entire week; he put all his domain in perfect order, then mended and brushed up his best suit of clothes; the copper plate that bore his number shone like the sun. Basil, too, was not less industrious.

At last the great day arrived. The chief of transportation stopped in front of Ivanov's dwelling. The latter hurried to his superior and made his report in a most military manner. The chief seeemed pleased.

"How long have you been here?" he asked.

"Since the second of May, sir," replied Ivanov.

"Thank you, that is all right. Who is at Number 64?"

The superintendent, who happened to be standing near the chief, said quickly, in a tone of suppressed anger: "Basil Spiridov!"

"Ha!" sneered the chief. "He is the man of whom you gave me so unfavorable a report, last year?"

"The same, sir," replied the superintendent.

"Very well! Now we will go and see this terrible Spiridov."

And they started in the direction of Number 64.

Ivanov watched them anxiously into the distance, thinking, "Dear me, I wonder what is in store for my poor neighbor?"

Two hours later he started toward Basil's home. Suddenly he saw, far up the track, the long, lean silhouette of his friend. Basil came forward slowly, a thick stick in his hand, a bundle slung on his back, the side of his face muffled in a white linen bandage.

"Well, neighbor," called out Ivanov; "where are you going?"

Basil Spiridov approached. He was scarcely to be recognized; a deathly pallor overspread his bony face, his hair was in disorder and his eyes burned with a sinister light.

"I am going to the city—to Moscow—to try to see the president himself," he faltered in a voice that trembled with tears.

"Ah, no, friend! What could you do there? You want to make a complaint? See, now, old comrade, be wise and give up such foolish plans. Please do! Stay with us and forget the evil they have done you!"

"Forget it! Never, brother; it is too late to talk of forgetting. You see—he struck me in the face—my blood flowed! I shall never forget it as long as I live! But he shall live to remember me!"

Ivanov took him by the hand. "Basil, I beg of you, don't go to such lengths; you will not be any better off for it!"

"Oh, I know that very well; you spoke the truth when you talked of luck. No matter! If I, personally, cannot benefit by it, at least I can have the consciousness of having suffered for justice and truth!"

"Come," said Ivanov; "tel me just what happened."

"Well, the chief inspected everything minutely —he even came into my hut. I knew he would be severe with me, so I had put all in the most perfect order. He found nothing to criticize, and was about to withdraw when I handed him my written complaint. Then, suddenly, he cried: 'What! Animal, brute! I come here to make an official inspection and you dare to trouble me with your dirty little garden? Before you are standing the highest functionaries of the government, and you have the impdence to speak of your cabbages!'

"I couldn't restrain myself; I let go my tongue —oh, not much—just a few words. But the chief took offense. Suddenly I felt something burn on my cheek. I didn't budge; I stood and took it as if it were my due. They left. Then I came back to my senses; I washed off the blood that was flowing from my cheek and nose, and I left, too!"

"And your house?" asked Ivanov.

"My wife is still there—she knows as much about the business as I do. And, in any case, I shouldn't worry about it. May the devil take them and their road!"

Basil rose and took up his bundle. "Farewell, comrade," he said. "I don't know whether I shall get any satisfaction where I am going, but at least—"

"What!" interrupted Ivanov. "You are going on foot?"

"Oh, don't be uneasy," said his friend. "I know the fireman on one of the freight trains. He will give me a lift, and in that way I can reach Moscow tomorrow.'

The two friends parted with an embrace. Basil started off alone on his weary way.

Nothing more was heard of him; his wife toiled night and day; she had grown pitifully thin, and her face and eyes were swollen with tears.

One day Ivanov met her.

"Well, neighbor," said he kindly; "your husband has not returned yet?"

The poor woman made a gesture of despair and hurried silently away, furtively drying her eyes.

Simeon Ivanov had learned, when he was quite a small boy, to make little whistles out of elder twigs; at present he gave up nearly all his leisure moments to this innocent pastime. When he had made a certain number he gave them to the conductor of one of the trains, a friend of his, and this man undertook to have them put on sale in town, at two copecks apiece

Some time after Basil's departure, Ivanov left his house one day, after having charged his wife to take his place at the passing of the six o'clock train, seized his pruning-knife and started happily for the woods, to gather material for his whistles. About six hundred yards from the railroad track there was an immense swamp nearly covered with elder-bushes. Ivanov cut a dozen or more long branches, tied them carefully together and started for home without any particular haste. The sun was already low and the silence of the hour was broken only by the twitter of a few belated birds and by the murmur of the leaves.

Ivanov drew near, unconsciously, to the track, when suddenly upon the silent air fell a sound like that of steel striking steel. He quickened his pace. "What can that be?" he thought.

Now he found himself in an open space. In front of him stretched the track, straight and glittering, mile upon mile, and there, immediately opposite him, crouched a man, apparently very busy and very much absorbed. Ivanov walked softly toward him.

"He is trying to steal the bolts!" flashed through his brain.

He came nearer, troubled at the situation and wondering how best to approach the man. Suddenly the latter rose; in his hand he held a bar of iron; this time he raised it in the air and then pushed it under the rail, leaning with all his might upon the improvised lever. The rail moved and fell over on the bank.

Ivanov felt stunned; he tried to cry out, but the sound died on his blanched lips. He had recognized his old comrade Basil, who was now running away at the top of his speed.

"Basil!" he cried. "My old friend, my brother, come back, in the name of heaven! Lend me you bar——. We still have time to replace the rail. No one shall ever know of it, I swear to you! Oh, come back—save your soul from such a sin, I implore you!"

But Basil did not come back; he sought shelter in the woods and soon disappeared.

Ivanov stood, as though turned to stone, by the side of the displaced rail. His bundle of twigs fell unheeded to his feet, as he calculated the hour. An express train was almost due to pass this, and nothing on earth could stop it. His little red flag was, of course, at home. Nothing, either, with which to replace the rail! He must run to the house and get some tools! Would God come to his aid? He began to run with all his might. Less than five hundred yards separated him from his cabin when the whistling of the approaching train rent the air, shrill and sinister. It was six o'clock; in less than two minutes the train would pass!

"God save the souls of those innocents!" he implored. "Oh, the poor passengers, the poor unsuspecting men and women! And children, too, doubtless, poor little helpless things! There they sit so quietly, never dreaming of harm, happy to be traveling so fast! God give me wisdom, show me what to do! No, there is not time to get home and come back!"

Ivanov turned in his tracks and ran back again desperately, without knowing what he did. Suddenly he seized one of his elder-branches, then ran on a little farther. The locomotive was coming nearer; he heard a vague distant puffing. Then the rails began to tremble slightly. His strength failed him; he could run no more.

Ivanov stopped at three hundred yards from the fatal place. A sudden idea flashed into life. He took off his hat and drew and immense handkerchief from his pocket; then he seized his pruning-knife. He made the sign of the cross.

"May God be my help!" he murmured.

Quickly he made a deep gash with his knife, in his left arm just above the elbow. The blood flowed red and warm. He sopped it up, feverishly, with his handkerchief, spread the handkerchief out to make it as large as possible and fastened it to the end of his elder-branch. Waving this improvised danger-signal ahead of him, he hurried up the track, as nearly as possible following his instructions for conduct "in case of danger."

He stands there, upright; he waves his flag frantically. The heavy machine is very near now. The engineer does not see him—alas, if they come any nearer, all is lost! It is impossible to stop the monster in so short a space. And the blood keeps flowing. Ivanov presses his elbow tight against his side; he strives to collect his senses but in vain——. "I should have cut deeper," is his one thought. His head swims—he cannot see clearly—a deafening buzzing sounds in his ears—he seems to hear the tolling of bells—

Now he can no longer see the train, no longer hear a sound, but the one fixed idea haunts him and tortures him ever and ever: "Ah, I shall not be able to stop it! I am falling—and my little flag, too! God, forsake me not!"

Ivanov fell, and with him fell the little flag of blood. But a hand seized it suddenly and waved it aloft. The engineer saw the signal, reversed the lever and stopped.

The crew jumped off the train, and the passengers came trooping from the coaches to see what had happened. On the ground lay stretched a man, unconscious and bathed in blood; and near him another man, very tall, very lean and very pale, held, fixed at the end of a slender elder twig, a handkerchief from which the blood dripped in streams.

Basil cast one look around him, lowered his head, and said in a trembling voice:

"Arrest me! It was I who displaced the rail!"

"Pa, what's a metrical romance?"
"Well, this month's gas bill is one."

Auto Notes

One of the neatest booklets that have appeared this season in connection with the automobile trade has recently been issued by the Stevens-Duryea Company and is entitled "What Is Your Ideal of a Motor Car?" While built up largely around the principles of Stevens-Duryea construction the discussion in the booklet is so comprehensive as to be of decided value to any prospective automobile buyer. The pamphlet is most artistically arranged.

Among cars to find recent favor in the Nevada gold mining districts is the Chalmers "30." When Calvin C. Eib, vice-president of the Pioneer Automobile Company, visited Nevada less than a year ago the Chalmers was securing its first introduction to that section. Since then the Chalmers has been employed in the hardest service that the mining activities entail and with the result that demand for it has been increased with great bounds. Last week the Pioneer Automobile Company made delivery of Chalmers "30" pony tonneaus to two Goldfield mining men, one machine going to Adolph Muller and the other to J. G. Thompson. Both purchasers took delivery of the cars in San Francisco and will drive then through to Goldfield within a few days.

J. B. Halstead, the prominent business man and capitalist of this city, has just taken delivery of a fore-door five-passenger Haynes touring car from the local branch of the Haynes Auto Sales Co. Mr. Halstead intends to do some extensive touring this spring, in which service his new Haynes will be used. Ben Lomond and Rowardennan in the Santa Cruz mountains will be among the first places visited. Mrs. Halstead will accompany her husband on the tour.

W. K. Cowan, distributor for Rambler automobiles for Southern California, reports that trade in the South is exceptionally good. The sales for the month of January, February and March of this year have been double those of the season of 1910. He also reports that prospects were never brighter than they are at this time, all of which speaks well for the 1911 Ramblers. Mr. Cowan is very popular with his customers, and he prides himself on the fact that if he once sells a man a car he sells him his second and third car.

A letter forwarded to S. G. Chapman, local distributor of Oakland, Hupmobile and Abbott-Detroit cars, from the Lininger Implement Co. of Omaha states that that city has become a very live motor car distributing center this season. The Lininger Implement Co. handle the Oakland car and the letter declares that they are placing the Oakland torpedos as rapidly as they arrive from the factory. The cars go largely to wholesale firms for use of their traveling salesmen.

In turning over its shops from the 1911 to the 1912 line of cars, the Packard Motor Car Company of Detroit made notable progress towards its goal of continuous production at an even rate. Thirty-five Packard cars were shipped from the factory the last two days in March when a clean-up was made for the season of 1911. Two weeks later the first of the dealers' demonstrators for 1912 were on their way to the Packard to purchasers of new cars will commence early establishment in Chicago. Regular shipments in May. All shipments follow a regular schedule conforming to dealers' allotments. These are made with a view to maintaining a uniform distribution of cars to all parts of the country.

One of the most important of recent sales of motor cars for use of traveling salesmen is that of four Hudsons to Rosenberg Sons Co., the wholesale dealers in dried fruit. The delivery of these cars was made by the Pioneer Automobile Co.

The Haynes Auto Sales Company made several deliveries last week to country purchasers Among the cars that went was one to J. A. Moffit and Son of Lemon Cove.

A Fine California Story

Here is a novel with a new and unexpected interest, the "eternal triangle" with the third corner held not by a rival man or woman but by a horse ardently desired by both hero and heroine, with such diametrically different motives that it almost disrupts the human romance. Hitherto Lucia Chamberlain has devoted herself to social interests and city life, and her "Coast of Chance" and "The Other Side of the Door," both novels of San Francisco, are amongst the best of their kind, but in "Son of the Wind" she has gone up into the high Sierras, where, it is evident to any one who knows the country even casually, her knowledge has not been culled second hand. It is a book amongst ten thousand, clean and wholesome, a love story that leaves one with neither the desire to consign it to the flames nor to stuff one's ears to avoid hearing intimate secrets not meant for others to know; an out-door book which does not patronize nature and an animal story which does not half-humanize and wholly belittle the horse. The characters, all out of the common, are still believable, and the atmosphere so true that one might almost expect to find Raders, with its dilapidated gate posts, its abandoned well spring, and its housewifely mistress, her head wrapped turbanwise and broom in hand, stepping out to the porch to interrogate the unexpected arrival. We have an ABC of California novelists, Atherton, Bonner and Chamberlain, and the least of the three, if there be a least, is not Lucia Chambelain. We are indebted to the Bobbs-Merrill Company for what richly deserves to be a best-seller in the best sense of the term.

The Annals of Ann"

How old was Ann? She herself asserts that she was at the "gawky age," but there are those who are born gawky and never get over it. Again she says she was young enough to love puppies and old enough to appreciate Washington Irving, though her knowledge of the author appears to have been confined to a single work, the "Alhambra." She keeps fresh flowers before her bust of Byron, but almost up to the last page she still enjoys licking Mammy Lou's cake spoon, but all the while she has keen eyes and ears for one subject, the love-making of her neighbors and relatives and now and then she dips her fingers into the match-making pies. Her observations and intuitions are so shrewd that one suspects her of being on the verge of a romance of her own to be revealed in every coming chapter, yet up to the last page nothing of the kind is even hinted at. "The Annals of Ann" is an amusing bit of light literature, readable by young or old if one happens to be in the humor for just this sort of thing. It will serve admirably to tide over a time of tedious waiting and keep one in good humor the while. The author, Kate Trimble Sharber, appears to have succeeded admirably in performing the task she set herself, and after all, success consists more in hitting the mark than in aiming at impossible heights. Illustrations are by Paul J. Meylan. From the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

For Southerners

Three small booklets recently issued by the Neale Company make their appeal to the Southern historical and patriotic associations. The first, "The Genealogy of Jefferson Davis," clears some obscurities in tracing the descent of the Confederate president. "For Truth and Freedom," a thin volume of fewer than seventy-five pages, is made up of the commemoratice poems written for the dedication of monuments, the meeting of Confederate veterans, the reunions of commands and other similar gatherings, by Armistead C. Gordon, Rector of the University of Virginia. The third, about one hundred pages, is also a collection of verse by Bishop Beverley Dandridge Tucker.

Book Notes

It is a pleasure to come upon Alice Wilson Fox's "Hearts and Coronets," the story of an English girl who, when we make her acquaintance, is about fourteen years of age. Older folks may read "Hearts and Coronets" with pleasure. It is issued by the Macmillan Company. It is not often that they publish young people's books and when they do it is safe to assume that here is something above the average.

Amy Brooks has brought her "Randy" series to a close and now the little sister Prue who flitted through their pages, is to become the motive of a new set. The children are healthy, normal little folks living in a New England village not far from Boston. They sew doll frocks, play at keeping store, go berrying and attend Sunday School and various frolics without making life a burden to their elders and setting a bad example to little readers. The events which fill their days are void of sensation save as they loom large in the eyes of the children, and their exploits and adventures are such as will interest little girls of ten or twelve and under. From Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

The Fallen Prophet

The man of unbridled tongue, the copious, inveterate talker who speaks an infinite deal of nothing, while he is always at odds with somebody will frequently be at odds with himself. For the man who talks much thinks little and is inclined to violent revulsion of sentiment. It is characteristic of this individual to be bigoted and intolerant even in his reversals of judgment. After taking all sides of a question he wonders how anybody can support any one of them. Who better illustrates this species of polemic than our former hero, the illustrious T. R.? Once more he has rushed into print with his gratuitous counsel. This time he enunciates a fundamental principle. He has come to what is true and he utters it with the ponderous gravity of a sage who has discovered something new. Speaking of the attitude of the labor leaders toward the dynamite suspects he says: "It is grossly improper to try to create a public opinion in favor of the arrested men"; also, "The one and only question is as to the guilt or innocence of the men accused"; also, "They are entitled to an absolutely fair trial." Platitudinous and timely. But unfortunately T. R.'s current counsel will hardly carry the same weight as did his admonitions in other days when he was on the other side of the question. It is distinctly remembered of course that as President of the United States T. R. deliberately ignored the principle which he now professes to cherish. In seeking to create public sentiment in favor of men accused of crime the labor leaders are following distinguished example. They are following the example set by T. R. when he was striving to create sentiment against Moyer and Heywood, and also when he was responding to the requests of Older and Spreckels for letters and telegrams designed to prejudice prospective jurors in this city against the higher-ups.

Publicity Not For the Elect

In the philosophy of contemporary politics nothing can be more conducive to the health of the nation than publicity. Secrecy whether in politics or in business is regarded as the soul of evil designs. Hence the rule that our public servants must be permitted to pry into our affairs to see that no prestidigitateur in the domain of commerce has anything up his sleeve, so to speak. The books of a corporation, whether it be engaged in selling transportation or dealing in junk, must be open and accessible to certain gentlemen vested with brief authority. Politicians themselves are expected to govern their lives and their thoughts after the manner of Cato so that all the world may see the one and read the other. There must be no secrecy about campaign contributions. Everything must be open and above board. Big business especially must have the lid taken off. But what big business is of such vital interest to the people as the big business of the State? This question we are constrained to ask because from reading the veracious dailies we have received the impression that a haze of mystery hovers over the official acts of our upright and esteemed harbor commissioners. Perhaps this impression should not be. Mystery is another name for ignorance. If the reporters were omniscient all would be perfectly plain. But in default of omniscience among the argus-eyed might it not be well for the Hon. J. J. Dwyer to forego the privilege which he arrogated to himself when he curtly announced that he was not to be cross-examined by Commissioner Hale as to why he rejected the highest bid for the lease of the flower stand? If publicity is good for big private interests, why not for big public interests? Mr. Dwyer is usually one of the most transparent of men. With a cheek "apter than the tongue to tell an errand"; a face true whatsoever his hands are; an eye legible as a book; his whole countenance the title page to a dandy volume, yet there are times when he lapses into umbrage and excites curiosity. This is the same Dwyer who received a fee from Rudolph Spreckels for patriotizing professionally; but for what particular service he was paid there has never been the kind of explanation that would satisfy the querulous and unsympathetic. That he rendered good and sufficient service none but the unregenerate would ever doubt, for he shared at once and in advance of all other regenerators the confidence of District Attorney Langdon and the lamented Elisor Biggy. He had greater opportunities than anybody for advancing the public interest, and that he was not adequately compensated is to be inferred from the circumstance that Governor Johnson put him on the pay-roll of the State where he is again vindicating his patriotism with such disinterested zeal that were it not for the rampant passion for publicity we should not hazard the impertinent suggestion that cross-examination is in line with public policy.

The Railroads

Partly in response to the demand for publicity, and partly to avail himself of the advantage of publicity, John J. Byrne, the assistant passenger traffic manager of the Santa Fe railway system, has issued a few tables of figures that may be studied to good effect by lovers of the square deal. Clearly it is Mr. Byrne's purpose to appeal to the judgment of such fair-minded people as may be influenced by the generalizations of the populistic statesmen who are cultivating public approval by their hostility to the railroads. These agitators have succeeded in creating the impression that the railroads are imposing unjust burdens on the people, that they consist largely of watered stock and are fattening off enormously outrageous profits. From Mr. Byrne's figures we learn that the Santa Fe is capitalized at $53,000 per mile of line, while in England the average capital is $274,000 per mile; in Germany, $111,000 per mile; in France, $140,000 per mile; in Canada, $69,500 per mile; in the United States, $58,000 per mile. In the recent construction of the Belen cut-off in New Mexico an account was kept of the cost of construction, and it averaged $40,845 per mile without any charge for right of way for terminal stations or for equipment. And this construction was over ground presenting no extraordinary or unusual obstacles. During the year ending June 30, 1910, the gross earnings of the Santa Fe were $107,543,250, and out of that vast amount after paying five per cent on preferred stock, six per cent on common and four per cent on bonds, it had a surplus of only $365,846. Its operating expenses amounted to $71,082,238. Assuredly it wouldn't require much of a cut in freight rates to wipe out the surplus. It is instructive to note that out of every dollar paid out by the Santa Fe in 1910 forty-two cents went for labor, ten cents for material such as rails and nine cents for fuel while only five cents went to the investor. Perhaps there are many merchants and farmers who wouldn't care much if railroad investors didn't get a cent, but if so they are shortsighted individuals. The prosperity of this country depends in no small measure on the prosperity of the railroads. Henry Harrison Lewison in an article entitled "What Is the Matter With Business" which appeared in American Industries last December, called attention to the significant fact that the industries then depressed were those directly or indirectly connected with railroad construction or maintenance. And of course when those varied industries are depressed it means that there is depression in the labor market. Mr. Lewis said: "A reasonable advance in freight rates and a letup in railroad prosecution on the part of national and State legislatures will do more to help prosperity than any other thing."

The Slow Senate

That distinguished propagandist of progressive politics, Mr. John Temple Graves, complains that the Senate is not so energetic and speedy as the House of Representatives. He would have the Senators transact their business with greater promptness and despatch. He points with much satisfaction to the alertness of the Representatives and to their quick achievements. That which excites the approval of Mr. Hearst's former candidate for Vice-President makes it easy for us to understand why he is in favor of electing Senators by direct vote and making them sensitive to popular whim. It is evident that Mr. Graves does not appreciate the principle on which the legislative department of this government is constituted. He may be aware of that principle, but if so, in his superior wisdom he contemns the apprehensions of the builders of the Constitution. Those old fogies believed in the virtue of deliberation. In the literature of constitutional history we find that in the philosophy of the Founders rapidity didn't mean progress. Some of them probably had in mind the words of Shakespeare: "Wisely and slow—they stumble that run fast." Doubtless some of them had read the old fable of the tortoise and the hare. Some of them, perhaps, were influenced by the proverb, "The longest way round is the shortest way home." At any rate they never intended that the Senate should be as fast as the House of Representatives. They supposed that the Representatives, by reason of the manner and mode of their selection, would be precisely what they are—record-breakers, alert statesmen eager to vindicate their responsiveness to public sentiment. And indulging this supposition they felt that in taking care of the majority of the moment they should take care also of the government for all time. So they sought to establish a legislative chamber a few degrees removed from public clamor, one that might be partial to the minority, but that nevertheless would be powerless to do great evil. And even of that body they were apprehensive. They considered the probability of its acting with too much haste in a time of national excitement on some treaty with a foreign nation, and though they gave it exclusive jurisdiction in the matter of treaties they provided that for the ratification of a treaty a two-thirds' vote should be required. The sentiments of those timid Founders are nowhere so well expressed as in Story's work on the Constitution. He says: "There are particular moments in public affairs, when the people, stimulated by some irregular passion, or some illict advantage, or misled by the artful misrepresentations of interested men, may call for measures which they themselves will afterwards be the most ready to lament and condemn. In these critical moments, how salutary will be the interference of a body of respectable citizens chosen without reference to the exciting cause, to check the misguided career of public opinion and to suspend the blow, until reason, justice and truth can regain their authority over the public mind." So we see the Senate is really expected to go slow. But it is going too slow to please the Progressives. They look forward to the time when we shall get quicker action from that august body. Let us hope that by that time wars and rumors of wars shall indeed have ceased.

The Evils of Education

A millionaire by the name of Crane has set many schoolmasters and a few editors by the ears. He is going about as a propagandist against the evils of higher education. His critics call him a fanatic. And a shrewd journalist, to indicate the absurdity of Crane's philosophy, gravely tell us that according to the millionaire's reasoning Plato, Socrates and Aristotle were "the most designing and desperate criminals of history." This is hardly the logical conclusion to be drawn from the plutocratic agitator's utterances. The ancient philosophers did not hold the same views regarding education that are held today. The purpose of education according to their views was to teach men how to think and how to behave, to discipline the mind and the heart; in short, to make men capable of worthy actions. What is the purpose of education today? It is to enable men to achieve success in the business world. By education in ancient Greece men were refined; by education today men are brutalized and vulgarized. Furthermore education in ancient times was not for the many but for the few; it was reserved for those who had the capacity to make use of it. Today it is given to everybody without discrimination; and education without capacity is a crime. Now Millionaire Crane is not singular in his views about education. He is echoing the sentiments of educated men; of a Hazlitt, for example, who said it was better to be able neither to read nor to write than to be able to do nothing else. In this age of education-while-you-wait, in which learning, even in the faculties of our universities, is often a substitute for common sense, how innumerable are the college graduates who suffer from the misfortune of having acquired the knack of reading and writing! Hazlitt though a college man had no extravagant notion of the value of learning. "If we wish to know the force of human genius," he said, "we should read Shakespeare; if we wish to see the insignificance of human learning we may study his commentators." And Hazlitt himself was one of them. A much more profound thinker than Hazlitt may be quoted in support of the views of Millionaire Crane. No less a scholar than Herbert Spencer was of the opinion that education artificially pressed forward was extremely dangerous to society. "Mischief results," he says in one of his latter-day essays, "when intellectualization goes in advance of moralization." He argued that society was not to be benefited by artificially increasing intelligence without regard to character. "To measure the influence for good or evil which a forced intellectual culture produces on a nation," says Spencer, "there is no better way than to contemplate the teachings of the daily press and to observe the effects wrought." Yet Spencer did not live to see the British press emulate faintly American journalism of the twentieth century. No prescience had he of the effects that are now to be observed; yet he declared that education was conducive to the spread of anarchism. He argued that education intensifies the emotional life, and as in average human beings the lower emotions are more powerful than the higher, education adding to the force of all emotions increases the relative predominance of the lower. It will be said that Spencer was in favor of keeping the poor in ignorance. He was not. He was in favor of letting enlightenment spread normally in accordance with the laws of supply and demand, holding that even the poor who had bequeathed the right stuff to their children would see that their children were not reared in ignorance, and that as a result there would be a multiplication of the fittest instead of a multiplication of the unfittest. Millionaire Crane tells us that education makes criminals. Herbert Spencer was of the same opinion; that is, he was of the opinion that criminals are made by artificially increasing intelligence among all the people and without regard to character. And he said that as social security is thought to be so supreme an end that to achieve it citizens are made to go to war and risk death; as there is absolute subordination of the individual to society, then why should it be unjust to leave the citizen without public aid in educating his children? These sentiments though uttered only a little more than a decade ago by one of the greatest philosophers of his age, are in this day and generation decidedly heterodox. Yet is it not as a result of the spread of that most dangerous of all things, "a little learning," that we are now distracted by political and economic agitations fomented by superficial statesmen and university pedants? The most dangerous members of society are to be found in the faculties of our universities—professors incapable of receiving any more than a little learning who discourse on sociology as though it were one of the exact sciences and disseminate pernicious doctrine among persons as much inclined as themselves to be arrogant, dogmatic and incendiary.

The Cry of the Lover

(From the German of Heine by Bayard Taylor)

Thou hast diamonds and pearls and jewels,
  Hast all the heart wishes in store;
And, ah! thou hast eyes so lovely—
  My darling, what wouldst thou have more?

And upon thine eyes so lovely,
  That pierce my heart to its core,
Uncounted songs have I written—
  My darling, what wouldst thou have more?

Alas, with thine eyes so lovely,
  Thou hast tortured and wounded me sore;
Thine eyes have compassed my ruin—
  My darling, what wouldst thou have more?

And, because of thine eyes so tender,
  Have I ventured more and more,
And so much, ah, so much have I suffered—
  My darling, what wouldst thou have more?

Perspective Impressions

Trying to make our politics better than ourselves we appear to be making a bad job of it.

The Mexican revolution will probably be known in history as the arbitrament of the manifesto.

Rev. Bradford Leavitt told the Unitarians of Fresno that the Bible was responsible for republican government. Which proves conclusively, no doubt, that the Greeks knew the Bible.

Queen Alexandra will not attend the coronation. The divinity that hedges royalty does not prevent a dowager queen from feeling vulgar feminine jealousy.

Between Bram Stoker who says she was a man and Dr. Owen who insists she had two sons and two daughters the Virgin Queen seems destined to acquire the new distinction of sexual versatility.

How is it that none of the critics said of Bernhardt, "Age cannot wither her nor custom stale her infinite variety"? Did they deliberately refrain or did they forget?

"The most itinerant Governor that we remember," says the New York Sun, "was Joe Folk." Governor Woodrow Wilson bids fair to catch up before the end of his term.

President Jordan of Stanford told an interviewer that once in an obscure town of Japan a native boy pinched his arm and ran away exclaiming, "He's real! He's real!" But one may be real without being genuine.

The Alaskan mob that dumped three hundred tons of Canadian coal into the sea in emulation of the Boston tea party would probably have preferred to handle a hundred odd pounds of pinchot.

Lord Decies has justified his existence. For his child wife's trouble he has invented the phrase "appendicular disturbances."

It has been discovered that Bacon wrote Paradise Lost, the Rubaiyat and Don Quixote as well as the Shakespearean plays. In time one may learn that the only thing he didn't write is the Novum Organum Says Lincoln Steffens: "The people in the East are watching Governor Hiram Johnson very closely." And doubtless so good a man will bear watching—what?

"Coming down to the days when Rome sat enthroned on her seven hills, we find that Socrates was both bald and whiskered," says Professor William Dallam Armes. And yet, in our ignorance, we always thought Socrates was a Greek

Correspondence

Another Macaronic

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Here's a macaronic which I saw in a high school paper printed in Needham, Mass., about ten years ago. It is more varied in its use of language than any verse I have ever seen.

—A Reader.

Ich Bin Dein

In tempus old a hero lived
Qui loved puellas deux;
He ne pouvait pas quite to say
Which one amabat mieux.

Dit-il lui-meme un beau matin,
"Non possum both avoir,
Sed si address Amanda Ann,
Then Kate and I have war.

"Amanda habet argent coin,
Sed Kate has aureas curls,
Et both sunt very agathae
Et quite formosa girls."

Enfin the youthful anthropos
Philoun the duo maids,
Resolved proponere to Kate
Devant cet evening shades.

Procedens then to Kate's domo,
Il trouve Amanda there,
Kai quite forgot his late resolves,
Both sunt so goodly fair.

Sed, smiling on the new tapis,
Between puellas twain,
Coepit to tell his love to Kate,
Dans un poetique strain.

Mais, glancing ever et anon
At fair Amanda's eyes,
Illae non possunt dicere
Pro which he meant his sighs.

Each virgo heard the demi-vow
With cheeks as rouge as wine,
And offering each a milk-white hand,
Both whispered, "Ich bin dein."

A Poet's Buttons

Dear Editor: I note in the last "Town Talk" your doubt of Mr. Miller's having owned that coat with the Golden Buttons. You err. I've seen it—a beautiful thing made, as were the trousers, of deer-skin. The buttons, eight or ten in number, were nuggets given him by admirers in Dawson. Each contained about (at a guess) $40 in gold. They were clasped by thin bands of copper, through which ran a scarlet ribbon. Mr. Miller gave them away, one by one, to fair women (that great poet is magnanimous enough to declare that they are all fair). The last of the lot is now in my hands, its unworthy recipient having sold it to me for $50—less than I'd care to part with it for now. But the gifts of the great pass from hand to hand.

Sincerely yours,

—George Sterling.

A Criticism of Our Critics

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: What an emotional lot your San Francisco dramatic critics are! Coming from New York where all of us are so sophisticated and where the dramatic critics are particularly blase and uninterested, I cannot but note the juvenile sensibility of your theatrical reporters. They weep like convent girls in their salad days. At least, so I infer from their articles. I have followed them rather carefully during this Bernhardt engagement, being naturally curious to see what they would say of Sarah. In New York, you know, we are not too rapturous in our applause of this aging woman. But here, how different! She can still work miracles, for I suppose it is a miracle for her, Moses-like, to strike the rocky heart of a critic and make it gush. Thus one of your critics, speaking of "Madame X," says: "If there was a dry eye in the audience I failed to see it. Indeed, I did not see anything very clearly, for reasons which do not concern you." Another one saw "Jeanne d'Arc" through "a mist of tears." He says it "left my soul too shriveled and palsied for calm utterance.' God bless his soul, how susceptible he is! No wonder "Madame X" left him "limp and trembling" and that as "Camille" came to a close he was "almost stunned." Now let us hear how a third critic was affected at "Madame X:" "I, hardened as I am to such scenes, felt my barometer dropping dangerously near the indications for a downpour." In other words, he didn't cry but came perilously near it In "Camille," however, the impulse was too strong to be overcome. The performance, says this critic, brought "quick tears to film a thousand eyes unused to respond to theatrical emotion or stage tricks." Very naively he admits, "I was too deeply affected to analyze." Your poor tender-hearted critics! What a damp week they had of it. How many handkerchiefs they must have saturated! I do hope they recovered from their emotions before they returned to their offices, otherwise they must have rusted their typewriters. You see, I cannot take this emotionalism seriously. I have lived too long near Forty-second and Broadway.

Sincerely yours,

Saturday, May 6. —Manhattan.

Idiotic Interrogations

Is it cruel to beat a retreat?
Can you blow the horn of plenty?
Who takes care of the road to ruin?
Is the spur of the moment very sharp?
Will the skeleton-key open a deadlock?
Can you register a vow at the post office?

XXI—ARTHUR F. MATHEWS

By Edward F. O'Day

"Your views on California art?"

"I have none."

It was very discouraging. Here was a California artist, one of the best, and he had no views on California art. I studied him with increased curiosity. Suppose an actor should confess that he had no views concerning the tendency of the drama. Suppose a newspaperman should admit that he had no views concerning the running of a newspaper. That actor, that newspaperman would be in a class by himself. And so with the California artist who has no views on Caliofrnia art. He is unique.

That his name should be Arthur F. Mathews makes the matter all the more surprising. Not that it isn't a good name, despite the owner's deprecation. ("It doesn't look well in print," he says; "it isn't foreign enough.") But the name of Arthur F. Mathews stands for fifteen years of teaching at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art, and a man who has taught for fifteen years in a California art school ought to have views on California art.

And he has. It is only that he is shy about expressing them. I am not sure that 'shy' is the word. He looks shy. He is undeniably sensitive. But it seems to me that his backwardness, his diffidence is purely a matter of verbal expression. He talks in a low tone that is sometimes hard to hear, like the unaccomodated tone of a deaf man. His words come slowly. They are evidently well considered. He thinks as he talks and sometimes stops talking to think, so that at times you think he has finished when he has merely paused. But when you have listened to him a while you realize that here is a man with decided views, a thinker who expresses his thoughts simply, letting them accent themselves.

Looking at him I could not believe that he lacked views on California art. There was plenty of room for them in that remarkable dome of his. One could easily imagine that his high broad brow bulged with them. 'Tis a head to delight the caricaturist, overlarge for the rather frail body, a triangular head with big eyes looking unimpassionately through big lenses, a short undistinguished nose and an extremely sensitive mouth beneath a thick mustache, the triangle being roughly pointed by an almost equally sensitive chin. Truly the sort of head one would suppose to be crammed full of all sorts of ideas. And so it proved.

California art being inseparably connected with the Art Institute, I asked him about the Institute. In my ignorance of things artistic I supposed that he was still connected with it. But he hasn't been there since the fire.

"Who succeeded you?" I asked.

"I haven't the slightest idea," he replied. "I take so little interest in the Art Institute that I know absolutely nothing about it."

Almost I gasped. Here was frankness with a vengeance. For fifteen years a teacher at the Art Institute; during eleven of those years its director. And he doesn't know who his successor is! Verily, your artist must live a detached life. Or else—

"I resigned after the fire," he explained. "At first they thought I was playing a bluff but they found they were wrong about it. I told them that I didn't propose any longer to travel in a circle. In my time at the Institute I traveled the same circle three times and at the end I found we were back to a very rotten system."

Yes, he said 'rotten,' but he said it so gently that it didn't sound nearly as crude as it must look. And he proceeded to elucidate.

"The whole American educational system is run in the same way. Technical institutions are run on the same principles as the public schools. Discipline is everything. The pupils must be quiet, they must be attentive, they must remember that somebody is hanging over them and watching them.

"But really, there is nothing in this system. In a technical school each pupil should follow his individuality. You've got to break him of bad tricks of course; but every professional man should be allowed to modify rules to suit himself."

Sounds as though he might be criticising

ARTHUR F. MATHEWS

Stanford, doesn't it? But he was speaking of our Art Institute where, many think, the artistic temperament runs riot. But it hasn't enough swing to suit this quiet-appearing man. That is one reason why he quit.

"I'll never teach again," he says; "I'm absolutely through with teaching. One has to fight too many outside influences. Only one pupil in a hundred has a liberal viewpoint. They all think they must go abroad to finish their studies. As soon as they get that notion they stop working and wait for the opportunity to go abroad. The European schools are no better than the American schools but our pupils must go to Europe. Nine out of ten come back with some half-learned tricks picked up from a second or third rate artist who happens to be the vogue. They take the pose that they are bringing us something. They oppose the man who was responsible for their training and use the name of some foreign teacher as an advertisement.

"So what's the use of giving up two days a week to such pupils? You are only laying the foundation for opposition to your own school. You're not building up California art. You're simply defeating yourself all the time. That's why I abandoned teaching."

Here then were some views on California art. They were offered slowly, calmly, but the personal element was unmistakable. Mathews would be very piquant if he would only name names. Discreet as he is in this respect, he is still exceedingly entertaining. Especially when he gets into full career with his views on California art, the views he discouraged me by pretending that he did not possess.

"The time has got to come," he said, "when we shall get over our so-called cosmopolitanism and be ourselves. We are not cosmopolitan; we are merely provincial. And artistically we are in the position of France during the third medieval period."

I displayed my provincialism by looking very blank.

"In that period," he unriddled, "the people never used their native genius, but hired Italians. The so-called Renaissance was the destruction of the expression of the French people in art. They have never had any since. Later on they got the Academy, but the Academy stands for fake classicism. Our Art Institute, in '89 when I went there to teach, imitated the Academy system."

Which, I take it, is a most artistic knock at the Art Institute. Particularly if taken in connection with Mathews' earlier remark that the Institute has been traveling in a circle. It seems to insinuate that fake classicism holds sway at the school on Nob Hill.

"The Institute," he went on, "was run at that time according to the ideas of what an average American thought such a school ought to be. I simply smothered the whole thing. It took me three years to do it but I did it. I was not a teacher. I was merely a visitor, a critic. I went to the school twice a week. Frequently I learned more from the pupils than they learned from me. We had a larger number of promising men and women at that time than at any other time in the history of the Institute. There were Piazzoni, Martinez, Raphael, Isabel Hunter, Aiken and Lucia K. Mathews. It was the most vital Institute period I know of. The only period like it was in Emil Carlsen's time when Mary Brady, Evelyn McCormick, Guy Rose and Peixotto were trained.

"But it's rather useless to run an art school here. Why develop native talent if one must go somewhere else to get recognition? I had the right idea when I was fourteen years old. I wouldn't go to an art school here. I went to Paris."

"Yes," he said in answer to a question, "native sons have hard work getting recognition here. They usually have to get it abroad first. But if the public sees fit to starve a group of painters, it's the public's business."

"Does the local public do that?" I asked.

"Did San Francisco ever do anything else?" he countered. "Why if I had to depend on this city to buy my pictures—."

He did not finish, but I gathered an impression which is probably entertained also by Colonel Trumbo.

"You see," he resumed, "we have no criticism here based on a rational foundation. We have

Progress in Turkey

The Turks throughout the world recently celebrated the second anniversary of the elevation of Mohammed V. to the sultanate of the Ottoman Empire. Two twelvemonths have passed since the gates of the Yildiz Kiosk were battered down and Abdul Hamid was carried off to the seclusion of Salonica. They have been two years of accomplishment. The rich are no longer virtually prisoners of the Sultan; the midle classes may travel throughout the empire without let or hindrance and may meet socially without fear of persecution; country people and villagers now pay their tax but once a year, and not, as formerly, several times under pressure of imprisonment and the bastinado. The navy, by the addition of new ships and the training of seamen by efficient foreign officers, has become strong enough to cope with the fleets of the smaller neighboring States; the army, reorganized, is well fed and clothed and is a force to be reckoned with in the armed camps of Europe. The great problem of government by constitution has not yet been solved, but there are good reasons for hopefulness. The Young Turks have proved their honesty of purpose.

Works, "A Freshman Senator"

This is the disrespectful appellation which the New York Sun applies to Senator John D. Works. The Sun was not impressed with Works' maiden speech in which he advocated the initiative, the referendum and the recall. "In these happier times," says the Sun, "it may soon become the custom of the Senate that the older members shall hold their peace altogether while wisdom speaks out of the mouths of babes and sucklings." "The latest popular toys" the Sun calls the three engines of uplift for which Senator Works pleaded and goes on to state that if the statesmen of the Senate think that there are votes in them they will give them to the people on the principle of "anything to amuse the children."

From Fresno's Ivory Tower

Sitting in his ivory tower in the raisin-scented metropolis of the lower San Joaquin Chester H. Rowell settles the servant problem. With a few swift dashes of his learned pen the editor of the Fresno Republican disposes of a question that is vexing millions in all parts of the world and passes on to more congenial subjects. 'Tis thus that our genial contemporary applies German transcendentalism to a question that ought really to belong to pragmatic philosophy: "It would be a blessing for humanity if housekeeping as a menial task of petty detail could be definitely done away with. If every family had no work except what they were willing to perform for themselves if the occasion required, and were willing to pay definite wages for when perforce it was done by others, there would cease to be such a thing as flunkeyism except among those who are flunkeys by nature. There would be no houses kept except by those who were willing to undertake the burdens of caring for them, and exemptions from life's daily tasks would be accorded only to those ill or decrepit, or those whose time could be made more economically valuable by devoting it to some other occupation, leaving housekeeping to those unskilled in different employments." What a message of cheer this must be to the housewife who haunts the employment agencies!

An English View of Italy

The Italian jubilee now being celebrated arouses melancholy thoughts in the Saturday Review of London, a Tory journal which usually confines its faultfinding to republican institutions and lends its moral support to kingdoms. "The existing condition of Rome and the position of the Pope," says this exceedingly conservative organ, "are standing reproaches to Italian statesmen and a trouble to the conscience of Europe. Fairminded people cannot help asking themselves whether it is compatible with the dignity of a great nation, or of one that claims the title, and that has the privilege of harboring in its capital the spiritual head of so large a part of Christendom, to allow a deliberate policy of menace and insult to be pursued against him by municipal officials if not by the direct agents of the Government." The Review enumerates items of this policy; it comments on "the partial futility of the present position of Italian royalty;" it calls attention to the "grotesque insistence upon the virtues of the first monarch of United Italy." "The ultimate object," it points out, "is not to commemorate the 'Honest King,' but to insult the Pope." And again: "Freedom from external aggression and a sympathetic attitude on the part of the great mass of mankind have given every chance to the new regime, but the result in these respects after fifty years is only too palpably not what the least exacting sympathiser had a right to expect . . . Every excuse being made, therefore, modern Italy is a grave disappointment to her friends, who include all that care for art, history, or literature. She has invited the world to rejoice with her after fifty years of self-government, and to celebrate her achievements. After due consideration, we are bound to confess that the joy of mankind to be sincere must be moderate." This is certainly not the view of modern Italy industriously flashed to foreign eyes by the Methodists and Waldensians of Rome and Florence.

The Troubles of Santa Cruz

The roar of the combers on the bar at Santa Cruz is drowned in the noise of horrendous disturbances. Santa Cruz has a labor war on its hands—or at least Fred Swanton has. Because they pretend to find that Swanton's beach musicians play out of tune with the sweet harmonies of unionism the State Federation of Labor has placed its ban on the entrancing summer resort and has supplicated all good organized workingmen to ignore it in their plans for the coming vacation. But at last accounts Swanton was going right ahead with the plans for opening his big new beach hotel just as though he had not been anathematized. To add to the uproar in Santa Cruz one of the unsuccessful candidates for mayor in the recent election has sued an unfriendly editor for libel. From the Watsonville Register the editor of which is far enough away from the seat of war to hazard a jest on the subject, I extract this perplexed and perplexing comment: "As the matter stands no one knows if it is libel for a paper to say at an alleged meeting, an alleged person with an alleged jag, said he saw the alleged portrait of an alleged colonel appearing in an alleged patent medicine advertisement in an alleged newspaper in the alleged town of Milpitas, said advertisement alleging the alleged colonel had been cured of an alleged complaint by the alleged use of Peruna, or not."

Politics and a Play

"Apres Moi le Deluge," M. Henri Bernstein remarked with bitter wit when his play was withdrawn from the boards of the Comedie Francaise after the demonstrations that accompanied the first performance. And now Paris is being deluged with charges that mix drama and politics so bewilderingly that it is hard for an outsider to understand them. It is being said that the anti-Semites cooperated with the Royalists in the riots and that the withdrawal of the play was a triumph for the sentimentalists—outsiders can only regard them as such—who sport in their button-holes the white carnation, symbol of allegiance to Phillippe, Duke of Orleans, "the effete Bourbon exile." The publication of the late Waldeck-Rousseau's private papers has fanned the flame of republican and royalist hostility and Paris is enjoying the delicious shudders that accompany the thought of a possible coup d'etat. How American press agents must envy M. Bernstein!

What the Spirits Said

By Noelle Roger (From the French)

They had reached the desert, the luncheon having been as mournful as usual, in the narrow little dining-room. Mechanically Dr. Clamessan pushed the piece of Gruyere cheese across the table to his wife. She shook her head with a gesture of indifference and weariness that he had noted many times in past years. Then he folded his napkin and laid it down on the table, while the maid of all work stumbled in and carried away the dishes. Then Mme. Clamessan spoke.

"We have no more coal," she said. "I will write for some. Can you pay for it on delivery?"

The doctor answered hesitatingly. He was looking over some papers that he had taken from his pocket. Then he rose to go out.

"It is so beautiful outdoors today!" exclaimed the little blonde girl who had been looking out of the window, very silent hitherto. She flattened her nose against the pane without daring to open it. All she could see was a square of deep blue sky above, and below, in the court-yard, a shrub that was just beginning to bud.

Then Claire turned and said: "Oh! grandfather, if I only could—how happy I would be to go with you this afternoon." She stopped, knowing how impossible was her wish, and then she added in a pleading tone: "It is so long since we have had a walk together, grandpapa. It would do you good. I know we can see some lilacs in bloom."

He looked at her thoughtfully, and it seemed to him that he saw in this child the image of her dead mother, his daughter, who had grown up under his roof and whom he had scarcely ever noticed, but who had the tender, loving heart character of her mother.

"Please, grandpapa," pleaded the little girl.

"But, Claire," said her grandmother, "what are you asking for? A whole afternoon lost! And your grandfather is so anxious never to lose an afternoon at his work. You can go out with the servant a few minutes, if you wish to, when she has finished washing the dishes." Then, after a moment's silence, Mme. Clamessan turned to her husband and said: "I have heard that the Bretels gave a dinner last week. They failed to invite us, the same as the others do. They were the last friends we had—nobody ever invites us any more."

The doctor looked up. "It is our own fault," he said. "We never go anywhere, we never see anybody. We haven't paid a visit for ten years. Do you regret your decision?"

She turned away, wearied.

"I? Oh, no. One must choose, as you have often said, between work and friends, if one wants to do something in this world; and we have made our choice."

"I am just on the point of making a remarkable discovery," he said. "Soon, I think—"

"Ah!" she replied.

He looked at her, astonished that she seemed to take so little interest in his work. As he looked it seemed to him that he had not seen her for a long time. He saw her pale, dull, indifferent, as if she were about to vanish altogether out of his life. " How old she is getting," he thought, rather astonished that he hadn't seen it before. "But then, I am so little at home, I have no time, I have no time."

Then Claire came up to him and took hold of his coat. "Grandpapa, we have so few days when the sun shines. Let me at least go to your office with you."

The old man smiled. "Well, yes, if you wish it."

Too soon, according to Claire's idea, they reached the sombre portals of the Institute of Anatomy. Slowly they climbed four flights of stairs, and then the doctor stopped before a door, unlocked it and said to the child in hurried tone: "Good-bye, little one, good-bye."

"And are you sending me home already?" she cried. "Oh, grandpapa, let me go in just for a minute. I won't bother you a bit."

She trotted after him through the immense room, every side of which was filled with shelves, upon every one of which were scores and scores of human skulls.

"It smells awfully stuffy in here," exclaimed Claire. "Let me open the window."

She opened one of the windows and looked out. On the other side of the street were some small houses buried in foliage. "Oh, grandpapa, there are flowers down there," she exclaimed, "lilacs and yellow sunflowers, and oh! some peonies, and I see a gentleman and a lady watering them."

"They have nothing better to do," growled the doctor.

"You prefer your old skulls," she said, gaining courage now that she was away from the heavy atmosphere of home. "Ah, but you have skulls —and such a lot of them! You must have received some new ones, grandpapa?"

"Yes, I have just received a new lot from the hospital. A splendid collection." There was a note in his voice that Claire understood.

"Well, good-bye, grandpapa," she said. "I know I am bothering you."

"Good-bye, little one," he said.

Now there was silence in the great room—a silence broken only by the scratching of the doctor's pen. The hours slipped by unnoticed. The doctor had lost all sense of hearing; he seemed to be lost in some other world. The skulls all about him on the shelves seemed to deepen the silence. The more ancient were of the color of old mahogany; some were spotted with green and dark brown; many were broken and the sutures gaped widely. Some, lacking the lower jaw, seemed to grin horribly. Some of the newer ones, cleaned by a modern process, shone like new toys. Some had the soft tones of pale ivory, with jaws holding full sets of pearl-like teeth. These laughed, too, some cynically, some bitterly, some broadly. The laughter never subsided, it was always there; grotesque, sometimes atrocious. The shadows in the empty orbits seemed to form eyes which gazed fixedly at the man bent over his desk, writing, as silently as they were.

"Ah," thought the doctor to himself, as the shadows of evening crept into the room, "it may be a bad half hour for me, when upon the day of the last judgment all these people come to claim their heads."

But his new discovery absorbed him, body and soul. He began to see whither it would lead; he saw that all philosophies would be overturned, theologians would tear their hair in impotent rage. He had discovered the origin of man; no denial was possible, and he felt the intoxication of victory.

"This is a moment worth living for," he exclaimed as he arose and paced back and forth.

Thicker and thicker, closer and closer, the shadows had crept into the room. It was entirely dark now, but he felt his way back to his chair and sat down. A strange lassitude overcame him. He noted, however, how very dark it was, and then suddenly he heard the door open.

"Who is there?" called the doctor.

Only silence, but he could feel that there was someone there; noiselessly, someone had entered the room.

"Who is there?" he called out again in a severe tone, thinking that some medical student was trying to play a trick on him, but there was no answer. He tried to get up and push the electric button, but some strange weight seemed to hold him down. He fumbled about his desk and then in his pockets, seeking a match, and when he could find none, called out again, this time very angrily: "Enough of this! Who is there? Answer at once!"

Only silence. Then the door opened and closed again and then again. Many persons seemed to be coming into the room and clustering about him. The doctor felt some terrible event was happening. His forehead was covered with a cold perspiration and he trembled in every limb. He had been unable to find a match and now he felt that he would not dare make a light.

Then he heard a voice, very close to him—such a weak and tremulous voice as he had never before heard in his whole life. It said: "Doctor—doctor, we are come—we are come." And then another voice, even more pleading, more tremulous, if possible, repeated: "We are come." Then many quavering voices took up the same refrain.

The doctor trembled, for he remembered his joke: "On the day of the last judgment, I will pass a bad half hour, when they come to ask for their skulls." And now it seemed to him that this half hour had come.

The voices began again, incessantly: "Doctor, give us back—give us back—"

He sat upright in his chair and called out sternly: "They are all there, all of them. Take them." Then the thought of his great discovery encouraged him, and he added: "They have been of service to me, of service to Science. The work is finished—you can take them, take them all!"

There was a deep silence for a while and finally the doctor heard a sad voice say: "We will await your pleasure, doctor. You, the great scientist, will surely know how to pick them out—"

At this statement the doctor felt a cold chill run through him from head to foot. "That depends," he stammered. "I have them here from all parts of the world."

"We will help you," said a voice, a little firmer and more distinct that the others. "I was born in a little village in Brazil. My father became an enormously wealthy man. All that wealth can give, I had. You can surely easily recognize my skull, the skull of a man of importance."

At such ignorance the doctor almost burst out laughing. "No," said he, "your bones do not differ from those of the poorest beggar. I cannot give you any satisfaction. Help yourself; you will find the Brazilian skulls on the right, down there, third shelf."

Then the doctor heard another voice. "When I was young, I killed an enemy. What men call justice compelled me to pass all my life shut up in a dungeon. Rather would I have had the justice of God! The judges said I was a degenerate.

The Spectator

Another Municipal Scandal

Once more San Francisco has a graft investigation on hand, a very fragrant one, too. The present scandal is the result of an experiment in sanitary regulation of the "oldest profession on earth." This experiment had the sanction and approval of some very distinguished clergymen who take a deep interest in sublunary as well as spiritual affairs. Had they been more worldly wise they would not have rushed in with enthusiasm to pluck roses from briars; nor had an upheaval of nature occurred could they have been thrown into greater panic fright than that which seized them when they learned that the finger of suspicion was pointing at their beneficent enterprise. They behaved rather like ordinary, unanointed mortals not immune from the taint of scandal than like gentlemen of the cloth, public confidence in whom cannot be shaken.

The Identifying of Leffingwell

This brand new municipal scandal involves two men who have very intimate relations with Mayor McCarthy, and it is therefore embarrassing to him; especially so as he is about to plunge into his campaign for re-election. Naturally it is all very grateful to his enemies, and they are pushing the investigation with great zeal; so much so that they appear to be concerned more about the immediate political effect than about the consequences to the persons to whom crime is imputed. Now it is important to the people that if crimes have been committed the guilty persons should be punished, even though they be public officials. We have had enough of bungling in such matters in the past. It would be a good thing to send an official grafter to jail once in a while. But from the methods that are being pursued there seems to be little chance of accomplishing anything. We are told that Elmore Leffingwell, the Mayor's secretary, has been identified as a man who had certain dealings with Thelma Leroy. Now when there is a question of identity to be settled there is a proper way of settling it. That was not the way pursued in this instance. If Thelma Leroy had been required to pick Leffingwell out of a group of men, and had picked him out, her testimony notwithstanding her reputation would now be of some value.

Some Recall Judges

Of very few of our jurists can it be said that they are happy men, being full of the present, its bounty sufficing them. They are all concerned about the constitutional amendment providing for the application of the recall to the judiciary. It is a significant fact that in the whole State, of the two or three judges who have expressed themselves in favor of the recall there is not one who has not cultivated public opinion more assiduously than he has cultivated a familiarity with the fundamentals of law. All of them have been candidates for the Supreme Court, and all of them are known to the legal profession as judges who have practiced law by ear. Each argues in favor of the recall on the same principle, the very shallow principle that if the people are competent to elect they are also competent to recall. Of course the truth of the matter is the people are not competent to elect. If they were competent to elect there would be much less occasion for complaint about the judiciary, and it is because they elect that judges who might otherwise be efficient are far from being so. If the people were competent to elect judges there would be hardly any need of courts so little litigation would there be. If the people were competent to elect nine-tenths of the lawyers in the State would have to find some other means of livelihood, for the incompetents would have no practice. Again, supposing that the people were competent to elect judges, how does it follow that they are fit to handle such a dangerous weapon as the recall? There is the same difference between the employment of the elective franchise and the employment of the recall as there is between the use of a carving knife and the use of a bowie. It is all a question of mood. When a man dissects a fowl he is not in the same mood as when he seizes a bowie. Another point that appears to be overlooked by the advocates of the recall; one that is of paramount importance: it is not altogether a question of competency on the part of the people, but a question as well of independence on the part of the judiciary. Justice is impaired in the degree in which judges lack independence. A judge under our system is never so impartial as the day after election, and never so unfit for duty as the day before election. Yet the advocates of the recall would have every judge perpetually on the eve of election.

Angellotti for Chief Justice

While on the subject of judges I am reminded of one who, though full of the present is also anxious about the morrow's hidden season. Not content is he to do what lies clearly at hand. His grand business is to indulge anticipation, to see what lies dimly at a distance, to conjure pleasant visions on the cloud-curtain of the future. This is our young and restless friend, Justice Angellotti, who is under the spur of ambition, struggling with destiny. He is delighting his mind's eye with an image of himself in the chair now occupied by Chief Justice Beatty. Realizing that the hours have winged feet he has taken time by the forelock and marked the seat which is not to be vacated for four years as the goal of his ambition. As Chief Justice Beatty has signified his intention to retire from the bench at the end of his term it is of course with the best of feeling that Justice Angellotti enters himself as a candidate for the exalted office. It may seem rather early for Justice Angellotti to open his campaign, but in these days of progressive politics it is indeed the early bird that catches the worm.

The Rise of an Engineer

The report on the street that Samuel Naphtaly, the engineer, has left the Fleishhacker interests to become the chief engineer for the Great Western Power Company serves to remind me of the rapid rise of this young man. In his new position he will command a magnificent salary and will take his place among the great engineers who have been or are now identfied with the gigantic power projects of the West. His success is due to natural capabilities reinforced by unremitting study and a love of his work which keeps him continually "on the job." Naphtaly is a son of the well known attorney and it was his father's dearest wish that he should study for the bar. As a boy, living with his parents at the California Hotel, he was forever tinkering with the boilers or the elevators or repairing push buttons. So his father abandoned his own predilection and saw to it that the youngster received a thorough grounding in electrical engineering. Afterwards he bought him an interest in the Emporium power plant, one of those cellar plants which supplied power to neighboring stores. From there young Naphtaly went to the gas company where he speedily proved himself an expert engineer with a special talent in economizing power. From the first he saved the supply of power on Sundays and holidays when less needs to be generated than on weekdays. From the gas company he went to the Fleishhackers and now he has left them for a bigger field. Those who know say that he has a great career ahead of him. That the broadening of his horizon will not change his habits of work is probable. It is not uncommon to see Naphtaly, after a hard day's work, rushing home to dress for dinner and the theater; then you are likely to see him, about midnight, supping in some cafe with every appearance of leisured enjoyment; but later still it may be that you will notice him speeding about town in his car, studying questions of power or lighting which cannot by their nature be attended to during the day. I am told that he sometimes snatches his sleep in a chair between activities.

The Light and Power War

This mention of Naphtaly reminds me that the big interests are even now lining up for what will undoubtedly be a very important and a very interesting light and power war. There are many angles to the situation but at the points of particular vantage we find the Great Western Power Company, the San Francisco Gas and Electric, the Municipal Light and Power Company and the United Properties Company. Here are aggregations endowed with millions and brains that will make things hum before they are through. Back of the Great Western Power Company stand the immense Hawley interests. This corporation has a strong hold on Alameda County and is already in the local field, bidding for electric business. The Municipal Light and Power Company is also competing with the San Francisco Gas and Electric Company in the sale of electricity. The Smith-Hanford interests in the United Properties Company are strong in Oakland and are building some seventy miles of conduits in this city, besides buying up all the small cellar plants making electricity and steam that they can lay their hands on. Of course the fight will be warmest in this city, but it is also waging in Oakland where the Hawley and Fleishhacker interests are competing with the United Properties Company. And in the background, threatening to enter the local field, hovers John Hays Hammond, assisted by John Coffey Hayes. Hammond has consolidated the Tuolumne power properties and the Legrange properties created by the late Jeff Doolittle and is awaiting his opportunity. He controls enough sources to supply power for the whole Coast. Naturally the power people are asking, When will he get busy?

That Atrocious Sign

By the way, if old Claus Spreckels could see the atrocious electric sign which son Rudolph has spread across the front of the Claus Spreckels Building as an advertisement for the Municipal Light and Power Company, he would turn in his grave. Old Claus was proud of his building and would never allow it to be disfigured. His son John D. sympathized with this feeling and did everything in his power to deter people from calling it the Call Building, its right name being the Claus Spreckels Building. But Rudolph does not share this sentimental feeling. Perhaps, too, he saw a chance to plague John D. by the disfigurement.

Sore at the Governor

I heard a man conversant with the inner workings of politics remark the other day that the feeling of soreness cherished by the members of the recent legislature toward Governor Johnson surpasses anything of the sort exhibited for many years. He prophesied that when the next session is held the holdover Senators and the reelected assemblymen would be prepared to swat his excellency hip and thigh. It is a bold prophesy, for two years may heal many wounds. But the examples of the prevailing sentiment which he gave me were interesting. There is Senator John Curtin of Sonora. He had charge of the constitutional amendment for the reform of taxation and worked hard between sessions to insure its adoption by the voters. He gave his time and money to an educational campaign, made expensive trips, hired stenographers and neglected his large law practice. Then he put in a bill of four thousand dollars for expenses. On the last day for signing bills he went to Sacramento to see the Governor. But he didn't gain admission to the august presence. The Governor was too busy to grant him audience. So Curtin returned to Sonora vowing vengeance, and his expense bill was killed. Senators Welch and Hare of this city had an experience of much the same kind. With Senator Wolfe they had been appointed on a between-session commission to investigate the high cost of living. They put in expense bills of $1500 apiece. They too went to see the Governor on that last day for the signing of bills. At first they were denied audience, but they persisted and managed to see the Governor after cooling their heels in the ante-chamber for a long time. But their claims were not allowed. The Governor explained that he would prefer to have the Board of Control pass on such bills, but as there is no board of control yet they will have to wait two years for their money and may not get it even then. I am told that what Welch and Hare said about the Governor would not look well in a family journal. Their associate, Senator Wolfe, probably recognized the futility of importuning the Governor. Instead of going to Sacramento he went East with Henry Ach and Thomas H. Williams. His destination is Nauheim where he will take the cure for his rheumatism and where he will have little occasion to meditate on petty politics.

Unmolested Morals

Among the measures vetoed by Governor Johnson was the one known as the net container bill. This was the bill designed to improve the morals of trade, or rather to put an end to one of the dishonesties of trade. The bill provided that there should be a plain statement on every package of the quantity or weight of the contents. What the objection was to this bill I have not been informed. What better legislation could be enacted than such as might diminish the illicit practices, the venial deceptions, the direct thefts of certain manufacturers? Assuredly legislation of this kind is in line with the most vehement professions of the current upright Administration. It is committed to nothing more strenuously, more emphatically, than to the purification of morals by commandments with penal attachments. And it is not to be gainsaid that of class morals there are not to be found any more in need of improvement than those which are embalmed in what is known as "customs of trade." Then why was the net container bill sent to the limbo of forgotten legislation? Who protested and why? Was it some distinguished packer of decayed fruit? or was it some wizard who employs five quarts to the gallon?

Kent and His Friend Cobb

From Washington came the news last week that a protest had been made to the Senate Committee on judiciary against the confirmation of Charles W. Cobb, nominated recently as assistant attorney-general for the Interior Department on the recommendation of Representative Kent; whereat there was much indignation among the sycophants of the prodigal millionaire of Marin county. The gravamen of the protest against Cobb's appointment is that he will be placed in charge of the case against Kent's cattle company indicted for illegal fencing of public domain in Nevada. It is pointed out that the relations between Kent and the Interior Department are analagous to the relations that existed between that department and the Cunningham claimants during the Ballinger regime. Secretary Fisher and Representative Kent are intimate friends, and the Secretary has the power to render valuable service to the California and Nevada land baron. With Cobb on the job matters will be greatly facilitated in the manner most gratifying to Kent whose pull even now is apparently prodigious; for though indicted about a year ago his company has never been prosecuted. What reason there is for the delay is not apparent. In accordance with custom the Department of Justice was asked to report as to the advisability of proceeding with the trial on the indictment or permitting Kent to settle with the government by paying damages. Kent, it is said, is in favor of the settlement course; but this is incredible as it must be remembered that the rectitudinous reformer from Marin is a representative of the League of Justice, one of the cardinal principles of which is that when accused of crime one is presumed to be guilty, and therefore if innocent will insist upon vindication.

The Patriotic Cobb

Whatsoever be the truth as to Mr. Kent's attitude in the matter it is clear he has not been pressing the case to trial in his eagerness to vindicate his corporation. On the other hand it is clear he has been trying to get an intimate friend into the Department of Justice; also that he has received aid from President Taft who, of late, has been falling over his own feet in his mad haste to conciliate insurgents. How well Representative Kent has succeeded thus far the appointment of Cobb indicates, and how pleasing the appointment was to Representative Kent we learn from the Boughten Bulletin, which tells us what a good man Cobb is, what a great patriot, as was evidenced when patriotism was put to the test in this city, since Cobb was not one of the lawyers who "put their talents on the bargain counter"; which is true as we all know because the transcript of testimony in the Calhoun case shows that Cobb was taken in on the ground floor by Francis J. Heney, who made him his partner and compensated his patriotic self-sacrifice through the medium of the fructiferous Spreckels leg which yielded for this particular purpose twenty-five thousand dollars in hard cash exclusive of office expenses.

A Distinction Without a Difference

All defenders of Kent are not hypocritical purveyors of cant. He has some defenders who believe in him; who have such faith in his purity that they would not even enter into a discussion of the practical way in which he conducted his campaign. Among these sincere admirers of Congressman Kent is the Candid Friend of the Call, an excellent, typical partisan whose constancy to the only viewpoint that is ever available to him is never to be shaken. He was an ardent supporter of the cabal against Ballinger. Like a true partisan he made that quarrel personal to himself. He believed everything that was said against Ballinger, never for a moment letting "his frail thoughts dally with faint surmise." But now that the shoe is on the other foot he is bursting with indignation. He quotes a despatch from Washington telling of the relations between Kent and Secretary Fisher and then vociferates: "The malicious spirit of the foregoing is obvious without explanation"; also, "The half veiled and insincere attack on Kent is rather pitiful." To be sure it is. From the narrow viewpoint of this bigoted partisan, how could it be otherwise? Our judgments are indeed determined less by intellectual processes than by our feelings which are governed by our likes and our dislikes. If it were otherwise how little of fanatical partisanship there would be in the world!

Such a Nice Man!

From a gentleman recently returned from Washington I have received some interesting news with reference to Kent. He tells me that Kent's status as a statesman has been fixed for all time. Asked how it was fixed he told me this story: "According to the conventions of the House when a Representative has a speech to make he gets an allowance of time from his party floor leader. When Kent wanted to deliver his maiden speech he went to the Democratic leader and asked for time to roast the tariff. It was given to him; and sotto voce the man by whom it was given expressed his opinion of the Republican congressman from California. This was Kent's introduction to the House, and the manner of it was enough to fix his status, but as though to render himself unique and memorable the distinguished reformer devoted most of his time to a tirade of abuse against his predecessor, Duncan McKinlay. Have you any more like him in California? is the question Washington statesmen are now asking."

by labor leaders to promote speculation among wage-earners. It was the "laboring man's oil company." The predatory plutocrat was barred therefrom. None but the faithful union man was to be permitted a slice of the turkey, and by union men about fifty thousand dollars was subscribed. Local union men have learned another costly lesson, and they are said to have become so wary that now they are reluctant to put up for the defense of the dynamite suspects. Some of them aren't sure the money will reach its destination.

Commandeering an Organ

There was great excitement, not to say consternation, in the Tapestry Room of the St. Francis last Thursday night. And well there might be, for a gang of perspiring, coatless and hatless men suddenly rushed into that sacred abode of music, gossip and liquid refreshment, and rushed out with the organ. The musicians were too bewildered to protest and the guests looked on in dumb amazement at what they regarded as the most daring and most public robbery that had ever been perpetrated. Those who followed the gang to the street saw them lift the organ into an express wogan, bundle in after it and disappear in a mad clatter of flying hoofs and grinding wheels up Geary street. The explanation came later. Just before the curtain rose on the last act of Bernhardt's "La Sorciere" at the Columbia it was discovered that the property man had neglected to supply an organ. There was a panic behind the scenes. Organ music supplies one of the indispensable effects for the close of the Sardou play, and there was no organ in the theater! Edward J. Sullivan, the manager of the Bernhardt company, tore his hair in frenzy and muttered terrific cuss words. But suddenly an inspiration came to him and he hastily telephoned to James Woods, the manager of the St. Francis. "I want to borrow the St. Francis organ," he yelled. When the situation was made clear to Woods he cheerfully lent the organ; but before he could send word to the Tapestry Room an express wagon full of huskies was bearing it to the theater. The act went off well and nobody in the theater knew of the eleventh-hour contretemps which had so nearly spoiled the play.

The Origin of the Statuettes

There is an interesting story in the marketing of the Mutt and Jeff statuettes. Realizing the financial value of the ideas embodied by "Bud" Fisher in his comic creations Hearst had the drawings copyrighted in seventy-five different forms. But Hearst never thought of Mutt and Jeff statuettes. It remained for a Los Angeles bartender to conceive that happy idea. This man, one Gilroy, took George Cline, a sporting goods dealer of the southern city, into his confidence. Cline saw the moneymaking possibilities, so the twain interested Joe and Dan Murphy of this city. Joe Murphy gave up the champagne business for the new venture and has seen no reason to regret the move. The profits of the sales which are large wherever the original pictures are known, must be divided between the Hearst News Syndicate, "Bud" Fisher, Gilroy, Cline, a New York sculptor named Whittier who designed the manikins and the Murphys. But there is a handsome profit for all.

Mrs. Atherton's New Novel

The novel on which Gertrude Atherton will soon commence work in her favorite city of Munich will be founded on the play of "Julia France" which she wrote for Mrs. Fiske and which that actress is expected to produce next winter. "The usual way," says Mrs. Atherton, "is to dramatise a novel or novelise a drama. My play is written, and before it appears I am going to write the novel, which is another affair altogether. What strikes me is the thought that this is pre-eminently a woman's epoch, as there have been other women's epochs in the history of the world. That is the big canvas behind the play and novel, which last, I suppose, will occupy me all summer. When winter comes I shall probably settle in Washington in order to write another 'Senator North.' My American publisher and friend, whom I humbly obey, says a new world of American politics has evolved since 'Senator North' was written and no doubt he is right, as usual."

Hearst's London Paper

Although William Randolph Hearst denied emphatically that he had bought the Weekly Budget of London, it has been established conclusively that the paper stands in the name of Hearst's father-in-law and it "is understood" that Hearst himself supplied the money with which papa-in-law acquired it. When interviewed Hearst stated that the Budget had been bought by Blakely Hall, lately the Hearst representative in London. But he studiously avoided stating that Hall had transferred the property to George Leslie Willson, the father of the beautiful woman who is Mrs. William Randolph Hearst. The purchase price was $15,000. Now there is no incongruity in supposing that Hearst advanced this money, part in cash and part by promissory note, as it is said he did, for Willson is not regarded as a man of means. Just why Hearst makes such a mystery of the transaction is something of a puzzle. Perhaps premature publicity interferes with some of his deep laid plans.

Buckley at His Old Tricks

The exoneration of Dandridge H. Bibb in the Superior Court the other day was what might have been expected. While traveling in the East Bibb was arrested at the instigation of "Chris" Buckley, the former political boss of unsavory memory, and charged with having fraudulently sold a piece of property. From the testimony in the case it appeared that Buckley swore out the warrant to compel Bibb's return to the State in order to get his deposition in a civil suit pending in San Jose. There was a time when Buckley could do that sort of thing with impunity. That was before he found it expedient to become a fugitive from justice. In all probability he will find that it is expensive to indulge at this late day in the practices of the halcyon period of his career, for Bibb intends to sue him for damages.

Marin's Eternal Problem

A boon of inestimable value has come to our aristocratic colony of Ross Valley; indeed to every person whose home is in the beautiful, picturesque county of Marin. This boon is a choice bit of literature, the finest thing for summer reading in a hammock that ever emanated from any press; that is, provided the hammock be within sound of the voice of the melodious mosquito. This brochure is entitled "Farmers' Bulletin No. 444." It was issued by the Department of Agriculture. The author is Dr. L. O. Howard, a profound student of the mosquito in his infinite variety. He has made a valuable contribution to the sum of human knowledge. His work abounds in hints to the great mass of mankind. Under the pregnant head "Remedies for Mosquito Bites," he says that by holding the wounded hand to a hot lamp chimney "the irritation of mosquito punctures will be relieved instantly." The hot chimney is a sovereign remedy accessible to the humblest and the lowliest. But it is only for the brave. Less drastic treatment may be employed. The wet end of a piece of toilet soap rubbed gently on the inflamed surface will be found efficacious, though not as effectual as applications of ammonia, alcohol, glycerine, indigo or iodine. If one prefers not to be bitten one may employ certain aparatus. Says Dr. Howard, "Take a tin cup containing kerosene, attach it to a pole and when you see Culex or Anopheles on the ceiling press the cup over him and he dies." The doctor tells us that by this method "the majority of the mosquitoes in a given bedroom can be caught before one goes to bed." But the doctor has never lived in Ross Valley in midsummer, and he doesn't know how swiftly the ranks on the ceiling are recruited. Still even in Ross Valley one doesn't have to go early to bed.

Smudges and Fumigants

Naturally it will be suggested that all mosquitoes don't roost on the ceiling. For the capture of the others a trap has been contrived. It is a box 12 by 12 by 9 inches in the top of which is a revolving piece of wood that fans the air, thus cooling the recess and luring the unwary songbird of the swamps to destruction. It is very simple, but the trapper must facilitate matters by engaging in the chase with a feather duster. The inventor of this trap has caught as many as eighty-three of the winged beasts in a day. For the languid who have no sporting blood in their veins Dr. Howard recommends certain protective liquids. But as these evaporate during the night one must have an alarm clock and anoint oneself about daylight especially where the yellow fever abounds for the yellow fever mosquito is on the wing at dawn. The doctor is an enthusiast for smudges and fumigants. The best fumigant is Pyrethrum powder, but to be effective it must be used in a closed room and the fumigator must remain enveloped in a cloud of smoke. Dr. Howard is very discouraging to persons who think that the best way to deal with mosquitoes is to attack them in their breeding places. He says extermination is impossible because mosquitoes breed not only in marshes but in urns in cemeteries, in the tracks of horses, flower vases, in the very smallest receptacles. A swarm of thousands may come out of the water contained in half of a beer bottle. So what's the use.

The Get-Together Spirit

At the Olympic Club banquet Saturday night William Greer Harrison was the guest of honor, and on being introduced by President Humphrey he was given a most uproarious greeting. When the noise subsided he remarked that so cordial a welcome seemed to argue that the hole had been filled up. This allusion to the big excavation that was made in the Olympic club's lot in the last days of Mr. Harrison's administration evoked more thunders of applause. It was an allusion that everybody understood, for the making of that hole caused a great deal of soreness. The members believed it was a grievous and expensive blunder, and Mr. Harrison was much censured though he had but followed the advice of an architect. The hole has been filled up, and the new club building has taken shape, and the Olympians being prosperous and happy once more are now inclined to remember rather the valuable services rendered by Harrison in the days agone when the club was far from affluent than the unfortunate mistake that provoked unpleasant criticism. The banquet, by the way, was a joyous affair, and some rattling good speeches were made. Justice Melvin phrased felicitously some beautiful sentiments touching the State of California which warmed the cockles of his hearers' hearts. William H. Crocker was both facetious and grave, and as happy in one humor as in the other. He touched on the subject of the Exposition, which, he said, would be well worth the money subscribed and voted if it had but one result and that the reconciliation of the jarring interests of this community. So far as he was concerned, he said, notwithstanding his own experience, he was willing to wipe out the past and join hands for the common good.

They Forgot the Trowel

The laying of the cornerstone of the new Olympic Club went off smoothly, but there came near being a hitch in the ceremonies. The corner stones of important buildings are usually laid with silver trowels properly inscribed. But at six o'clock of the evening before the Olympic Club ceremony it was discovered that everybody had forgotten about the trowel. It takes time to make a silver trowel and it takes more time to engrave it. But the Olympians were not dismayed. They hunted up the manager of one of our big jewelry establishments and had him open the shop and summon silversmiths. Work was commenced at once and continued through the night. When the ceremony took place the following afternoon the silver trowel was ready.

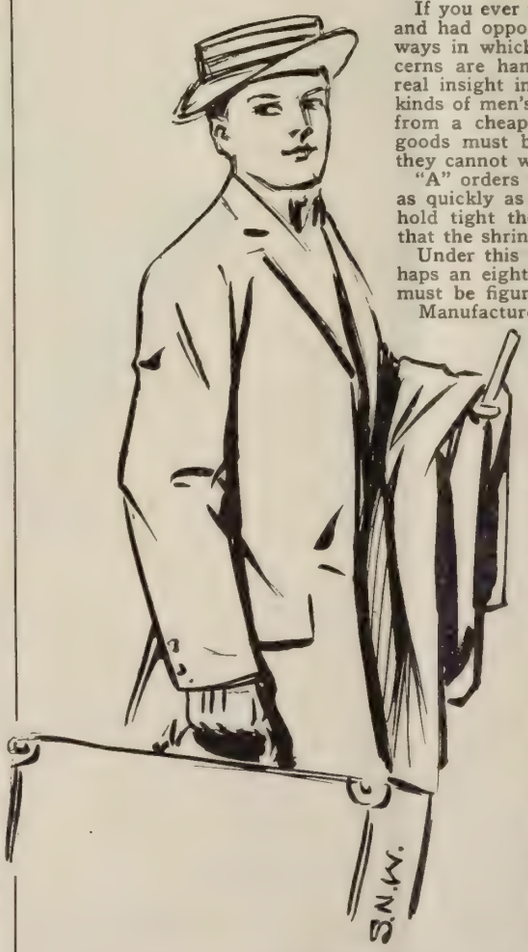
SHRUNKEN GOODS



If you ever were in a shrinking plant in New York and had opportunity to notice the difference in the ways in which materials for different clothing concerns are handled there, you would get your first real insight into the different costs of the different kinds of men's clothing. Here comes a lot of goods from a cheap manufacturer we will call "A." All goods must be nominally shrunken, you know, or they cannot well be advertised as such.

"A" orders his goods passed over the steam roller as quickly as possible, and the man is delegated to hold tight the other end of the piece of cloth so that the shrinkage will be as little as possible.

Under this arrangement "A" stands a loss of perhaps an eighth of a yard to the piece, all of which must be figured in his estimates of cost.

Manufacturer "B" sends over some materials to be shrunk. He is a trifle higher in class, and is willing to allow a little more generously for shrinkage, say a quarter to a half a yard to the piece.

Manufacturer "C" wants his goods really shrunken. His orders are to do a good job, to water-shrink them, whether the loss is three-quarters, or a whole yard, or even more to the piece. His loss is greater and his cost more but when his fabrics are made up into suits, they hold their shape.

We belong to the "C" class of manufacturers, and with thoroughly shrunken goods to start on we spare no pains in their subsequent manufacture.

The result is the perfect "WOOD" CLOTHING FOR MEN, which we are turning out from our New York factory and selling here and in our Oakland stores.

It is only of recent years that our manufacturing department has reached such a state of high efficiency. But this is the way "WOOD" CLOTHING is being made now. Never mind what happened before the fire, or how our suits were turned out then. The world is moving, and this business is keeping up with the band wagon of progress.

See the new samples of "WOOD" ready-made clothing for men now on sale at $15, $17.50, $20 and $25

Those Crocker Pearls Again

A correspondent whose calligraphy shows many signs of undue excitement, writes me anent the Jennie Crocker pearls. This fair unknown—she is a woman and all women are fair in print—professes to have discovered that Miss Crocker is in possession of the pearl necklace which she is supposed to have lost at that celebrated ball at the St. Francis. And how does my correspondent prove this interesting, if unimportant assertion? By reference to the recent society vaudeville at the Valencia Theater. In that vaudeville, you remember, Miss Crocker with Miss Merritt Reid, Mrs. Fred McNear, Mrs. Worthington Ames and Mrs. Eugene Murphy, tripped forth in a musical number, "Look out for Jimmie Valentine," wearing a jupe-culotte gown. Then

Willard Barton, Walter Hush and Arthur Hooper, as the musical burglars, discovered the long-lost string of Crocker pearls on the person of Miss Crocker. All very pretty and entertaining. But my correspondent will have it that the pearls used were the real simon-pure pearls which Miss Crocker is supposed to have lost. She gives me alleged details of the alleged loss—this sounds like journalese skating the thin ice of libel, but really the whole thing is allegatory—which it would be indiscreet to publish here. All I can say is that if Miss Crocker really has the original pearls supposed to have been lost beyond recovery, I for one am not surprised. Suppose they had been misplaced instead of stolen? It would have required superfeminine courage to say so after all that pother had been kicked up.

A Gambling Club for Women

That was an interesting account which appeared in the papers a few days ago about the Monterey Club in Grant avenue and its membership of women who go there to gamble through the medium of the great American game of poker. The story gained notoriety, you recall, because one of the women whose people are said to be prominent socially in Philadelphia while her husband is said to have a Pittsburg coal baron for a father, objected to the loss of $57 and summoned her hubby to help her express her indignation. Afterwards the husband disappeared and reappeared to account for his absence with a remarkable narrative of kidnaping. It was all very entertaining. But the newspapers merely scratched the surface of the story. And that is just as well. It would cause too much trouble if the whole truth came out. As a matter of fact the Monterey Club numbers in its membership many women who do not have to reach across the continent to establish their social prominence. They are very prominent socially right here in San Francisco. Some of them love to gamble for the excitement of the thing, while others gamble to add to the pin money which is allowed them in rather generous sums by their husbands. Gaming has run high at this curious establishment. The names of those women who have won and lost hundreds of dollars at poker will never be published, I hope. Such a publication would serve no good purpose and cause no end of trouble. The same applies to the women in the club who eschew poker but who have been devoting themselves passionately to the insidious pastime of "playing the ponies." For this pastime every facility was afforded at this club. Equal facilities for the quenching of thirst with pleasant but perilous alcoholic beverages were provided. Take it all in all, this was an establishment unique in local annals. It is just as well that too much was not learned of its membership by the prying reporters.

The Ladies Please Him Not

A very popular young chap who is vice-president of one of our largest and most successful dry goods establishments which maintains branches in Paris and New York, entered the St. Francis a few days ago with a blue bachelor button displayed on the lapel of his coat. The symbol of confirmed celibacy excited the astonishment of his friends who did not look upon this blade as one who cherished sentiments of anything but the deepest admiration for the gentler sex. So they asked him about the significance of the flower. In his most picturesque diction which he always flavors with rich Gallic wit he expressed an extremely unsympathetic opinion of women. And then his friends remembered that the engagement of pretty Miss Jennie Lee to whom he had been very devoted was a feature of the morning news.

Mrs. Alexander is Here

Mrs. Henry Alexander of New York is receiving much attention from the friends of her daughter Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt Jr. She is a youthful appearing woman who might be taken for the sister of her daughter. They bear a strong resemblance to each other and by many people Mrs. Alexander is voted the prettier. Mother and daughter were lunching at the St. Francis a few days since and attracted admiring glances. Mrs. Alexander wore a purple cloth suit with black braiding and a hat of purple straw in one of the new shapes. Mrs. Roosevelt's costume was blue and she had a becoming red bow on her hat. Mrs. Roosevelt, by the way, is partial to low collars. Most of her frocks are finished with them and she has some Irish lace collars that are the work of her own hands. Miss Harriet Alexander of New York who was

Is Miss Schultz Wavering?

The fact that Miss Elyse Schultz was observed one day this week at Shreve's giving orders for the fitting of a large diamond ring has caused many to wonder whether this interesting girl is wavering in her devotion to single blessedness. There may be something in this speculation. Miss Schultz has had lots of suitors, but the attentions of two men are particularly marked at the present time. One of them is a lawyer prominent in his profession. His intimates have usually regarded him as a bachelor of the discouraging confirmed variety, but one is never surprised when a confirmed bachelor capitulates to the charms of a pretty girl. The other devoted man is a millionaire of considerable note. Was it one of these who presented the diamond ring without taking the exact measure of Miss Schultz's finger?

The Count's Devotion

The announcement of the engagement of Count de la Rocca of Colon, formerly connected with the French Consulate in this city, to the daughter of a French official, will bring to mind his deep devotion to pretty Miss Elsie Tallant. Although his affection was not reciprocated by the charming belle, who was a debutante at the time, he persisted in his attentions and freely confessed his love to many of her society friends. It is related that the first evening the count (who could not speak English) met Miss Tallant he paid her the compliment of saying that she spoke the most perfect French of all the young ladies he had met in the West, an opinion he did not change when he knew her better. Apropos Miss Tallant, her friends will be pleased to hear that she has entirely recovered from her long illness and is at present in New York with her mother. She is a great favorite in social circles in the metropolis. Mrs. Tallant has taken an apartment and will remain until late in the Fall.

A Novel Luncheon

To Mrs. Robert Davis of Berkeley belongs the credit of a most novel luncheon. It was given recently at her home. The invitations called it a "cafeteria luncheon" and it justified the description in every detail. From an improvised counter the guests, numbering some ninety-eight, took tiny trays, napkins, forks etc., and then helped themselves to chicken pie, salad, buttered toast, almonds, cheese, crackers and ices. Funny signs were hung about the room. One sign read: "The managers have strained every lobe of their brain to further the interest of patrons and hope they will meet with every discouragement." Miss Constance Davis and two or three young debutantes were dressed as waitresses. After luncheon a basket was passed around with cigars and cigarettes which, although made of chocolate, looked so natural that Mrs. Spencer, the conventional mother of Mrs. Davis, became horrified and showed her disapproval by leaving the room. When she was satisfied that the cigars and cigarettes were of candy she returned. Among others present were Mrs. J. K. Armsby, Mrs. Charles Belden, Mrs. George Plummer, Mrs. Goodlove, Mrs. Frank Fuller, Mrs. House, Mrs. William P. Treat, Mrs. Grim, Mrs. Spencer, Mrs. Towle, Mrs. E. Van Bergen, Mrs. Williard Wayman and Mrs. George Roe.

Samuel Newhouse, richest of Utah's millionaires, is at the St. Francis for a long stay.

Joshing a Princess

The eastern prints have not received with proper seriousness the intelligence that our Princess Abigail Wahikaahuula Kawananakoa has been "commanded" to the Coronation. It is not often that we of this western edge of civilization find an opportunity to bask vicariously in the smiles of royalty and we wish that more importance would be attached to an event of this sort by our scoffing neighbors on the Atlantic seaboard. But they are incurably derisive. I find one of them commenting on the regal command: "I wink me the eye." Is this jealousy or what? I do not like to read that "Abby is ambitious beyond bounds, and it appears as if some press agent is endeavoring to give her a boost." That is neither polite nor accurate. Neither is it very funny to chronicle that "some wag has expressed curiosity as to whether she intends to put up at St. James Palace or Windsor Castle." And I do not like to read that her "husband's title is said to be one given to him by courtesy when the Sandwich Islands had their comic-opera monarchy of dusky rulers and court attendants." Princesses should not be joshed. They are entitled to respect, although they rarely receive it in this hopelessly democratic republic. No doubt when the "Princess Can o' Cocoa," as she is sometimes called for convenience, reaches London she will be accorded the deference which is her due.

The Princess Disappointed

The Princess Kawananakoa, by the way, disappointed the curious on the occasion of the recent wedding of young Jay Gould and Anne Douglass Graham in New York. It had been rather needlessly heralded that the Princess would appear at St. Thomas's Church in her famous Hawaiian humming-bird cape. This cape is of tiny feathers from a bird that inhabited the high altitudes of one of the Hawaiian Islands, and the species is now extinct. As each bird had but one feather, this forming a sort of topknot, the difficulty of gathering enough to make a cape may be imagined. The cape which the Princess inherited is a bright almost iridescent yellow, and although very old, is in perfect condition and wonderfully beautiful. Worn over a black gown, thus suggesting the Hawaiian royal colors, it would have been very striking. Too striking for a wedding, thought the Princess; so she did not wear it. Whereat the idly curious were greatly aggrieved. One New York bavarde wrote that "it was hot enough on the day of the wedding to make any native Sandwich Islander regret that conventionality forbade the adoption of the national costume of the ancestors of the lamented Kalakaua"; which shows that even New York bavardes can dip their pens in malice.

The Mersfelder Musicale

Jules Mersfelder, assisted by Frank B. Keever, entertained at one of the informal musicales of the week in his new studio at Van Ness avenue and Union street. Half a hundred guests were invited to meet Miss Violet Silver, the brilliant child violinist. The talented girl rendered several exquisite numbers, the best appreciated, perhaps, being the "Angel Seranade" by Schubert, which she sang in a rich voice to her own accompaniment on the violin, assisted by Mr. Salz at the piano. The rest of the program was contributed by Miss Ella Atkinson, Miss Maude Atkinson, Mr. Salz, Miss Evangeline Sale and Joseph Rosborough. Among other guests were Dr. and Mrs. Larence, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Shorb, Mr. and Mrs. Campbell Shorb, Mr. and Mrs. Ross C. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Masten, Mrs. George Carr, Mrs. James C. Crawford, Mrs. Pearl Ervin Thomas, Mrs. Lillian Marsh, Mrs. Kirk Shiely, Mrs. Cosgrove, Mrs. Stirling Mighels, Blanche Partington, Miss Ethel Shorb, Miss Jeanette Rapeen, Miss Rose Dean, Miss Edwards, Miss Lea, Dr. Ayre Williard, Phillip Paschel, Lieutenant Burr, M. Nelcutt of the French Consulate and Percy Mills.

The Mills Club Luncheon

The annual luncheon of the Mills Club was given on Tuesday at the rooms of the Sorosis Club in Sutter street. The Misses Theresa and Lily Sherwood gave an interesting musical program of mandolin and guitar duets, the numbers being interspersed between toasts during luncheon. The music was greatly appreciated and the "Aloha" which was the last offering evoked considerable tender feeling. It was particularly appropriate, as Mills College was started by Dr. and Mrs. Mills in the Hawaiian Islands. The gathering was the largest in the history of the club.

Professor Wanrell Marries

The wedding of Professor Joaquin Wanrell and Mrs. Catalina de Carranza which took place last week at the home of the bride was a surprise to the many friends of the talented singer who regarded him as a confirmed devotee of single blessedness. But now that he has seen the error of his bachelor ways he and his cultured bride are being showered with felicitations. Mrs. Wanrell is a member of one of the fine old Castilian families of the city. Her daughter Mrs. Fay Molera, formerly Miss Fay Carranza, has been heard frequently in concerts here. Professor Wanrell has won artistic honors in two hemispheres. He graduated at the Madrid Conservatory and has sung in opera in the great European cities and in South America. He first came here to sing in grand opera at the Tivoli and has been a resident of the city ever since.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. Richard E. Mulcahy has returned from Europe after an absence of nearly three years, where she has been traveling for her health. The death of her son caused her health to break down and while not entirely recovered, she is much better. Mr. and Mrs. Mulcahy have opened their summer home at Fair Oaks.

Mrs. J. Russell and son and Miss F. Nunon are registered at the Hotel Victoria from their home in Jacksonville, Oregon.

Miss Virginia Jolliffe who has been the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Tom Eastland at Burlingame came up to the St. Francis with her host and hostess for an informal luncheon at which Mr. and Mrs. Peter Martin, Thornwell Mullally, Willard Barton, Mr. and Mrs. Roy Bishop and Mrs. F. McLeod Fenwick were present.

Nance O'Neil in "The Lily"

By Edward F. O'Day

I went to the Columbia eagerly, possessed by lively anticipations. I promised myself an evening of pleasure unalloyed. There was the pleasure of seeing Nance O'Neil again which, to one who has followed her career with sympathy from the old days of Oliver Twist and Lady Teazle through Shakespeare and the lesser tragedians to Ibsen and Sudermann and even to vaudeville, cannot help being a great pleasure. To see what changes had been wrought in her by the substitution of David Belasco for McKee Rankin in the managerial position was worth going forth for to see. Had her voice been tamed of its primitive husk, had her emotional amplitude been submitted to a banting process? One who had followed Nance O'Neil from theater to theater in San Francisco would naturally be interested in finding answers to these questions. But there was another reason for the pleasurable expectation. I refer to Miss Julia Dean. It is quite a few years now since Julia Dean fluttered the hearts of susceptible youths in ingenue roles at the California Theater. After she parted company with James Neill and Edythe Chapman she went to twinkle on Broadway and she comes back to us, possessing no mean reputation. With Nance O'Neil and Miss Dean in the cast any play should hold great interest for a San Franciscan. And when that play is a Belasco play—Belasco must be a hypnotist. (His press agent would probably say, a thaumaturge.) He casts a spell over his actors and actresses, so that waking or sleeping, on the stage and off they see Belasco, talk Belasco, think Belasco. They subordinate their own talents, sink their own individualities. And when Belasco writes a play, or carpenters a play out of rough hewn lumber supplied by others, the same hypnotic influence is apparently exerted on the critics. They trot out their superlatives and apologize that grammar has not supplied a supersuperlative degree of comparison. So when we have the opportunity of welcoming Nance O'Neil and Miss Dean in a Belasco play, there is no reason why we should not go to the theater with more than ordinary curiosity. By the presentation of "The Lily" curiosity is satisfied, but our lively anticipations are not all realized. "The Lily" is a good play, a play of continuous interest, a play with one scene in which Nance O'Neill and Miss Dean have considerable opportunity for evoking heart throbs. But it is not a play that justifies the use of superlatives. It is not a play to show Nance O'Neil at her best. It is really a better play for Miss Dean than for Nance O'Neil. For Nance O'Neil has only one scene in the play. She does not appear in the first act; during the second act she is merely a figure; during a great part of the third act she is obviously waiting for her opportunity; in the fourth act she is again submerged. Her opportunity comes in the third act, but it is not the big opportunity it has been cracked up to be. In her impassioned outburst she produces two or three quick revulsions of feeling in her audience, but the whole thing seems to fall a little flat at the end. The stuff of deep emotional stirring is not there. We look for great things and they do not appear. We find that Nance O'Neil has been patiently waiting for a climax which is not tremendous, as we had been assured it was. I would much rather hear and see her in that curse scene in the good old-fashioned "Leah the Forsaken" or "The Jewess," as she used to call it. Between "The Lily" and "The Fires of St. John" there is no comparison of opportunities for Nance O'Neil. One play is Sudermann; the other is Belasco and Belasco is ever tricky instead of sincere. The evocation of deep emotion is beyond him. Whether it was beyond the French authors from whom he adapted "The Lily" I do not know; but I venture to say that there is more of Belasco than of Wolff and Leroux in the play. One may always venture a statement of that sort about a Belasco adaptation. No doubt the Belasco influence is good for Nance O'Neil. One may grant that without admitting that the Rankin influence was bad. Let us not forget that Rankin was the man who gave us Nance O'Neil in "The Fires of St. John," the play in which she transcended her best previous efforts. Belasco may find a play for her which will do for her what "The Music Master" did for that other Belasco star, David Warfield. But to my mind "The Lily" is not the play. It must be a bigger play and it must offer Nance O'Neil bigger chances. She is an actress of considerable range and her vigorous powers should not be pent up all evening, for sudden release in a single scene. Miss Dean's lesser powers are given more adequate play and she rises splendidly to her opportunities. The whole company does. It is a carefully selected company. If David Belasco will only select a new play for Nance O'Neil as carefully as he has selected this company, he will give us a chance to point with joy and pride to the fulfillment of all our prophesies about this remarkable woman. I sincerely hope that we shall have that chance soon.

Gossip of the Theatre

Sothern and Marlowe in Shakespeare

Blanche Ring will make her last appearances in "The Yankee Girl" at the Savoy Theater this Sunday evening and those distinguished Shakespearean stars, E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe will come to the McAllister street playhouse for two weeks, commencing Tuesday, May 16. The repertoire for the first week will be as follows: Tuesday night, "Macbeth"; Wednesday night, "Taming of the Shrew"; Thursday matinee, "Romeo and Juliet"; Thursday night, "Hamlet"; Friday night, "Twelfth Night"; Saturday matinee, "Macbeth," and Saturday night, 'As You Like It." On Monday night Mr. Sothern and Miss Marlowe will play at the Greek Theater, Berkeley, presenting "Macbeth," and the Savoy will consequently be closed on that occasion. The new Sothern and Marlowe presentation of "Macbeth" will be the most pretentious Shakespearean production these two eminent artists have yet given to the American stage. For nearly two years they have been steadily elaborating their ideas of the great tragedy, spending ceaseless hours studying all the different authorities and versions, to gain as much accuracy as possible. Scene painters have turned out, under Mr. Sothern's direction, the greatest effects of their skill and experience in the twenty scenes of the play, and last summer Miss Marlowe brought from England, after a ceaseless study of the authentic costumes of the eleventh century, wonderful exemplifications of the costumer's art. In the supporting company are Frederick Lewis, Sydney Mather, Rowland Buckstone, William Harris, Malcolm Bradley, Albert S. Howson, Eric Blind, John Taylor, Frederick Rowland, Alma Kruger, Lenore Chippendale, Mrs. Woodward and Norah Lamison. Owing to the elaborate nature of the performances, the curtain at night will rise at 8 o'clock sharp and at 2 o'clock at the matinees. The repertoire for the second and last week, commencing May 22, is as follows: Monday and Tuesday night, "Merchant of Venice"; Wednesday and Thursday nights, "Macbeth"; Thursday matinee, "As You Like It"; Friday night, "Romeo matinee, "As You Like It"; Friday and Saturday nights, "Romeo and Juliet."

Gould at the Orpheum

William Gould will appear at the Orpheum next week. He is now as big a favorite "on the road" as he is in New York where he is considered one of the best of raconteurs. Accompanying Mr. Gould and contributing greatly to the success of his act is pretty Hattie Lorraine. They are presenting dainty and witty vaudeville with a number of catchy songs of which Mr. Gould is the writer. He sings well, tells bright and funny stories effectively and realizes that vaudeville audiences assemble to be amused. Howard Hickman and Bessie Barriscale who will make their vaudeville debut, like "good wine, need no bush." For several seasons they have demonstrated their great histrionic ability at the Alcazar and are deservedly great favorites in this city. Their appearance in vaudeville is due more to accident than design. At the last benefit for the Charity Fund of the Theatrical Managers' Association they appeared with great success in a one-act play written by Mr. Hickman entitled "Disqualified." Morris Meyerfeld, president of the Orpheum Circuit, witnessed the performance and was so delighted with it that he immediately offered them an engagement. Tom Waters who shortly sails for England where he is under contract to appear at the Tivoli and other English music halls, will be an enjoyable feature of next week's bill. His performance will include his inimitable pianologue, together with a monologue of wit, song and mimicry. A wire performance will be given by the little Cuban Robledello.

Pepito Arriola's Concerts

Pepito Arriola, the wonderful boy pianist and the greatest musical prodigy of the generation, will appear at Scottish Rite Auditorium in two farewell recitals. The first concert will be given this Sunday afternoon, May 14, when Beethoven's Sonata Op. 53 (Walstein), a group of seven Chopin works, three Schumann gems and two Liszt compositions will be given. The farewell appearance will be on Saturday afternoon, May 20, when Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata," a group of six Chopin works and numbers by Daquin, Scriabine, Rubinstein and Liszt will be given. In Oakland Pepito will play at Ye Liberty Playhouse on Friday afternoon, May 19, at 3:30 p. m., offering the same program as on the following day in San Francisco and including the beautiful "Sonata Appassionata." Manager Greenbaum announces tht children will be given the best seats at these Arriola concerts for fifty cents.

"The Call of the North" at the Alcazar

"The Call of the North," adapted by George H. Broadhurst from Stewart Edward White's successful story, "The Conjuror's House," will be given its first presentation in San Francisco at the Alcazar, commencing next Monday night. Robert Edson used it as a starring vehicle season before last, and Paul Gilmore heads a touring company now playing it in the East. Many competent critics have pronounced it even more picturesque and interesting than "The Wolf," a play with somewhat similar locale and characterization. All the scenes are laid at Conjuror's House, a Hudson Bay Company's trading post, which is divided from nearest civilization to the southward by 600 miles of wilderness. Sydney Ayres will have the principal role, with Izetta Jewel, Viola Leach, Will R. Walling, Charles E. Gunn, Louis Bennison, Burt Wesner, Charles Schad, and the other regular Alcazarans in appropriate parts.

Mary Garden in Oakland

It has been arranged to lay off the entire stock at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, on Tuesday night, May 23, in order to present Mary Garden and her assisting artists at an evening concert. The big theater will no doubt present as brilliant a scene as at the memorable Tetrazzini concerts when even the stage was overcrowded. The program on this occasion will be the same as at the opening concert in San Francisco. The sale of seats will open Tuesday, May 18, and mail orders should now be addressed to H. W. Bishop.

John Drew Coming

"The Lily" will continue as the attraction at the Columbia for a second and final week commencing next Monday night. Matinee Wednesday and Saturday. John Drew will be the next attraction at the Columbia, opening his engagement there on Monday night, May 22. The Frohman star is presenting this season a new comedy called "Smith" from the pen of W. Sonerset Maughan. The author hits out straight from the shoulder in his newest play, and his arraignment of heartless, senseless, childless women of the fashionable world is intensely bitter. Leaving its purpose out of the question, the piece is a distinct novelty. Drew is supported by an especially fine company including among others Mary Boland, Isabel Irving, Sybil Thorndike, Jane Laurel, Morton Selten, Hassard Short and Lewis Casson.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Aside from the weakness in the Chemical stocks, the stock market was practically featureless the past week. Traders sold Virginia Chemical, American Agricultural and American Cotton Oil shares for no better reason, apparently, than that they offered less resistance to selling pressure than other active stocks. The remainder of the market had a firm undertone despite the efforts of traders to force a further reaction but while there was good support, no aggressive buying was in evidence. It is believed in good quarters that the market will be held within narrow bounds this week to await the action of the Supreme Court next Monday when it is generally expected that at least one of the important trust decisions will be handed down.

Wheat—Last week was an eventful one in the wheat trade and this week will see fully as important developments. The wheat delivered on May contracts went into strong hands and a start has been made in shipping out the hard winter wheat. Meanwhile shorts bid prices up to a point which has made the market a target for wheat from every direction, some States which have sent no wheat to Chicago since the Leiter deal in 1898 taking a hand. Shorts in May wheat have been placed in an unpleasant predicament by the taking in of the cash wheat by strong people and are straining every nerve to procure the wheat for delivery on their contracts rather than pay losses in the pit. The weather is beginning to be a market factor, and while conditions in the winter wheat belt are almost perfect the same cannot be said of the spring wheat belt. The plant in the northwest while not actually suffering from lack of moisture is in need of it, and should the weather remain dry for the next ten days it will be a factor in making the price and will be reflected in the September option.

Corn—Deliveries of cash corn on May contracts last week were much lighter than expected and fell into strong hands. Corn delivered was promptly forwarded East by lake and the May shorts were assisted by the longs who bid up prices sharply. The advance prices stimulated sale by the country and shut off foreign and industrial demand. The country is counted upon to ship freely as the weather has been ideal and the crop is about all planted.

Cotton—The cotton market scored a further advance during the past week owing to the continuance of unsettled wet weather in the cotton belt. Precipitation in South Texas, Louisiana and Arkansas was quite heavy, while light to moderate rains fell almost continuously in all other sections of the cotton region. There was a large demand for spot cotton in the early part of the week at Liverpool, and while there was a smaller business in spots at the close of the week in the English market, the fact that unsettled weather still prevailed in the south was the sustaining influence of the market. Trade conditions in the United States remain unsatisfactory, especially in textiles, curtailment being increased in the north and south. In England, however, the situation is different, a good trade being done with India, owing to the small crop in that country. It is to be presumed that since indications are that the world will take all of last year's crop, it is logical to assume that there will be about the same quantity of American cotton September 1 next that there was visible last year, say about 782,000 bales. That manipulation will be attempted this summer is a foregone conclusion, as New Orleans only holds a stock of 96,000 bales compared with 118,000 bales a year ago while New York only possesses 164,000 versus 243,000 in 1910 when August cotton sold at 20 cents owing to the very unfavorable prospects for the crop then prevailing. This year the outlook for the new crop is better than at this time last year. The increase in acreage will be enormous and fertilizer will be used on a more extensive scale. The weather will be the dominating influence, nevertheless, and for that reason and because of possible and probable manipulation in the summer months, we favor trading in the new crop months.

no modern criticism. The critics don't observe. If they would only give their impressions as individuals, their observations would be of great value to the community and to the artists. The artist would know what the average person thought of his work. But the criticism we have is of no benefit. The critics always describe my pictures as low-toned. I never painted in low-tones in my life. I paint in the middle key; my pictures are middle tones. But—"

And Mathews made a gesture of resignation as we rose to our feet. Clearly the art critics of San Francisco were not worth many words. Perhaps I should have gone to their defense, but I didn't. I am not entirely at home among low and middle tones. I merely said:

"You must have been joking when you said you had no views on California art."

Mathews smiled.

What the Spirits Said

It will be easy enough for you to find my skull."

"No," said the doctor. "Modern science cannot do that. You might look among those that have large, square jaws, but even then I doubt if you find it."

"But for me," said a soft, female voice, "you can give me my skull. You can surely find it in a minute. I was one of the most beautiful women in this country; all the other women were jealous of me and three men committed suicide for the love of me."

"You are in error," replied the scientist. "Let me tell you, poor child, let me tell you that a bare skull gives no indication of former beauty."

Then a young voice spoke, in accents of despair. "You can't find mine for me, then? From my earliest youth my parents forced me to study. I was poor. I sacrificed all the joys of youth, I lived like an ascetic, never taking an hour for amusement or recreation. People told me that I would be compensated later, that I would be celebrated. As you sow with such earnest labor, so will you reap, they said. I died at the age of thirty, killed by overwork. Of what good to me were my joyless days? And now, supreme irony of fate! I am going to have to take the skull of some imbecile or happy man."

"So it is," said the doctor sadly.

And the voice continued, fainter: "And I sacrificed all my life, all my life in vain."

"In vain," repeated the doctor mechanically.

"What an atrocious swindle," murmured the voice as it died away in the distance.

"Swindle,' yes! And you would have said the same thing had you enjoyed your hour of triumph," said another voice. "I died at the hospital the other day. Some years ago my books sold by the thousand. I was famous. My publisher grew rich. But a few years passed and no one remembered me any longer. In the bed next to mine at the hospital, the sister of a great poet lay dying. In his day he was a great man and now no one cares if his family starve to death. Yes, such is life. Where did you put the last lot you got from the hospital?"

"Over there," said the doctor, "in the left-hand corner. I have not sorted them out yet."

"Doctor," said a hoarse voice, "you know that little village in Auvergne where I was born some centuries ago—"

"Yes, yes," answered the doctor. "In the Auvergne. The people there had a very peculiar formation of the skull."

"The people then said I was an idiot. The boys threw stones at me in the streets and I was compelled to live alone because everyone thought that my ideas were those of a crazy man. Since then I have found out that I was just three centuries ahead of my time. But what the stupid majority of men cannot understand they rail at. I had a large head, a forehead full of bumps. They called me 'the fool,' and I have since learned that I was a man of genius."

"You!" exclaimed the doctor. "I can fix you all right! There, on the right, second shelf, number four. You can take it without hesitation. I have very few from your part of the country, and aomng them is an enormous and deformed s':ull." And then he added to himself: "I always thought that it was the skull of a lunatic."

Now there came to him a soft, plaintive whisper. "You can perhaps find mine, doctor. I suffered all my life the tortures of the damned. I had caries of the bones."

Delighted to be able to give a definite answer, the doctor unhesitatingly reached over and, feeling in the dark, picked up a skull.

"There you are," he said. To his inexpressible horror he felt the skull taken from his hand and carried away, and the same voice said: "Many thanks, doctor."

But the others, dissatisfied, were scolding and reproaching him: "He cannot recognize any but those who were ill! What is the good of his science and knowledge? What is the whole thing good for anyhow?"

Anu the words he had heard came back to the doctor: "And I sacrificed all my life, all my life, in vain! What an atrocious swindle!"

And now all the beings that had surrounded him seemed to be stealing away, vanishing. He only remembered these words:"What an atrocious swindle!" He reviewed his existence. From his earliest youth he had had no thought but to gain knowledge, to acquire a great reputation. Every hour of leisure was ruined by the thought that he was losing time. He began to hate his friends. He married almost thoughtlessly and at once began to teach his wife that she must respect his work, that she must not cause him to lose any time. Yes, if he had only known it, how the long intimate talks, evenings passed at the theater, suppers with friends, nights of love, render easier the labor of the morrow! If he stopped for a moment to play with a child, he reproached himself for losing precious minutes. How many years of life had he wasted, suffering himself and making others suffer, to gain time to devote to his scientific studies? "I have sacrificed all my life, all my life." Then he thought of some moments of triumph. He had written some books, and then, this new discovery! But what was this discovery? Some one would have made it, sooner or later, and he, in the meantime, might have lived; at the moment of death he might have had loving hands and loving thoughts about him.

"What an atrocious swindle!"

There came a light tap at the door; it startled the doctor. He looked about him and was surprised to find that the room was not quite so dark as it had appeared to him before. He seemed to awaken from a dream. But before he could move he saw a white form and heard the joyful voice of Claire calling out:

"Oh, grandpapa, you are here, are you not? Grandmama sent me to tell you that dinner was ready. She thought you had forgotten the hour as you have done so many times before. But what darkness here! Wait a moment, and I will turn on the light."

"No, no!" exclaimed the doctor in a curious voice. "No, don't turn on the light, little girl." But her little hand had already touched the electric button, and the doctor blinked under the flood of white light. He looked about him in terror. The great room was as it had always been, and Claire was coming toward him, laughing, her little hands outstretched.

"You look so funny, grandpapa! Have you been working hard?"

He looked about him and thought, with a feeling of intense relief: "Perhaps I have only been dreaming." Then he said to the child: "I was very tired; I think I fell into a doze."

"Poor grandpapa," she said tenderly. "If I had not come you would have stayed here all night."

The idea of passing the night in that hall filled her with horror.

He went to her and, lifting her up in his arms, said: "Did you have a nice walk? You bring in a breath of the springtime with you."

"Oh, I picked some lilacs and put them in my belt," she exclaimed. "If you knew how beautiful they are! The cherry trees are already in bloom and the cuckoo-flowers are beginning to open."

He smiled and took her to the window. "Tell me," he said breathlessly. "Are they pretty, the white cherry trees? And what do the cuckoo-flowers look like? Could you not teach me to enjoy the flowers and the sunshine?"

She looked at him, astonished. "But grandpapa, you never do anything but work!"

"See," he said, pointing to the sky in which the stars were beginning to appear, while in the west a pink glow still remained, "tomorrow we will have pleasant weather again and we will go and take a walk together, and you will teach me all about these things; you can teach me so many things, little one, I have wasted so much of life and I have so little time left to live; so little time left—to live."

A Piper

A piper in the streets today,
Set up, and tuned, and started to play,
And away, away, away on the tide
Of his music we started; on every side
Doors and windows were opened wide,
And men left down their work and came,
And women with petticoats colored like flame,
And little bare feet that were blue with cold,
Went dancing back to the age of gold,
And all the world went gay, went gay,
For half an hour in the street today.

Auto Notes

Endeavors of local automobile dealers to be the first to send their cars over the summit of the high Sierras this spring should be stimulated by an offer of a silver trophy, just made, on the part of the Lake Tahoe Tavern, for the car that first reaches the Tahoe resort over the new State Highway which runs from Sacramento via Emigrant Gap and Truckee to the lake. Great interest has attached for several years past to various endeavors to cross the Sierras while the road was still spotted with snow and to be the first machine to accomplish the feat has always been considered a distinction of first importance that carries with it a decided advertising value. The offer of the Tahoe cup, however, is among the first of the attempts to give recognition to these various endeavors. The unprecedented fall of snow of this past winter is another feature that will tend to add zest to the attempt. It is said that as much as thirty feet of snow piled up in places along the road this year. The thaw, however, is progressing rapidly and in early June, it is expected, the route will open up in fine condition for regular touring.

Mr. Willis Polk, the well known architect, has taken delivery of one of the well known Hupp-Yeates coupes from Cuyler Lee, the local distributor. Mrs. Polk drives the car around San Mateo, her summer home, where it attracts considerable attention.

As an indication of the state of the automobile trade, it is interesting to learn that the sales of the Lozier Motor Company from the New York City branch, during the month of March, were the largest in the history of the Company. In view of the fact that the Lozier is one of the highest priced cars made, this unusual demand indicates not only the healthy condition of the automobile trade, but that the demand is not confined to cars of the cheaper class.

L. H. Peterson, manager of the Pacific Grove Garage and sub-agent in his territory for S. G. Chapman, was in San Francisco recently and took delivery of a Hupmobile touring car which he drove back to Pacific Grove. Peterson reports an unusual amount of automobile touring in his part of the state this spring, which has meant good business for the motor car trade. Just previous to taking his latest Hupmobile Peterson had an Abbott-Detroit shipped to himself at Pacific Grove.

The Pacific Motor Car Co. has been advised that the order placed by the De Laval Separator Co. of New York for Cole 30 runabouts has been raised from 20 to 50 machines with indications that 300 will eventually be taken. The De Laval firm, which is the largest of its kind in the country, will use the cars for its traveling salesmen throughout all the Eastern and middle Western states. This will doubtless constitute the most extensive use yet made of motor cars by any one firm.

Announcement has been made by The Thomas B. Jeffery Company, manufacturers of Rambler Motor Cars, that plans are now under way for the general extension of the nation-wide sales and service organization of this big concern into all the important provinces and cities of the Dominion of Canada.

In an effort to keep up with the demand for trucks, the directors of the Packard Motor Car Company of Detroit have authorized new construction which will practically triple the capacity of the truck shops. By distributing parts of the work to other portions of the plant the company has been able to produce three trucks a day. The increase in facilities will give the truck shops proper a normal capacity of five trucks a day, which is needed to keep up with orders at the present rate.

The Stanford Quad, 1912

Here is a book of particular interest to Stanford men but not without a certain appeal to outsiders. It is a big book of more than four hundred pages, well done mechanically and editorially, a credit to J. W. Howell, its editor and to Bernard J. O'Donnell, its business manager. In the foreword one finds a characteristic statement. "The college year," we read, "has been a singularly active one despite the fact that everyone, entertaining the slightest hope of graduation, has been bound more closely to his books by the lines of increased scholarship requirements." To the rank outsider it may appear that increased application to study is the finest proof of collegiate activity, but the view is old-fashioned; it leaves out of consideration the athletic activities which are "the" activities of a university, at least in the opinion of the majority of masculine matriculates. In a prominent position at the beginning of the volume we find a full page picture of David Starr Jordan, which is all very well. On the opposite page we find some uncomplimentary remarks about war culled by Jordan from the writings of Sophocles, Schiller, Captain Brownell, John Easten Cooke and Bartholomew Dowling. The list is topheavy and the whole thing has nothing to do with college activities. It would have been more to the point to put on that page Dr. Jordan's interesting remarks about "systematic muckerism," as the doctor so fragrantly phrased the enthusiasms of baseball. The rest of the volume it would be invidious to criticise. It is full of good pictures, the drawings showing that Stanford bids fair to produce good artists in the future as it has in the past. In the record of student activities are visible a healthy versatility and a wholesome range of interests that command admiration. In the josh section the utmost restraint is apparent; it is not wise to monkey with the buzz saw at Stanford. The fact that Bernard J. O'Donnell, the manager of this publication, became involved in a characteristic Stanford imbroglio as editor of a college paper and had to leave college before the book appeared, lends it a factitious interest. In some future edition of the Quad a list of the "G. B. R's," or "graduates by request," would be a live feature. The list contains some very eminent names. Many Stanford men call it a roll of honor.

Book Notes

In "The High Hand" Jacques Futtrelle has given us another glimpse of the reformer in politics, the honest and inexperienced man who butted into the game and through the force of his own personality and sheer audacity beat the professionals by adopting their own tactics and out-maneuvering them. To quote the hero of the story, he marked his own deck, dealt himself the high hand and swept all the stakes from the board. Mr. Futtrelle has shown how much easier it is for an honest man to be elected than it is for him to remain honest after he gets there. "The High Hand" is quite up to the average as books go in these days. Bobbs-Merrill of Indiana are its sponsors.

Brand Whitlock made a ten strike with his first novel, "The Thirteenth District." "The Turn of the Balance" has become almost the bible of the prison-reformer. "The Happy Average," and "Her Infinite Variety" one can almost class as joyously optimistic. Now comes his "Gold Brick," a collection of short stories, mostly concerning some phase of political life, which have appeared from time to time in the magazines. From the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

"Maisie's Merry Christmas" is the first of three stories and gives its name to the volume in which it appears, the other two being "Jill and Lill" and "How Reggie Saw the Sphinx." They are designed for little girls under twelve and the author, Nina Rhodes, has earned such well deserved appreciation that parents and guardians are safe in purchasing any of her stories without investigation. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard are the publishers.

A more attractive title than "Two Boys in the Tropics" might have been selected for Mrs. Elisa Haldeman Figyelmessy's juvenile, for it does not belong to that class of imaginary youthful adventures where over-smart lads discover gold mines and lead revolutions, nor is it stuffed with second rate "nature lore," to attract the attention of adults. Mrs. Figyelmessy lived for twelve years in British Guiana while her husband was consul there, and it is not at all unlikely that the doings of the two small boys of the fictional Francis family were the veritable exploits of children of their ages. From the Macmillan Company.

"The Singing Mouse Stories" are none the less appreciated because they are not what would be expected from the author of such books as "54-40 or Fight," "The Law of the Land" or "The Mississippi Bubble." They are hardly stories in the accepted sense of the word, but rather reflections and fragmentary reminiscences such as come to lonely folk of middle age whose glances are more often into the past than into the future, whose memories outweigh their anticipations. Author, publisher and illustrator have worked in harmony to make "The Singing Mouse Stories" a truly desirable volume. From the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

The Standard Oil Decision

In line with the cultivated disposition of the times to find fault with everything that results from the orderly processes of the institutions of our government there is much adverse criticism of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Standard Oil case. And according to the common practice of the times the authority for much of this criticism is the voice of the minority. We profess to venerate the opinion of the majority, to regard it as infallible, but whenever the opinion of the minority supports the general principle of dissatisfaction with the existing order of things the opinion of the majority is pronounced reactionary and anathema. Thus we find that the dissenting views of Justice Harlan in the Standard Oil case are regarded as sentiments of the utmost significance and importance, justifying the assumption that his associates have deliberately exceeded their power by amending an act of Congress. This notion is fostered by all the rampant demagogues who are eager to promote distrust and suspicion. According to their view Justice Harlan is the only sensible man on the bench, the one jurist who walks with God, whose dogmatic dicta must be accepted as final. Justice Harlan says that the Sherman Act must be interpreted literally, and because it has not been interpreted literally we are told that we must conclude that the Supreme Court has afflicted us with that fightful bugbear, judge-made law. Now what does the Supreme Court say? It says that the character of the acts which must be considered in restraint of trade under the Sherman Act is not described or defined. "It is obvious therefore," the court says, "that judgment must be called into play in every case to determine whether a particular act is embraced within the statutory classes, and whether if the act is within such classes its nature or effect causes it to be a restraint of trade within the intendment of the Statute." In other words as the act does not specifically enumerate everything that must be considered in restraint of trade it devolves on the court to inquire into the character of every act that is charged to be a violation of the law made by Congress. "To hold to the contrary," says the court, "would require the conclusion that every contract, act or combination of any kind or nature whether it operated in restraint of trade or not was within the statute." Now it was certainly not the intention of the Congress to prohibit every kind of combination. We know that our most radical, pupilistic statesmen have said time and again that there are bad combinations and good combinations and that it was desirable to abolish the bad and encourage the good. Who is to differentiate the bad from the good? Certainly the Congress is not to resolve itself into a high court to determine what particular combination is tolerable and what is not. Congress can do no more than make generic enumeration of acts that are contrary to public policy, and that is all that it has done. If it had done more as the Supreme Court has said it would have "limited the application of the Act unduly by precise definition, but while clearly fixing a standard—that is by defining the ulterior boundaries which could not be transgressed with impunity," it left to the court the duty of applying and enforcing the public policy embodied in the statute in every given case. In performing this duty the court must be guided by principles of law as it was in the Standard Oil case with the result that the Rockefeller combination was found to be illegal being a combination such as the Congress deemed bad because in unreasonable restraint of trade. Justice Harlan may think this a heterodox view of the matter, but Justice Harlan is not infallible. It is evident, however, that he is a very stout dogmatist, as much distinguished for opinionativeness as for his learning. The average dogmatist, as some one has said, thinks that his opinions are written in sunbeams and is always furious that his neighbors do not see them in his light.

The Mexican Revolution

The revolution in Mexico is distinctly a go-as-you-please affair. It has no tail, no head, no unity of purpose or of action. The spirit of it is anarchical rather than patriotic. Provisional President Madero is nominally the director-general of the revolution, but in several States there are insurrectos fighting at their own pleasure and not in deference to his orders. During the truce at Juarez fighting was reported in several districts where, apparently, nobody cared a tinker's imprecation what Madero was doing or intended to do. Madero's authority is limited to his immediate neighborhood, and even there it is far from respected, as is evident from the mutinous conduct of some of his officers. Mexico is really in a state of anarchy, which is confined, however, to States in which there is comparatively very little of civilization. The only important city that has faced anything like a crisis is Mazatlan, one of the chief ports of the Pacific. The fighting in Chihuahua has not threatened the security of the Government, and no battle in that State gave Diaz any uneasiness. If upheavals should occur in Vera Cruz, Guanajuata, Pueblo or Jalisco then there would be real anxiety in the War Department. Most of the fighting thus far has been conducted by banditti who have always been numerous in Mexico. There was a time in that country when the brigand's life was the only life for a gentleman and when the brigand chiefs were the aristocracy of the country, the one class that dominated and disciplined the masses. Diaz employed them as the instruments of his rule, and with their aid brought order out of chaos. The men who are now fighting him are the descendants of the banditti who were formerly loyal to the brigand Governors appointed by him to rule over the several States. Those Governors having passed away there is left very little of the loyalty that enabled Diaz to make modern Mexico, but on the other hand there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with his methods of developing the resources of the country.

Arbitration Cant

President Taft, practical man that he is, indisposed to glut himself with visionary luxuries or to let the mood optimistic tyrannize over common sense, is not giving much encouragement to the unctuous preachers of universal peace. He perceives that there is much cant in their gospel, much factitious enthusiasm behind their propaganda. So he admonishes us not to expect too much from an arbitration treaty between this country and Great Britain. It will not put an end to war; nor is universal peace to be perpetuated by the monarchs of the financial world. "We must realize," he says, "that we are dealing with a world that is fallible and full of weakness, and that the reforms that are worth having are brought about little by little and not by one blow." In his judgment we are likely to make more progress if we express our hopes with moderation "than if we proclaim that we have opened the gate to eternal peace with one key." Doubtless the President has been nauseated by the claptrap of the pedantic and other reformers who have been getting a lot of cheap notoriety out of their ostentatious zeal for universal disarmament. There is more humbug than sincerity among the peace propagandists. The agitation for arbitration is not to be discouraged, but as a dignified English writer has said, "Even Christianity suffers from advocacy by cant," and it is evident enough that the gospel of arbitration is being smeared with the slime of hypocrisy and the nastiness of newspaper enterprise. The virtue of the principle of arbitration is everywhere acknowledged, but even though it be adopted by Great Britain and the United States, even though it be agreed to submit every difference of every description, including the question of honor, to arbitration, the possibility of war between the two countries will not be extinguished. By the way, Disraeli once said that there were worse things than war, and the idea is still prevalent among intelligent men. War keeps patriotism alive and stimulates national enthusiasm. There are times when nothing short of war can distract men's minds from preoccupations that are worse than war.

An American Prize Opera

Whether we can boast an American musician capable of composing an opera worthy of production and admiration is a question which may shortly be answered. Some time ago the directors of the Metropolitan Opera House offered a prize for an opera by an American musician. The prize was large enough to tempt the best musicians in the country, and it has been won by Horatio Parker, a man of world-wide reputation among connoisseurs of music,—a scholar whose accomplishments in the lyric art have won for him the recognition and esteem of the leading critics and composers in the European centres of culture. The news that the prize has been awarded to him will awaken the interest of students of music the world over, and there is even now much curiosity regarding the merits of his opera. A point to be noted in this connection is that Parker is almost unknown to the American public. This of course is because his name has never been associated with anything in the musical art that was not dignified and genuine. Our most celebrated composers are the prolific geniuses whose songs have made our musical comedy stars famous.

Progressive Oklahoma

Oklahoma, the fountain-head of culture sweetness and light to which all progressive statesmen turn for inspiration, affords the best object lesson in the philosophy of the initiative, referendum and recall to be found in this country. The people of Oklahoma have had nearly four years' experience of the new democracy, and now they are in retrospective mood, taking stock, as it were, and striking a trial balance, and they are not at all elated over the showing. To the editor of an Oklahoma journal, the Enid Events, we are indebted for a luminous summing up. He says "the initiative, referendum and recall are so unwieldy that their effectiveness is destroyed except as they are used by political or other firmly established organizations backed by plenty of money." After recounting several practical tests of what are now known as "the last best gifts of heaven to man," he makes this broad, discouraging assertion: "As a matter of fact the initiative, referendum and recall are practically the implements of the party in power, and can only be used by outsiders with difficulty." The editor of Enid Events talks like an unregenerate pessimist. He does not realize that the initiative, referendum and recall are bridges along the great boulevard of progressive politics that leads to the millennium. All the ditches have not yet been spanned. More bridges are to be built as soon as the people's engineers determine where they are to be constructed and of what material.

Another Conspiracy

The home friends and admirers of "Joe" Folk are bewailing the mutinous accidents of fate by which their hero, the renowned prosecutor of St. Louis, is gradually being forced into the background. To give ear to their laments is to plunge into a well of tears and extinguish utterly the lamp of hope. There is dejection in their every observation touching the political outlook. The sum and substance of their tale of woe is that a conspiracy has been formed to put Joe out of the running. The sad ones caught sight of the cloven hoof of the malign genius of this conspiracy when the tentative boom of the Hon. Beauchamp Clark was launched. In their judgment Clark is merely serving the sinister purposes of strategy, playing the part of a dragchain on the Folk chariot. With Clark in a receptive mood giving rein to ambition Missouri, even though it were disposed to unite behind Folk, cannot do so. The supposition is that the political leaders who profess to regard the lusty Speaker of the House as an available, potential standard-bearer, are in reality paving the way for Woodrow Wilson. Of course the truth is that beyond the borders of Missouri Joe Folk is nowhere regarded as a figure of national proportions. Here and there where there have been graft prosecutions he has a few sympathizers; as, for example in this city which he embraced in his itinerary on his recent hunting trip for the big game that will be rounded up in a convention next year; but the mass of the people have forgotten all about the man who prosecuted the grafters in St. Louis, while few of those from whose memory he has not faded have the slightest inkling as to any qualifications he may have for the Big Job. Yet Joe Folk measures up to the type of statesman whose star is now in the ascendant. The title to greatness these days is to be acquired by flouting the wicked and flattering the mob. So if Joe has it not it is because he has failed to keep himself in the limelight, which is in itself a feat requiring a certain order of ability. But the truth is that with his unfailing adherence to the good and the true he is a statesman whose moral worth and invincible willingness to serve the people whenever they ask him really entitle him to the most serious consideration.

The Genesis of Insurgency

Ray Stannard Baker, a philosopher of magazinedom, has written the history of the insurgent movement. From him we learn that the symptoms of it first appeared with the Greenback party thirty years ago and that after the statesmen of that party strutted their brief hour on the political stage came the wild-eyed Populists with their demands for the regulation of interstate commerce, a graduated income tax and more direct power of the people over their government. Then in the course of political evolution were generated the Progressivists who, as Mr. Baker truthfully observes, are making demands which would have shocked even the most radical of their prototypes of other days. But of the significance of this circumstance Mr. Baker is insensible. He regards the evolution of our politics as nothing more than the march of truth, that sublimest of all things, which comes with slow and doubtful step and adapts itself to the wily sinuosities of worldly affairs. Mr. Baker accepts the fundamental principle of insurgency as the truth because it is nothing more nor less than belief in the people,—confidence in democratic government. This to us is the incomprehensible thing about insurgency if we accept it as sincere, because if there is one thing in this world about which we may be more certain than anything else it is the folly of faith in the people, the absurdity of democratic government. Apparently the philosophers of the Baker school are unaware of the fact that truth is more a matter of experience than speculation. They have yet to learn that there is no progress in fundamental truth. We grow in the knowledge of its meaning and in the modes of its application, but whatever is fundamental is fixed and unalterable. Now there is a truth regarding democracy that may be accepted as fundamental, and it is this,—that democratic government has never been and can never be, unless we alter the scheme of creation, anything but government by the ignorant and unintelligent. This is as simple of demonstration as any problem in arithmetic. It is because this is so that as Sir Henry Maine says: "Of all forms of government democracy is by far the most difficult." He adds, "Little as the governing multitude is conscious of this difficulty, prone as the masses are to aggravate it by their avidity for taking more and more powers into their direct management, it is a fact which experience has placed beyond all dispute. It is the difficulty of democratic government that mainly accounts for its ephemeral character." Here we have stated a fundamental truth. Sir Henry Maine says it is established beyond all dispute, but of course he means that it is conceded by every great authority in the literature of political science from Plato to Lecky. But the fact is it is disputed by the new itinerant school of American statesmanship that sheds lustre on the Chautauqua circuit. Indeed the statesmen of this school stand for a proposition in flat contradiction of the principle which from experience has become a truism. No argument have they to present in support of the proposition that direct is preferable to representative government; no proof do they adduce from history; no speculative inquiry do they indulge in; but their case they rest on the bald dictum that whatever is wrong in our government can be remedied by vesting more power in the people. It is not even to be said that the elective franchise is in better hands than it was in when democracy was young; for as a matter of fact in ancient and even in modern democracies there were limitations on suffrage. So this is the incomprehensible thing about the progressivist movement,—that it postulates of all its devices something that can neither be demostrated nor plausibly maintained by sophistry; something that is quite as freakish as the Greenback party appeared to be before yellow journalism wrought its magic spell on the public mind.

Dr. Owen says that Bacon murdered Shakespeare. And yet Bacon was not an actor.

Governor Wilson came and saw and conquered. He is really a spellbinder.

The situation of affairs in the royal family of Great Britain embodies an historic realization of the venerable mother-in-law joke.

It is gratifying to find that both sides won when the Supreme Court handed down its decision in the controversy between the Buck Stove Company and the American Federation of Labor. But part of this gratification may dwindle when A. F. of L. reads the decision more closely.

Governor Wilson was scheduled to give a bag-punching exhibition, but it turned out to be a boxing match

It was indeed mixed company that Woodrow Wilson addressed at the banquet. It looked like a reconciliation party.

The Governor of New Jersey and the Governor of California were unavoidably prevented from meeting. But the Governor of California was unavoidably prevented first.

Congressman Kent of Kentfield has achieved distinction. The New York Sun says "He's an amoosin little cus."

Fifty Presbyterian ministers propose to abolish the social evil for one year. When this news reached Hades Sathanas chuckled and Beelzebub winked the other eye.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller has the hearty assurance of the sympathy of the Bible class, the Chicago University and the Baptist Church.

"We don't care anything about patronage," says Meyer Lissner, "but we want every servant of the Southern Pacific turned out of the Federal service." It is to be hoped, of course, that as each member of the Federal brigade walks the plank Mr. Lissner will be good enough to suggest the right kind of man for the vacancy.

Correspondence

A Battle Piece

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Perhaps "Hibernian" would like to add to his collection "The Battle of Dundee." It was written by a St. Louis newspaperman to commemorate a battle fought during the Boer War. The Irish Transvaal Brigade (Boer) captured several hundred prisoners of the Royal Irish Fusiliers, "British."

Yours truly,

—John Linden.

P. S.—This is the jingle:

"The Battle of Dundee"

On the mountain side the battle raged; there was no stop nor stay;
Mackin captured Private Burke and Ensign Michael Shea;
Fitzgerald got Fitzpatrick; Brannigan found O'Rourke;
Finnigan took a man named Fay, and a couple of lads from Cork;
Suddenly they heard McManus shout, "Hands up or I'll run you through—"
He thought he had a Yorkshire tyke—'twas Corporal Donohue!
McGarry took O'Leary; O'Brien got McNamee—
That's how "The English fought the Dutch" at the Battle of Dundee.

Then someone brought in Casey; O'Connell took O'Neil;
Riley captured Cavanaugh while trying to make a steal.
Hogan caught McFadden; Corrigan found McBride,
And Brennan made a handsome touch when Kelly tried to slide.
Dacey took a lad named Walsh; Dooley got McQuirk;
Gilligan turned in Fahey's boy—for his father he used to work.
They had marched to fight the English, but Irish were all they could see—
That's how "the English fought the Dutch" at the Battle of Dundee.

Spillane then took Madigan; Shannahan took McGee.
While chasing Jerry Donovan Clancy got shot in the knee.
He cursed the Queen's whole army, he cursed the British race,
Then found the man that fired the shot—'twas his cousin, Martin Grace.
Then McGinnis caught an A. O. H. who came from Limerick town.
And Sullivan got an Orangeman from somewhere in County Down.
Hennessy took O'Harra—Hannigan took McPhee—
That's how "the English fought the Dutch" at the Battle of Dundee.

The sun was sinking slowly; the battle rolled along;
The man that Murphy "handed in" was a cousin of Maud Gonne.
Then Flannigan dropped his rifle, shook hands with Bill McGuire,
For both had carried a piece of turf to light the same schoolhouse fire.
Then Rafferty took in Flaherty; O'Connell got Major McCue,
O'Keefe got hold of Sergeant Joyce and a Belfast lad or two.
Some swore that "Old man Kruger" had come down to see the fun.
But the man they thought was "Uncle Paul" was a Galway man named Dunn.
Though war may have worse horrors, 'twas a frightful sight to see
The way "the English fought the Dutch" at the Battle of Dundee.

Just when the sound of firing in the distance fainter grew,
Ryan caught McCloskey, and Orderly Donegon, too.
O'Toole, he found McCarthy; O'Mahoney got Malone;
Duffy got a pair of lads from Connaught, near Athlone.
Then Dineen took O'Hagan; Phelan got Kehoe;
Dempsey captured Callaghan but Gallagher let him go.
You'd have thought the "Belfast Chicken" had tackled the "Dublin Flea,"
The way "the English fought the Dutch" at the Battle of Dundee.

Then Powers began to intervene—the Waterford Powers, I mean,
And took a lad named Keenan and a captain named Mulqueen.
Brady captured Noonan; Maher got McAdoo;
McGovern got O'Hanlon and Colonel McLaughlin, too.
'Twas near the hour of sunset, the battle was almost o'er
When McCormick came in with Hoolan and Lieutenant Roger O'Moore,
But 'twas a great day for Ireland, as you can easily see;
That's how "the English fought the Dutch" at the Battle of Dundee.
They marched them all to Kruger's town for supper and a bed.
O'Halloran was the rear guard; the way McNulty led.
When they got them to the race course the Boers were full of glee,
While Kruger never expected "so many English to see."
They told him they were Irish—it puzzled the old man's head,
For the Irish he'd seen were dressed in green, while these were togged in red,
But 'tis a passing story; on history's page you'll see
That 'twas "the English fought the Dutch" at the Battle of Dundee.

Is He a Cynic?

Editor Town Talk: Reading a newspaper account of the Rev. Charles Aked's baccalaureate sermon to the senior students of California University I find that he told the story of the Frenchman who when asked by a man about to start a new religion how to make it popular, replied: "You might allow yourself to be crucified." Dr. Aked added: "It was the hanging of Jesus Christ upon a cross that made the little hill of Calvary the greatest mountain in the world." I suppose this is in line with the sentiment that the blood of the early Christian martyrs was the seed of Christianity. But doesn't it jar on you to hear that a minister of the Christian religion quoted in a sermon the cynical suggestion that any person desirous of founding a new religion might make it popular by having himself crucified, thus implying that it is not by the principles but by one spectacular circumstance that we must account for the spread of Christianity and its hold on the mind and heart of mankind? It occurs to me that Dr. Aked who transfers himself from one sect to another with amazing facility is himself somewhat of a cynic in religion. Greater men than Dr. Aked have told us that Christianity won its way by its benevolent morality, by its system of truths, by its new order of ideas. They have told us that it "proves itself as the sun is seen by its own light; that its evidence is involved in its own existence."

Yours truly,

—A Christian

Varied Types

XXII—HARRY CHANDLER

By Edward F. O'Day

"Where did I put that letter? I had it only a few minutes ago. It was signed by the Black Hand and said that I was going to be blown up."

And Harry Chandler smiled. He is nearly always smiling. A smile is as native to his face as a military frown to that of his associate, General Harrison Grey Otis. At this particular moment, while he rummaged among multifarious papers and letters drawn by the handful from various pockets, his smile was engagingly good humored. It was as though threats of blowing up were the commonest, the emptiest things in the world. Had you not known of the fearful loss of life and property that came to the Los Angeles Times a short while ago, you might have thought that Chandler's smile bespoke the absurdity of all such threats. Knowing what had happened you might be inclined to criticise Chandler for smiling; you might have drawn an inference of callousness in the man who could treat such things lightly. But you would be wrong. The Chandler smile is not a reproach to the Chandler heart. There is no callousness there. It is simply that Chandler is by nature averse from pulling grave faces and has lived so long in the midst of danger that he has learned, not bravado but equanimity, not temerity but coolness. He smiles at threats, but he does not laugh at them.

This general manager of the Los Angeles Times has a magnetic personality. He is a big man in every way; heavy, broad-shouldered, strong in body. Strong too in mind, or there is no truth in physiognomy. The smiling eyes, the smiling mouth tell of determination and power. The careless movements are instinct with reserve force. The husky voice, one conjectures, could be let out with roaring vehemence, once this easygoing man was aroused. It is not hard to understand why General Otis took him up and made his fortune for him. A born fighter, like the General, he is unlike him in nearly every other respect. They make a great team.

Chandler did not find that letter. Evidently he pays little attention to that branch of his correspondence, though it must be large.

"I get one or two a day," he remarked.

But he can be methodical where method is important. He pointed to a dozen bundles of press clippings, tabulated and ranged with precision on his desk. They were editorial comments on the dynamite case and the arrest of the three suspects. He told me that he would go through them all; that he had been going through similar bundles since the case started. Which means that better than any other editor in the country he knows the condition of popular opinion on the subject. Of course he has his finger on the pulse of Los Angeles.

"Right after the explosion," he said, "the union labor men who had been on the fence with regard to the Times cast their lot with the unions. So did some men who were not union labor men. The rival papers helped to fool the people. But since the arrests were made and the evidence came out there has been a tremendous change. We have gained many sympathisers among people who were unbelievers before.

"As to the condition of public opinion in Los Angeles, I wouldn't say that it is wrought up. There is a determined feeling that the arrested men get a fair trial; that justice be done. But there is no excitement; no violence; no mob feeling; nothing to prevent the men from getting a fair trial.

"There is no such popular excitement as there was in San Francisco during the graft trials. Perhaps it is a difference of newspapers. In San Francisco the newspapers seem to think that they must do the popular thing instead of the right thing. The Hearst papers are typical of this attitude.

"When the Los Angeles Examiner was started by Hearst at the solicitation of the labor unions, it was announced editorially that the new paper would accept no advertising that was boycotted by the unions on account of its being published in the Times. The result was that the Los Angeles Examiner starved for a couple of years. But as the managers of the paper were changed from time to time it was finally discovered that no progress could be made by combatting the right sentiment of the community and the Examiner took those ads.—was glad to get them. Since the suspects were caught the Examiner in Los Angeles has printed more sensational and more exciting things against the dynamiters than the Times has. But the Examiner in San Francisco takes the other tack. In other words the Hearst papers in any community go where the business is. Mr. Hearst knows on which side his bread is buttered."

HARRY CHANDLER

"Is unionism gaining in Los Angeles?" I asked.

"The unions are making herculean efforts," he replied; "but they are not succeeding. They are spending enormous sums. In the last labor parade it was particularly remarked what a lot of women were in line. But it turned out that only one in ten belonged to a union. They paid women five dollars apiece to walk in that parade and help make a showing. That's the way the money's going.

"And still they're asking for funds. It has been announced that if enough money is forthcoming the Appeal to Reason which is socialistic and anarchistic will be sent to every citizen of the State during the trial of the dynamite suspects. The last copy of the Appeal to Reason which I saw stated that it would probably be impossible to save the arrested men from conviction on account of the trumped-up evidence, but it added that if labor unionists would see to it that a Supreme Court favorable to union labor was elected, they could be saved in the higher court later on."

"Has Los Angeles anything to tell San Francisco about the labor unions?" I asked.

Harry Chandler smiled at the question, but his answer was unexpectedly conservative.

"It would be more or less offensive for us to try to tell San Francisco anything," he said; "but certainly San Francisco ought to take a hunch from Los Angeles. I believe that the large percentage of union labor men are honest and conscientious. That being the case it is hard to understand how they can back up rascals and advocates of violence. If this case opens the eyes of the honest men in the unions it will be a benefit to the whole of California, to the whole of the country."

That is not the way the ordinary individual would expect a Times man to talk. It is not the way union labor leaders represent the Times men as talking or thinking. But there can be no doubt about the sincerity of the utterance. It is interesting, by the way, to note that a question concerning the whole of San Francisco was answered by Chandler in exactly the way it would be answered if the whole of San Francisco were union labor or sympathetic with union labor. Noticing this and realizing that in San Francisco there is a large element opposed to unionism, I asked:

"Do you think a daily paper advocating the open shop and telling the whole truth about labor troubles would go in San Francisco?"

Chandler had evidently thought a good deal on that subject, for he was ready with his answer.

"Our fight for the open shop," he said, "was forced on us in 1890. It was brought on by editors who were greener than General Otis. Otis had been a printer and a member of the union. He knew the printers' strength and so when they demanded an increase of pay and an agreement with the employers, he was reluctant to start trouble. The printers walked out. The papers which had started the trouble capitulated, leaving the Times to fight the battle. It was a hard fight and for a long time the grass was very short for the Times. They scared, begged, intimidated our advertisers. But later on the business men learned that they were bluffing, that the boycott was a bogeyman. They saw too that the Times was consistent. So we got the support of the business interests and we grew and grew. Now we publish the biggest paper in the country. Last Sunday we published more advertising matter than the three San Francisco morning papers put together."

I waited for him to draw the moral from this summing up.

"It took the Times ten years of everlasting hammering to create a sentiment among the average citizens and to make its business prosperous. It would probably take the same time in San Francisco. It wouldn't be a matter of days or months or a year. Very likely it couldn't be done in five years. You see it takes a long time to put poison into the minds of people and it takes a long time to get the poison out. But in the end the San Francisco editor who tried it would find it worth while."

Where is the San Francisco editor who wants to make the experiment. Please don't all speak at once!

By Robert McTavish

The Secret of the Confessional

A case has been started before the Roman courts which has no precedent in the relations between Church and State since the fall of the temporal power, and is a new episode in the struggle which goes on continually between the American Methodists and the Vatican. Last month a sensational story appeared in the papers. A priest of Rome, Father Gustavo Verdesi, suddenly declared that he could no longer remain in the Church after the violation of the secret of the confessional committed by Father Bricarelli, a Jesuit, who, he said, had revealed what the former had told him under the seal of the confessional. Father Verdesi stated that in confession he had told the Jesuit that he had frequented some meetings of Modernists, for which he asked pardon. Father Bricarelli, using strong pressure and moral threats, urged Father Verdesi to give the names of other ecclesiastics who were present at the meetings. Verdesi at first refused; but later, on Bricarelli showing him an order from the Pope to mention other Modernists, and promising that the whole affair would be kept secret, he gave way and mentioned five of his best friends and companions, who, shortly afterward, were all deprived of their positions and punished; some even were sent away from Rome. Verdesi ended his revelations by saying that this fact and the injury he had done his friends, while he thought he was accomplishing a conscientious duty, revolted him so much that he could not remain a day longer in a Church which allowed such enormities, and he found assistance in the ever-open doors of the American Methodists. Father Bricarelli, instead of appealing to an ecclesiastical tribunal, has protested most energetically against the assertions of Father Verdesi, and has started against him before the Italian courts a suit for libel and calumny, asking the judge fully to investigate the case in order to collect evidence proving the absolute groundlessness of Verdesi's statements and to condemn him according to Italian law. Whatever the result of the case, its importance lies in this new departure of the Church in allowing Bricarelli to go before the civil courts of Italy on a purely internal dispute. There is no doubt that the Jesuit Father, before starting his suit, asked and obtained the permission of the Pope to do so.

A Japanese Revelation

Some astonishing revelations concerning the Japanese Army during the period of Japan's conflict with Russia have just come to light. In the first place, the army was much weaker numerically than had been supposed, the total number under arms during the entire war being less than a million, while the average strength was only 350,000, although the impression had been permitted to get abroad that the average strength was somewhere in the neighborhood of 800,000. Again, during the actual progress of the war and after its close reports were spread broadcast that the Japanese had become so proficient in the art and science of medicine that disease had been practically eliminated. Now, however, it becomes known that the percentage of deaths from disease was as great as in the Spanish-American war, although the Russo-Japanese campaigns were carried on in a more northerly and consequently healthier climate. This information should go a long way toward revolutionizing popular sentiment which condemned the so-called unnecessary waste of life in the Spanish-American war, and lauded the Japanese for their skill in conserving the lives of their soldiery.

Is the Opium Traffic Passing?

A new agreement for the restriction of the Chinese opium trade seems to have been arrived at between the Celestial Empire and India. According to the London Times correspondent in Peking, this will lead to the extinction of the trade within a short time. There is room for this optimistic viewpoint, owing to the attitude of the Chinese Government toward opium, but the Indian Government is the great stumbling block to the eradication of the evil. The Indian Government is consistently opposed to the suppression of the opium trade and for purely selfish reasons. The Chinese Government, on the other hand, has actually done more than make good its promises of lessening the production and exportation. With the assistance of India, it is estimated, China could put a stop to the trade in two years. Her loss of revenue would be very great. But her sincerity cannot be questioned.

Cigarettes for Women

Those who pretend to know are of the opinion that the estimate furnished recently by one of the largest cigarette manufacturing establishments in the country that 95,000 New York women are addicted to the use of the weed is too conservative. Of late years the habit has been growing tremendously with not only the so-called "smart" women of the city but those without society's golden gate. The steady increase in the number of women who go abroad yearly and visit Paris and other continental cities where cigarette smoking by woman is regarded as an indispensable part of the daily regime, is believed to be responsible for the popularity of the "coffin nail" in the metropolis. One woman who has thus acquired the habit abroad encourages others at home to believe that there is nothing offensive in it. While it has been generally conceded that cigarette smoking by the fairer proportion of Gotham's population is enlisting new recruits every day, some surprise was occasioned by the announcement by the manufacturing concern in question that out of the total of 637,000,000 cigarettes sold last year in the United States, fully 8,500,000 were consumed by women. Chicago, next to New York, is the best customer. San Francisco is not high up in the list. In the widespread use of the cigarette by women, it is said the United States is following the present day trend of not only France, but England, Germany and Austria.

American Bonds in Berlin

Another crusade against the introduction of American securities into the German market has been launched in connection with the project to list $4,000,000 4 per cent. first mortgage gold bonds of the Southern Pacific & San Francisco Terminal Railway on the Berlin Stock Exchange. The flotation is proposed jointly by three of the strongest banks in the country. Opposition to the project, as in the case of the wrecked negotiations for the listing of $2,000,000 worth of Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway shares, is led by the anti-American agrarian press, notably the Deutsche Tages-Zeitung, which declares that "the sooner notification is given from the proper quarters that the Southern Pacific bonds may not be listed in Berlin the better it will be for the general situation and for German economic conditions." Herr Dernburg's vigorous plea for a broader-gage view of the foreign securities has brought a torrent of abuse down upon the head of the ex-Colonial Secretary from the chronic anti-American elements.

And Still Germany Is Sore

Of the $200,000,000 spent by Americans in Europe last year only $25,000,000, it is estimated, fell to the share of Germany. Wherefore the Germans are complaining bitterly that wealthy Americans persist in visiting England and France and seldom go to Germany. For three years past Berliners have been doing their utmost to attract tourists, but with a comparatively small degree of success. It is complained that even Americans who patronize the two great German transatlantic lines nearly always disembark at a French or an English port and do not even get as far as Hamburg or Bremen. This year, with the coronation as a huge attraction, Germans have given up hopes of holding their own, but next year a big effort will be made to secure a fair share of the globe trotters' dollars.

"What Monte Cristo Missed"

Under this editorial heading the San Bernardino Sun reviews the figures for the season's citrus crop. Its comment is arresting. Monte Cristo, it says, "ought to have been an orange grower. Perhaps as an individual the orchardist is not yet a Croesus, but the figures on the aggregate crop are almost dizzying. The citrus crop for the season will be 16,000 cars more than last year. The gross value of the crop is conservatively estimated to be over $43,000,000, as compared with about $29,000,000 for last season. That crop, f. o. b. California, that is, with the freight and icing charges paid, is estimated to be worth about $28,000,000 to the growers and packers, as compared with about $20,000,000 for the former season. In other words, the California growers and packers get about $8,000,000 more net than they did last year. And of that increase, at least $2,000,000 comes to this county. And if insurging Representative Warburton can be kept on the reservation, and his free orange and lemon bill put on ice, next year may do still better by us. For the crop increases annually."

The Linden Tree

By Heinrich Seidel (From the German)

A long time ago I stayed for some years in a small town where lived an old man who had been a college friend of my father's. I went constantly to his house and was treated with the greatest kindness.

Doctor Lindow was a handsome, jolly man of sixty, a great lover of nature and an enthusiastic gardener. He raised fine flowers and fruit, and his garden, facing the south and sloping down in terraces to a tiny lake, was in summer a veritable cornucopia of delicious things. It seemed to me simply miraculous what a comparatively small portion of ground could be made to produce by intelligent and judicious use of space. At the end of the garden, on a slight elevation, stood a fine arbor of lindens overlooking the peaceful lake, which was encircled by reeds and willows, and there I sat one beautiful August evening in animated conversation with the old gentleman, who was especially lively on this occasion. Before us on the table stood a huge dish, filled with delicious peaches, greengages and apricots, in the glasses gleamed an excellent brand of Rhine wine, and around us, through the stillness of the evening, echoed the merry voices of playing children, the grandchildren of my host.

Among these was a twelve-year-old boy, who distinguished himself by remarkable agility. Suddenly we heard his voice from the top of a tree which stretched its branches horizontally toward the shores of the lake.

"Grandfather!" cried the boy. "Watch how well I can do it now!"

With that he slid along one of the horizontal branches and hung suddenly by the knees from it, head downwards. To my horror he then let loose, adroitly seizing, however, the branch beneath, so that in falling his body turned and his head was again uppermost. And so, from branch to branch, sliding and plunging, always breaking his fall by repeated, well-timed grasping of the branches, he safely reached the bottom.

"Well done, my son!" cried Herr Lindow. "Come here a minute!"

After he had bountifully rewarded the lad with fruit he turned to me and said:

"That is an old family feat, taught to me by my father, and highly thought of because of the great service it once did me."

"What sort of service was this"? I asked astonished.

The doctor leaned back in his garden-chair and looked thoughtfully before him, like one who is arranging the facts of a story in his head, and then said:

"You know that as a student I was sentenced to ten years imprisonment in a fortress?"

"Oh, yes!" I replied; "at the same time Fritz Reuter was sentenced for the same reason."

"Exactly," continued Lindow, "only I was more fortunate than Reuter in one respect, as I was allowed to serve my term in the only little fortress of my native country, where I was comparatively well off. Properly speaking, this was really no longer a fortess, for the outworks had long since been demolished and all that was left was a citadel standing on a precipitous rock and used as a prison. There I had quite a comfortable room with, to be sure, a heavy iron-bound door and a strongly barred window cut deep into the thick wall. I was the only prisoner there, for the little principality had produced no more such political criminals, and I was allowed during the day a good deal of liberty, though at night I was carefully locked in. How, then, could I escape, since the rock had on three sides a steep fall of about a hundred feet, while the fourth, to which a winding road led, was sufficiently guarded by walls and strong gates with sentinels before them.

"I could not complain of lack of view for the rock was a last spur of the mountain chain dimly seen on the horizon and was the only appreciable elevation in a softly rolling plain. But probably nothing is more likely to intensify the longing for freedom than the continual unrestricted sight of it. This longing grew almost to a physical pain when on lovely Sunday afternoons in summer the people of the little town swarmed out on the different roads as from an ant-hill; when carriages and light-footed pedestrians cheerfully made their way along the road toward the hazy blue mountains; when the flags waved from the ruins outside the gates, while the colored dresses and light hats of the girls gleamed through the foliage and every now and then I could hear a muffled drum-beat or some other musical sounds, or the constant rolling of ninepin balls. Then would come fluttering up light-winged butterflies, resting a little on the sunny turf of the ramparts and then resuming their care-free, untrammeled way. The swallows, chasing each other around the old walls of the citadel, would dart close by me and cry, as if in mockery: 'Come with us, come with us!'

"One Sunday when this was all repeated it became too much for me and I betook myself to the other side, where I was rid of the sight of the town and all its merry doings. Here one side of the rock was washed by the river and beyond this stretched a wide heath. At my feet, however, in the angle made by the approaching river and the rock, was a large garden which belonged to the country-house of a well-to-do manufacturer. Like a map it lay there beneath me, with its neat paths, grass-plots and clusters of shrubs, but it was almost as desolate as a map, for, except an old gardener and his equally old wife, I had never seen a human being there.

"As I now sat there, my legs dangling over the edge of the rock, looked alternately at the neat green solitude at my feet and then away across the river over the monstrous heath, there occurred to me all at once a thought which intoxicated my brain to such an extent that I leaned back, clutching wildly at the grass, in the fear of becoming giddy and suddenly falling over. In the corner of the garden there stood an ancient linden-tree, so near to the rock as almost to touch it with its branches. Its enormous green dome was exactly beneath me, a distance of not more than twenty feet. Queer that I had never noticed this before! If I once sprang into it, the rest would be easy! Moreover there was no danger, for the elastic branches, thickly covered with foliage, would receive me gently and break the fall, and then, how often as a boy had I intentionally allowed myself to fall thus from branch to branch! That was a feat that looked more dangerous than it really was and it had often won me the applause of astonished spectators. If I carried that out here, I could be down below in a few seconds. And then I should be free!

"But for how long? I was without means, for naturally, being a prisoner, I was not allowed to have much money, and although the frontier was not very far away, my flight could be successful only if a carriage and fast horses were waiting for me. Moreover I had no passport, which was absolutely necessary for crossing the frontier. Where was I to get all those things?

"Still, it was not till later, after calm consideration, that these thoughts came to me. In the meantime I was so intoxicated by the thought of how easily I could escape that I reveled in it. In case I jumped down there and allowed myself to fall from branch to branch, the only thing to fear was that there might be too great gaps between the branches, or that these might stop at a good height from the ground. Going to another part of the rock, I lay flat down and studied the linden tree from a greater distance and from the side. The tree had attained such perfection of development as is possible only in a model tree of this species; the green dome showed no gaps of any kind and the lowermost branches hung down to the very ground.

"Suddenly firm, regular steps made themselves heard and recalled me from my reverie. They were changing the guard who was on duty in this part and it seemed to me prudent to show myself, as they might otherwise have searched for me. I went quickly around behind the ramparts and appeared in another place, seemingly very much bored, seated myself on an old cannon and looked down once more upon the lively country roads.

"But in spirit I was beside my old linden tree. I stood on the edge of the rock and sought a secure place to leap from. That I found. Now for it! My blood ran cold, but it had to be. How the green foliage roared around my ears! I had jumped exactly right, the branch yielded alarmingly beneath my weight, but did not break. I did not let go until it had bent deep down to the next one, and then I slid and plunged through the cracking smaller branches, deeper and deeper, from one branch to another, and soon I was at the bottom. Now down to the river and through the shallow summer-waters to the opposite bank! Here a small pine grove hid me momentarily. But I had to push onward, onward, over open spaces where I was visible for a great distance. Still on, on, to the frontier! Perhaps, after all, no one would notice me. A fugitive should have good luck. 'Bang!' What was that? An alarm-shot from the fortress. Now begins the wild chase!

"I had so completely lost myself in these thoughts that it was rather a relief to realize that so far I was not a hunted fugitive, but was sitting quite peacefully on an old cannon, on Sunday afternoon, building castles in the air.

"From this time on I could not get rid of the idea of flight, and, as often as I could do it without attracting attention, I studied my old linden tree, till I at last knew it by heart. What a countless number of times I made that momentous spring in my imagination! At the same time I tormented myself pondering how I could procure the money and other necessaries for the flight, making one plan after another, but never coming to any decision. For everything depended on my getting letters safely out of the fortress, and I knew no one whom I could trust.

"Meanwhile the summer holidays had arrived and one day as I looked down into the usually deserted garden of the country-house, I noticed a wonderful change. The sort of woman I was

The Job Chasers

To keep peace in his political family, Governor Johnson finds, is a task that calls for much ingenuity. There is a great scramble for the loaves and the fishes on the water front, and the demand far exceeds the supply. And to complicate matters Harbor Commissioner Hale is disposed to recognize merit that has already been vindicated in service rather than to experiment with talent which has no other recommendation than political expediency. So the reformers are already at loggerheads. That stern young civic patriot, Hon. Ralph Hathorn, and that eminent, reliable and steadfast statesman, the Hon. "Dick" Welch, are almost on the point of quitting the reservation and throwing conniption fits. Hathorn is convinced that if there is such a thing as political gratitude in this wide world he will be appointed to the attorneyship of the harbor board, but the suspicion is beginning to haunt him that Arthur Elliott of the trans-bay region is slated for the job, and on some hypothesis he attributes the circumstance either to the activity or the apathy of Al. McCabe. "Dick" Welsh is of the opinion that the Administration will be guilty of indescribable folly by appointing anybody but himself to the office of chief wharfinger. Yet this folly is believed to be inevitable, for Fred. Sanborn is reported to have pronounced the alway-reliable and never-to-be-found-dodging Senator impossible. And Sanborn is said to be a power behind the throne.

Railroad Attorneys Rewarded

Two of the most significant appointments thus far made are those of Max Thelen, attorney for the railroad commission and Warren Olney Jr., attorney for the board of regents. These two lawyers were formerly associated in practice. Thelen was right-of-way attorney for the Western Pacific and Mr. Olney was also one of the attorneys for the company. Their appointment seems to bear out the assertions that were made during Governor Johnson's campaign to the effect that while he was hostile to the Southern Pacific he had no hard feeling against the Western Pacific. But of course no criticism is to be made of the appointment of these two talented lawyers. They have come into their reward having been very enthusiastic advocates of Mr. Johnson's election.

The Boor on Parade

An incident occurred at the luncheon given at the University Club in honor of Governor Woodrow Wilson by which it was shown that that eminent pedagogue, the Hon. David Starr Jordan, possesses the secret of making himself offensive as well as tedious. Seated some distance from the great schoolmaster was the venerable chief justice of the Supreme Court of the State. During the luncheon a gentleman by his side struck up a conversation with him on the Japanese question. Justice Beatty remarked that he regarded the Japanese as a menace to the State. The remark reached the capacious ears of Dr. Jordan, who, it is well known, believes that he has an estate for life in the Japanese question as a topic for discussion. This topic is to him what his bowling-green and the Widow Wadman were to My Uncle Toby. Dr. Jordan has constituted himself the universal defender of the Japanese. And so when he heard Justice Beatty's observation he blurted out in a loud voice what he probably regarded as a complete refutation of the sentiment. "Any man," said he, "who believes the Japanese are a menace to the State will be in an insane asylum within ten years." Justice Beatty calmly retorted that it was strange to find a man who would make such an argument outside the walls of a home for the feeble-minded.

Steffens and the Commonwealthers

Last Saturday the members of the Commonwealth Club listened to Sir Jabesh Windbag in the person of Mr. Lincoln Steffens, muckraker, who has made muckraking pay because the country is full of commonwealthers. I am told that Mr. Steffens made "a deep impression" on the gentlemen of the Commonwealth Club, so deep an impression on some of them that they went away saying it was one of the finest speeches they had ever heard. I have since read extracts from the speech, and I found them to be precisely what I supposed Sir Jabesh capable of uttering—cant and claptrap and nothing more. And then I reflected: The men of the Commonwealth Club unquestionably are above the average citizen in intelligence, yet the agitation of the hour is for more democracy, for a government by men who will be guided by Sir Jabesh Windbag "or what other Cagliostro, Cagliostrino, Cagliostraccio" the accidents of the times may elevate to ephemeral prominence

The Magic Vision

The theme of Mr. Steffens' discourse was "What San Francisco Should Do?" And what do you suppose he thinks this community should do for its own betterment? It should quit waging war against corrupt men and "Show them all a vision of service." That's the formula for improvement in a few words. And the enunciation of it made a great hit at the Commonwealth Club. Doubtless it contains the germ of a bright idea, but what does it mean? Is there any Commonwealther who can interpret it? "Service," I believe, is the current cant epithet of transcendental reformers. It's like the card that runs wild in a game of stud-horse poker,—it may mean anything. "Show them all a vision of service?" Well, how is the vision to be contrived? And once contrived how is it to compel imitation or emulation? Strikes me that Mr. Steffens concentrates an infinite deal of nonsense into few words. But he is not to be censured for that. When one has a small fraction of sense to propagate it's advisable to perk it into epigrammatic shape that it may prick in.

The Compelling Consciousness

Along with the "vision of service" Mr. Steffens recommended the giving of "a consciousness of the city as a whole and the rousing of the interest of every living inhabitant in the details of a scheme of the city beautiful." This, too, is somewhat recondite and cryptic, but evidently it was easy of comprehension to the brainy members of the Commonwealth Club; nay, assuredly so since it made an instantaneous hit. Mr. Steffens is strongly in favor of the "consciousness of the city beautiful as a whole" for purification purposes. It is being employed in Boston, and by 1915 Boston will invite all the world to "come and see a city with its problems solved." No question about the efficacy of the new catholicon does Mr. Steffens allow. It's guaranteed to cure the most incorrigible and stubborn cases of municipal corruption, this vision of service united with a consciousness of the city beautiful as a whole. Soberly and in deadly earnest Mr. Steffens bathed the Commonwealthers with moonshine, dosed them with grinning inanity, slavered them with cant, and they were much enthused.

Is It His Magnetism?

The only hypothesis on which I can account for the hit made by Mr. Steffens at the Commonwealth Club is that he has so much personal magnetism that what he says is of no importance. It may be that he intoxicated their senses, ravished their understanding and subjected them to so powerful a spell that they could do nothing but admire and applaud. How else am I to account for the reception that was given his utterances at the Commonwealth Club? Fancy a Steffens getting up on his hind feet and telling men in their sober senses that the bar is corrupt because even its honest members think wrong. Naturally any man whose faculties are in good working order would be inclined to ask, "How does Mr. Steffens know they think wrong? Who made him the repository of eternal truth? By what process was his judgment made final?" Reading on I find this sentiment: "The man who honestly thinks it his duty to aid the business class to the detriment of any other class, may do so with the clearest conscience but he thinks wrong." This appears to be true enough, but who is it that thinks it his duty to aid one class to the detriment of another class? Here we have an assumption for which I doubt that Mr. Steffens can find justification. It strikes me as an ordinary instance of the construction of a straw man for the usual purpose.

Dr. Aked and the Bible

Opinion as to the soundness of Dr. Aked's utterances may be divided, but there can only be one sentiment as to their suggestiveness. Whenever he opens his mouth out flies something to give us pause. That his dicta are never original makes little difference. Preachers cannot be expected to cultivate originality, even on ten thousand dollars a year. By putting new masks on the worn and wrinkled faces of century-old heresies they are sure to win newspaper notoriety which is one of the great desiderata in new-fangled pulpiteering. To regard Christianity as a system of ethics is not a new way of slurring Christian dogma. It is a way that is as ancient as Julian the Apostate and as modern as Dr. Aked. (The worthy doctor will forgive me for this juxtaposition of great names.) Centuries before Bob Ingersoll lectured the "mistakes of Moses" occupied the attention of half-baked scientists. And yet Dr. Aked slams the great old leader of the tribes with the fresh enthusiasm of Mark Twain weeping at the grave of Adam. In his baccalaureate address to the students of the University of California last Sunday, Dr. Aked quoted from Exodus: "And Moses put forth his hand and caught the serpent, and it became a rod in his hand"; commenting airily, "I am no more interested in Oriental magic than you are." All so-called miracles, it is plain, are magical; and the Indian fakir is employing the same methods of thaumaturgy as Christ and the Apostles.

The Old-Fashioned Scriptures

Dr. Aked is of that fin de siecle band who scouted the Bible as out of date. He probably does not know that the narrative of Moses stands today better verified than the narrative of any ancient historian. We are not living at the end of the nineteenth century, when the exposure of the "mistakes of Moses" was an easy road to popular favor, but at the beginning of the second decade of the twentieth century when the celebration of the tercentenary of the St. James version finds peculiar significance on account of the respectful attitude which scientists are assuming toward the historical value of the Mosaic narrative. But it is easier to flout than to dig; incomparably easier to call Moses an Oriental magician than to master the meaning of the ancient records that corroborate the Biblical accounts of his deeds. In other words, it is easier to indulge in destructive than in constructive criticism. I wish that Dr. Aked would ponder such utterances as the following which is taken from a recent article by George Holley Gilbert in the North American Review: "Whatever may be the relation of the historical criticism of the Bible to human civilization a thousand years hence, or ten thousand, it is now at the beginning of this twentieth century a relation full of vitality and instinct with hope. The services it has rendered and is rendering are enormous. It has not only saved the Bible in the day of the revelations of science, but it has justified the Bible's existence and mission to many of the foremost representatives of science itself. This will surely be held to be a distinguished service to human progress by all who believe that religion is a factor in this progress. Again, the modern method of interpretation is serving the cause of civilization by uncovering, as was never done before, the motives and ideals of that literature which of all the literatures of history is far the deepest, purest, and most inspiring. It is pouring into the channels of civilization, as from a newly discovered fountain of life, the waters that have power over the spiritual nature of man. It has made the Bible, even in this age of science, a greater magnet than it was in the days of Luther."

The Doctor on the Crusades

Dr. Aked, naturally enough, has no sympathy for the Crusades. He is not in tune with that wonderful movement of the ages of chivalry and faith. He calls the Crusades "the fashionable madness of the Middle Ages." No doubt he lists the Crusades, as Charles Mackay listed them in his volume of "Extraordinary Popular Delusions" with the Mississippi Bubble, the search for the philosopher's stone and the tulip mania. By so doing he exhibits the defects of a small mind that cannot grasp heroism when heroism is a religious motive. I would really like to hear his opinion of Joan of Arc. Meanwhile I am going to quote once again for his edification, this time from Minnie Kellogg's recently published book, "Flowers from Medieval History." She is speaking of the Children's Crusade: "A veritable allegory of the Age of Faith was presented on the great stage of history in 1212, when two enormous armies of little boys and girls started from France and Germany singing, to march to the Holy Land; if any of these children turned back, none of them seem to have found their old homes. As far as is known to history, one child alone returned as an aged pilgrim, to tell the tale,—how the bones of the children strewed the mountainside; how they had been embarked on unseaworthy vessels to be sold into slavery; how few, how very few, ever reached their goal; how few, how very few, ever remained pure and holy. Connected with this tragedy was a horrible pope and a horrible doge, but now they seem but foils to the purity of the children, it was all so long ago. And that the mystic beauty of that little legion may live lyrically in our life, the Twentieth Century has set their pathetic march to music in stately oratorio; for pure aspiration is the melody of melodies, the veritable flower of history." Does Dr. Aked see in this naught but "fashionable madness"? Perhaps his success as a fashionable preacher, as illustrated by his transcontinental trip in the palatial private car of a railroad president, causes him to believe that all religious enthusiasm is nothing more than fashionable madness.

"Any suggestions as to the music for the dinner tonight?"

"Well, play something loud with the soup course."

Kent and His Friend Cobb

From the San Francisco dailies one derives very meagre information of affairs in Washington. To keep posted on the subject of national legislation and national politics one must read either a New York daily or one of the leading newspapers of the interior. Even matters of local interest are neglected by our parochial press. Take for instance the squabble in Washington over the appointment of Charles Cobb as assistant attorney-general for the Interior Department. This is a matter that has excited a deal of interest in the East, but you would never know it if you confined your newspaper reading to the San Francisco dailies. I have been keeping track of it by reading the Washington correspondent of the Sacramento Union. From him I learn that the matter of the confirmation of Cobb's appointment was referred to a subcommittee of the Senate which requested Attorney-General Wickersham to submit a statement with reference to the indictment against Kent's land company and explain what influence Cobb could exert on Kent's case. Attorney-General Wickersham reported that Cobb would not handle the case as it has been practically concluded and awaits only reports as to the amount of damage done by Kent's fences. From this it is inferred that Kent has succeeded in persuading the Interior Department to withdraw criminal prosecution. But the subcommittee has learned that there is a second similar case against Congressman Kent that has never been acted upon, and consequently more light is requested.

He Threatened the Tribune

Kent's friends in San Francisco have been saying that the opposition to Cobb was started by local enemies of the Congressman from the second district in the hope of involving him in a scandal. But the truth is that Kent has been put on the defensive by the New York Tribune which recently recited the history of the indictment for the illegal fencing of public domain. The Tribune said: "Kent does not want this criminal prosecution to proceed further. Therefore he has made a proposition for compromise whereby the case may be settled on civil grounds, either by the payment of a sum equal to the injury supposed to have been done by his illegal fencing, or by satisfaction of fine, the amount of which is to be fixed in advance and based on the agreement of the Golconda Cattle Company, 'Billy' Kent, president, to plead to the criminal charge." The Tribune charged that if Cobb were confirmed it would be his official duty to pass upon the merits of the compromise proposition which his patron Kent has made, with the perfectly natural hope of escaping the penalty of criminal prosecution and the substitution therefor of a purely civil prosecution; in effect, of paying the government approximately the rental price of the lands which have been fenced. Kent announced one day his intention to sue the Tribune for libel, but the next day he modified his statement, saying he would consult his attorneys.

A Compliment for George Sterling

The conservative and scholarly "Review of Books" of the New York Times has just paid a high compliment to George Sterling, our poet. "Many a minor poet," says the editor, "has had his shot at aviation; but we have not happened to see any other poem, having this new art or science as its theme, in which the subject is treated with so much imagination and such literary skill as have gone to the making of 'The Black Vulture' from Mr. Sterling's 'House of Orchids.' The sonnet might have been written by William Watson." The sonnet runs:

Aloof upon the day's immeasured dome,
He holds unshared the silence of the sky.
Far down, his bleak, relentless eyes descry
The eagle's empire and the falcon's home—
Far down, the galleons of sunset roam;
His hazards on the sea of morning lie;
Serene, he hears the broken tempest sigh
Where cold sierras gleam like scattered foam.

And least of all he holds the human swarm—
Unwitting now that envious men prepare
To make their dream and its fulfillment one,
When, poised above the caldrons of the storm,
Their hearts, contemptuous of death, shall dare
His roads between the thunder and the sun.

Getting Ready for Hearst

In the newspaper offices of Seattle there is an air of suppressed excitement, a girding of loins and a general preparation for battle. For the editors of the Post-Intelligencer and the Times are getting ready to resist the invasion of William Randolph Hearst. Hearst's agent in Seattle, Dent H. Robert of this city, has already made an offer of $350,000 for a suitable site for a newspaper plant. The offer was refused and he is now considering other favorable locations. It is expected that the formal announcement of the foundation of the Seattle American will be made shortly. Meanwhile Editor Chapin of the Post-Intelligencer is in the East strengthening his news service connections and Editor Blethen of the Times has just returned to Seattle, having completed similar activities. The Times is served by the Hearst news bureau, but is ready to discontinue the service at a moment's notice and rely upon the Publishers' Press which is the rival of the Associated Press and the Hearst bureau. All Seattle is regarding the preparations for a journalistic struggle with intense interest and the general impression is that Chapin and Blethen will give Hearst a run for his money.

Raker on Redwoods

It fills me with pleasure to be able to announce that at last Californian oratory is being heard in the House of Representatives. It has been many years since a real blown-in-the-bottle, all-wool-and-a-yard-wide orator went to Washington from this State. Of course there was Congressman Ned Livernash, or Edouard de Nivernais as he prefers to style himself, but a jealous House refused to hear him until the last day of the session and then the Speaker's gavel fell after he had emitted one sentence. There is also of course Bill Kent of that ilk; but Bill, as he showed in a recent utterance, leans more to the poetical than to the oratorical side of debate. My orator is Judge Raker of Alturas, a Democrat unterrified and, let us hope, never to be gagged. Coming from Alturas in the land of Modoc Indians and lynching bees, Raker burst upon an astonished Congress the other day with the following tremendous bit of word painting: "In that section nature has lavished treasures and beauties which, once destroyed, cannot be restored in a hundred generations. I refer to the gigantic redwood trees, which occur in great groves in certain localities. One can ride for miles through primeval forests, which were planted by the Almighty before the Christian era. There one is in twilight at noon amid trees 38 and more feet in diameter, which go straight up without a limb for more than 100 feet, and whose crowns soaring 300 or 400 feet in the air form a vast canopy almost impervious to sunlight. Such great wonders of nature should not be permitted to fall before the woodsman's axe. These groves should be preserved for the people and the Nation for all time. They are as much a part of the people's heritage of delight and instruction as are the Yosemite, the Yellowstone, Mammoth Cave and other natural wonders." The deft mingling of dry statistic with glowing imagery in this passage was particularly admired. It was pretty generally agreed that one rarely found this sort of jeweled language, even in railway folders. Raker and his redwoods will probably become national figures as Chester Rowell would say.

Governor Woodrow Wilson is a man of exceptional powers of fascination. At the banquet given in his honor in this city, which, by the way, Mr. Garret McEnerney presided over with great felicity, he made a most favorable impression, winning the confidence and esteem even of men who were inclined to regard him rather as an artful politician than as an earnest and sincere statesman. After his speech one of his hearers observed, "Well, if we must have a Progressivist for President Woodrow Wilson will suit me." From all that Governor Wilson has said of late I have come to the conclusion that he represents that class of statesmen of which George Savile, Viscount of Halifax in the days of Charles II, was the prototype. Savile was dubbed a trimmer, and he assumed the title as an honor, bearing it with vivacity and distinction. Everything good, he said, trims between extremes; the temperate zone between the climate in which men are roasted and the climate in which they are frozen; the English constitution between Turkish despotism and Polish anarchy. Savile trimmed between the two embittered factions of English politics. Always placid of temper, never prone to malevolence, he was forgiving and forbearing, never given to excessive admiration or furious opposition, he had nothing in common with those that flew from extreme to extreme. Apparently Woodrow Wilson has taken Savile for his political model. He is for making concessions but not for a metamorphosis. There are some things which he has no hesitation in disapproving. One of them is the recall for judges and the other is woman's suffrage. He appears to be a happy medium between Battle Bob and Uncle Joe. It is certainly to be said in his favor that he disdains to eat soap in order to frothe at the mouth and that the holier-than-thou attitude is excluded from his repertoire.

He Cultivates the Newspapermen

Governor Woodrow Wilson has a healthy respect for the power of newspapermen and in his "swinging round the circle" has been at pains to show his feeling in this regard. All reporters get the best of treatment from him and leave his presence mightily impressed with his personality. The local scribes who interviewed him consider him a big man. Particular evidence of Governor Wilson's attitude toward reporters was afforded when his secretary communicated with the Board of Managers of the Press Club and informed them that the Governor would esteem it a great honor to be invited to the club and given an opportunity to mingle with the "boys." Arrangements were immediately made to entertain him at dinner on Tuesday evening and the Governor was delighted. But unfortunately the local Bourbons had already arranged for those hours of his stay in the city and he had to cancel the engagement.

A Senator-Novelist

There is more than ordinary interest for San Franciscans in the announcement that ex-Senator Hansbrough of South Dakota is about to publish a novel. Not the same sort of interest, however, that will induce the senator's former colleagues to peruse the book. They are said to be awaiting its appearance with apprehension. It is called "The Second Amendment" and in it Hansbrough is said to have laid bare the secrets of the Upper House, to have told tales of lobby and committee rooms that should never be repeated and to have sketched portraits of the political bosses that will make them wince. Old San Franciscans will be interested in the novel because ex-Senator Hansbrough used to be a newspaperman here. He worked on the Alta and later on the Examiner but never mastered the business. Old John Timmons who worked with Hansbrough on the copy desk used to chuckle as he told stories of the latter's queer ideas about synonyms. He depended for his copia verborum on a vest pocket dictionary which he consulted with the most surprising results. But Hansbrough went to the Dakotas and made and married millions, finally landing in the United States Senate. He was retired some time ago in strange circumstances. He was done out of his seat by the "machine" of South Dakota while he was so ill that he could not lift his head from the pillow. It was more than a year before he rallied. Meantime his wife, a beautiful and talented young woman who had been an invalid during the greater part of their married life, developed a disorder that necessitated her confinement in a sanitarium. It remains to be conjectured from his novel whether these misfortunes have embittered the ex-senator; certainly they have not broken him.

His Crocodile Tears

One of our well known wine agents, accompanied by a millionaire from Victoria and two charming and beautiful women, went to sup at Tait's in the wee sma' hours of last Saturday morning. The wine agent ordered frogs' legs and a couple of quarts of wine. "While we're waiting," he informed his guests, "I think I'll go and pay a visit to the pet frogs in the fountain. They are very friendly and actually eat flies out of my hand." But he found no frogs in the fountain. He searched long and carefully, but they were not in evidence. Finally he summoned John Tait and asked what had become of the darling creatures. There were tears of deep emotion trembling on his lids, but Tait did not hesitate to impart the horrid truth. "The waiter is just placing those pet frogs on your table,"

BEGINS MONDAY MORNING, MAY 22d

At this time we will place on sale about 2000 high class WOMEN'S SUITS, divided into four great lots. Not the least of the attractions of this sale will be this additional offering—he said; "they were the last we had and you are going to eat them." Whereat the wine agent, overcome by grief and mayhap to some extent by wine, mingled his crocodile tears with the waters of the fountain.

The Santa Fe's New Boat

There was a delightful "housewarming" aboard the Santa Fe's new ferryboat San Pedro on Sunday when nearly three hundred guests were taken for an excursion about the bay. The placing of the San Pedro on the run between this city and Ferry Point, Richmond, signalizes the betterment of the transbay service of the railroad company and is an event of great importance. But aside from this last Sunday's excursion had a social side which appealed to the representative men and women who were invited to make the first run. There was good music from the Hawaiian band, a delicious noon repast and during the several hours of the trip around the bay a quality of summer weather that none could cavil at. The arrangements for the excursion were made by James B. Duffy, general passenger agent and C. J. Birchfield, general advertising agent of the Santa Fe. Among the points of interest visited were the Union Iron Works, where the new ferryboat was built, Fort Point, Black Point, the naval coaling station at California City, Vallejo and the Mare Island navy yard.

Huntington's New Treasures

There has been so much pother over the acquisition by Henry E. Huntington of the $50,000 Gutenburg Bible of the Hoe collection, that small attention has been bestowed on the other treasures which he has been gathering recently. At this same Hoe sale he bought through an agent William Blake's "Milton" for $9,000 and a Kilmarnock "Burns" for $5,800. Some time ago he bought the private library of the late E. Dwight Church of Brooklyn which was collected during more than half a century and is rated among the finest private collections in the world. The price he paid was $1,300,000. Among the books in this collection are Shakespeare folios valued at $200,000; the original manuscript of Franklin's Autobiography valued at $35,000; and the First Laws of the Colony of Massachusetts for which the State of Massachusetts once offered $25,000. The cataloguing of this library extended over more than three years and cost about $40,000. Huntington in the Hoe sale has acquired items for which Miss Green, Pierpont Morgan's librarian, was an eager bidder.

Honor for Lawrence

Chicago papers to hand tell the story of great honor recently paid to Mr. Andrew M. Lawrence, formerly managing editor of the Examiner. A banquet was given by the Illinois Democracy in the great banquet hall of the Auditorium Hotel to celebrate the services rendered to the party by the distinguished California journalist, and most fervid tributes were paid to him by statesmen from Washington and by leading officials of the municipal and State government. Representatives of the bench, bar and mercantile world spoke of Lawrence in terms of the highest praise attributing to him the credit for the recent great victory by which Carter Harrison became mayor of Chicago. Mr. Harrison presided at the banquet, and proposed for his own toast "The Great Fight." Lawrence responded to the toast, "The Power of the People." The banquet was the most noteworthy ever held in the Auditorium, the number of guests exceeding those at the big Roosevelt dinner held in the same hall several years ago. "Andy" Lawrence is now recognized as one of the most important figures in the politics of Illinois. Few men know the game of politics better than he. He tells his friends that his one disagreeable experience in the game occurred in San Francisco when he made Phelan mayor and was then given the double-cross.

A Chapter of Accidents

Hugo Weinberger, a civil engineer from Vienna who arrived in this city recently, does not know whether to regard his transcontinental trip as a diversion or as a penance. After traveling from Chicago to the Isthmus of Panama he arrived at the canal in time to see some unfortunate laborers killed by an explosion of dynamite. After returning to Chicago, he left there on the same train with the alleged dynamiters of the Los Angeles "Times." From San Diego he made an excursion into Tia Juana and was almost bayoneted for taking pictures of the fortifications. But the most nerve-racking incident occurred on his trip to San Francisco. A child was killed by the train on which he traveled.

He Swats Our Board of Education

Professor Suzzallo who used to shed the light of his learning on these parts but who is now lecturing on school administration at Teachers College, New York, has been making uncomplimentary references to our board of education. One of the features of the proposed new charter for New York is a paid board of education. On account of his experience in San Francisco the professor is against this. That experience, he tells the New York Evening Post, showed him that "such a provision recruits less able men for the school trusteeships, and leads to an interference of laymen in expert professional affairs." The paid board member, he says, was usually one of two types—"the man who looked upon the appointment as political patronage and who did no more work than was required to meet the legal requirements; and the man who felt he ought to keep busy all day, with conscience, because he was paid for it." Neither man pleases the professor; the spoilsman for obvious reasons; the conscientious man because he "tends to run across all bounds of layman service." Professor Suzzallo, it would seem, is a hard man to satisfy.

One of the Wilstachs

The presence in this city of Claxton Wilstach, business manager for Sothern and Marlowe, reminds me of the conspicuous success achieved in the business department of theaterdom by the members of the Wilstach family. Not so many years ago the three Wilstach brothers, Claxton, Frank and Paul, started in as newspaper reporters in the little town of Lafayette, Indiana. They caught on and moved to New York or Chicago. Then they got into the theatrical business and have manifested their capabilities by leaping to the top of the heap. Frank Wilstach was last here with William Faversham and Julie Opp. Paul, the youngest brother, was for a time manager to that difficult personality, Richard Mansfeld. He has recently shown his versatility by writing the spectacular drama "Thais" which is running successfully in New York. Frank Wilstach's son Jack inherits the family ability and is manager for Mary Mannering. The Wilstachs have many friends in this city and the coming of any member of the family is the signal for a lot of jollification.

The Letters Didn't Jibe

This is the story of a letter and it must be anonymous—not the letter but the story. To give names would serve no good purpose and would certainly inflict pain. (And yet the names are being given as the story makes the circuit of the tea tables. Gossips are not as considerate as Tantalus.) A young man prominent in society recently had the good fortune to become engaged to a young woman equally prominent in society. Their friends were delighted with the match and took occasion to say so. But among the friends of the couple is a matron of considerable prestige who admires the young man but for some reason, not clear, does not admire the young woman. So she wrote a letter of felicitation to the young woman in which it was made to appear that the young woman had captured a paragon, a beau ideal, a Bayard sans peur et sans reproche, an Admirable Crichton, a what-you-will. Life for the young woman was to flower into supreme happiness in the company of that wonderful, that perfect young man. Naturally the young woman was delighted. She believed every word in that high-keyed bit of epistolary composition. And she showed it to her future husband. He read it with interest, but without exaltation. Surprised, the young woman inquired the reason. For answer he drew from his pocket a letter in the same handwriting. It was from the same matron and it was her confidential expression to him of her opinion of his future wife. Briefly, curtly she wrote to regret that she could not congratulate him on his choice of a wife. . . . That prominent matron is no longer on good terms with that young man. Even if he can forgive, his wife-to-be cannot and never will. What dangerous things letters are!

The Coronation Crush

We hear much these days about distinguished society people who are to enjoy the inestimable privilege of seeing the Coronation. Every city of any size that boasts of a smart set has contributed its quota of eminent personages to the proud circle that is to be beamed upon by their Majesties. If all the fashionable ones who are reported to have received cards for the ceremony have really been favored then it is almost as bad as being out of the swim altogether not to have been bidden to the big show. But let the cardless ones not repine. The bavardes, I believe, have been letting their imagination rove. From a London journal that publishes authentic court news I learn that "Americans who will actually see the Coronation are not numerous." The writer says: "The Special Envoy, Mr. John Hays Hammond and Mrs. Hammond, the American Ambassador and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, with perhaps the Chief Secretary of the Embassy and his wife are sure to be present." In addition to these there are sixteen American-born peeresses who are entitled to attend. In the gallery reserved for the personal friends of the King and Queen there will also be a few distinguished American ladies. Lady Carington will probably be among them and also Lady Paget, Mrs. George Cornwallis West. The Rear-Admiral who will represent the American navy with his wife will also be admitted to the gallery of the Abbey. If all the Americans whom the bavardes have favored with invitations were to be invited it would be necessary to enlarge the Abbey. The fact is that the ceremony will be witnessed by 7,000 people and that when all official passengers entitled to attend are admitted there will be room for just 670 also-rans. And there are some pretty prominent also-rans in the monarchies of Europe, and so numerous are they that after they are taken care of there will be no room for the intimate friends of our Envoy and Ambassador.

Mrs. Carolan Disappoints

Most decidedly it is not in anger but in sorrow that I find myself constrained to administer a reprimand to Mrs. Frank Carolan of San Francisco and Paris. Mrs. Carolan has grievously disappointed me. Here was a woman to whom I looked never to do the inadequate thing—and behold! she has gone and done it. I refer to her soiree of recent date in the Rue Chardin, Paris. To this soiree, one of a series, Mrs. Carolan bade the notables of cosmopolitan society in the gay capital of the world and for their entertainment she trotted out—whom do you think? Why, none other than Charles Kellogg, the bird-man. (Be it understood that he is not an aviator but a sort of aviary. He imitates the songs of all the birds that sing.) Now Charles Kellogg is a wonderful person, worthy of the greatest consideration, entitled to the greatest praise. But he is not the man to occupy the foreground at a Carolan soiree to which the adjectives "unique" and "original" are plentifully applied. Everybody who is anybody in the world has heard Charles Kellogg. Even on this edge of the footstool we have heard him warble and twitter and trill. So how came it that Mrs. Carolan gave him to blase Paris? Is there no new material for entertainment? The supposition cannot be considered for a moment. I am afraid Mrs. Carolan has descended one point in my estimation.

He Loves His Gramaphone

Always eager to record the latest quirks of fashion, I hasten to set down here the fact that Mr. William Mayo Newhall who is sojourning at Paso Robles, has his pet gramophone with him. This is something new. Hitherto most of our music-lovers, when leaving town for a short visit, have contented themselves with the hotel piano; but Mr. Newhall is something of a social arbiter and I look for a revolution in the musical diversions of swagger rusticators, in consequence of his innovation. It will not surprise me if, in a short time, canned music breathes its melancholy accents from every transom in our swell country hotels, testifying to the cultivated taste of the guests and inspiring the hearers with appreciation or dissatisfaction, according to their state of mind. I am informed that when Mr. Newhall is not riding or taking the baths, he is lending a sympathetic ear to the favorite tunes of his carefully selected repertoire; also that when he returns to the Pacific-Union Club he will give cards and spades to any member in his knowledge of classical and syncopated harmonies.

Sleuthing a Wealthy Widow

The friends of Arthur Inkersley who until quite recently was a member of the Chronicle editorial staff but who is now living abroad with his bride, will be interested in the fact that his step-daughter has been an unwilling figure in a Parisian sensation. Inkersley, it will be recalled, married Mrs. Fearn, the widow of the Honorable Walker Fearn, United States Minister to Roumania and Greece and a member of the International Court of Egypt. Mrs. Fearn's daughter by her first marriage is Mrs. Seth Barton French, the beautiful widow of a wealthy New York banker. Mr. and Mrs. Inkersley have been the guests of Mrs. Barton French in her apartment in the Rue Benjamin Godard, Paris, previous to going to the Coronation. It was during their stay that the Paris police discovered that private detectives have been spying on wealthy American widows in Paris and furnishing intimate particulars about them to French noblemen who seek the information to aid them in their matrimonial ventures. The three principal widows who have been thus spied on are Mrs. Barton French, Mrs. William B. Leeds and Mrs. Malthus Hall, all of them important personages in the American Colony of Paris. Mrs. French had just returned after being the guest of her dear friend Queen Elizabeth of Roumania in the royal palace at Bucharest and was engaged in entertaining her mother and her step-father when the police discovered how she had been systematically sleuthed. The discovery made a great sensation in Paris and is still engaging much attention. The man who had set his mind on capturing Mrs. French by this outrageous method turned out to be Prince Aymon de Lucinge. He belongs to the family of that name and is well connected. One of his cousins married Count Stanislaus de Castellane. The Prince was best man at the wedding of Prince Victor Napoleon and Princess Clementine of Belgium. He has a big chateau and a mountain of debts, but Mrs. Barton French will not help him to pay them. She was very much cut up over the notoriety of the thing and the presence in Paris of Mr. and Mrs. Inkersley afforded her great consolation.

The Carter-McLaine Engagement

Miss Bonnie Carter whose engagement has just been announced to William McLaine is a daughter of the late Judge Carter of Fresno who died last year. The Carters are wealthy and prominent residents of Fresno. Miss Carter is a graduate of Stanford. William McLaine is a nephew of Mrs. Henry J. Crocker. It was on the McLaine ranch in Tulare county many years ago that Mrs. Charles McLaughlin first saw pretty May Ives. She brought her to San Francisco where she reared and educated her and left her a large fortune when she died. Billy McLaine has long been considered one of the most eligible bachelors in town. He is interested in the oil fields in Bakersfield where the couple will reside after their marriage.

A Lucky Bride-to-Be

Of all the brides-to-be over whom the bavardes spill their ink none is luckier than little Mildred Whitney who is the affianced of one of New York's greatest catches, young Ernest Stillman, the son of banker James Stillman of New York and heir to many millions. The betrothal is the result of a visit to Cambridge where young Stillman was a student at Harvard and met the dainty little Californienne who is blonde and pretty as a Dresden shepherdess. Both of them are very young and the engagement has lasted a year. It will culminate in a June wedding at Trinity Church that will be one of the fashionable events of the summer. The groom with his brother and four of his ushers will arrive from New York in a week and the quintette of rich young eligibles from the metropolis will cause a stir in society. Stillman and his bride will go to Europe on their honeymoon and will have a house in New York next winter. Mildred Whitney is a granddaughter of the late Marcus D. Boruck who was a political figure in California twenty years ago. He was the Beau Brummel of the Republican party and a handsome man of fine presence. Mrs. William Reding, mother of Miss Whitney, was his oldest daughter. A younger one is Mrs. Struve of Paris.

MISS ETHEL ANNE RODDA

A popular San Francisco belle whose engagement to Mr. Lewis Mistrot of Texas has just been announced.

Miss Weed's Engagement

Miss Dorothy Weed whose engagement has just been announced to Leslie Whitney, son of A. L. Whitney, is the only daughter of the late Merritt Weed who was the fiscal agent of Spreckels & Company. Mrs. Weed was formerly Miss Minnie Gannon, daughter of the late James Gannon, a member of the political triple alliance of Higgins, Gannon and Chute. The young couple met in romantic circumstances a year ago when young Whitney saved the charming miss from a serious auto accident. Leslie Whitney's father is head of a big business house. His mother was a Miss St. John, member of a prominent Eastern family. Leslie Whitney is a cousin of Miss Mildred Whitney and Miss Lillian Whitney, daughters of the late Calvin E. Whitney. Miss Weed returned last year from a tour abroad with her mother and has not yet made her debut in society. She is a cousin of Miss Claire Kennedy and Miss Elizabeth Short.

Miss Crocker's Accident

I cannot be too severe in my criticism of the newspaperman who gave to the world the news of Miss Jennie Crocker's accident at the Clark polo grounds in Hillsboro. Here is the way this vulgar scribe wrote: "Miss Jennie Crocker sustained a severe injury to her right leg yesterday afternoon when she ran into a hydrant." Did you ever hear such low language in your life? What are we coming to when the elect can be treated in this unworthy manner? Proper respect for the upper classes should have caused the newspaperman to write that important item of news something like this: "There was great consternation among the many friends of Miss Jennie Crocker, the beautiful and cultured multimillionaire, yesterday afternoon. Sorrow swept over Hillsboro, the municipality of millionaires; there was mourning in the country club at Burlingame; up and down the county of San Mateo in the palatial residences of our most important society people prominent matrons, bewitching maids, strong men and handsome chappies were dissolved in tears; and when the news of the calamity reached San Francisco there was a commotion that played havoc with the usual calm of Pacific Avenue and Broadway. For yesterday afternoon Miss Crocker was the victim of a heart-rending accident when, displaying that delightful vivacity for which she is loved, she ran into the iron discharge pipe of a water-main and sustained an abrasion of her aristocratic right lower limb. The accident will not prevent Miss Crocker from attending the Coronation." This, I submit, is the genteel language suited to such a matter.

Miss Josselyn's Adventure

Reports differ as to just what Miss Marjorie Josselyn said to the speed cop when she was overhauled in her big new car. One account had it that she explained that she was a novice and couldn't possibly be going very fast. Another account ran that she exclaimed: "Why, you can't arrest me. I'm Miss Josselyn!" Here is a wide divergence of opinion. It may seem a piffling matter, but really, in society nothing is piffling. All trifles are tremendous, for they lend themselves to chatter and society folk are so busy with more important things that they have an awfully hard time thinking of things to think about and talk about. So Miss Josselyn may be considered a benefactor. She has inspired some conversation in swelldom. Some of those with whom I have discussed this matter hold to the view that Miss Josselyn could not possibly have made the first statement because it smacks of apology and really swagger people never apologise to anybody or for anything. These experts are quite sure that if Miss Josselyn did not make the second statement, she should have made it. They feel that it has an aristocratic sound. One even said that it was worthy of Marie Antoinette which of course is absurd. You will observe that the discussion is entirely empirical. All doubts could easily be set at rest by asking Miss Josselyn what she actually said, but that would destroy a topic of talk. And in the matter of conversational topics, if in nothing else, society is economical.

An Interesting Engagement

An engagement which will interest particularly the members of our pioneer families is that just announced by Mrs. A. F. Rodda, of her daughter Miss Ethel Anne Rodda to Mr. Lewis Mistrot of Houston. On both her father's and mother's side Miss Rodda is descended from men who came here in the days of gold and left their impress on California history. Mr. Mistrot belongs to a well known Texas family. The wedding will take place in July.

Mrs. Newhouse Will Be There

Samuel Newhouse, Utah millionaire, having been in our midst a good deal of late, it is interesting to note that his wife will be a prominent figure in London society during the Coronation festivities. Mrs. Newhouse is a woman of great charm and magnetism and has made for herself an impregnable position in London society. This is a great feat, but Mrs. Newhouse who before her marriage had not been socially prominent, accomplished it through her charm and culture. The late King Edward took her up several years ago and introduced her within the charmed court circle. She is an intimate of the Battenbergs who are noted for their loyalty to their friends. Her social rise has been accomplished tactfully and has offended none but the envious.

The Ban on Riskiness

When I travel far afield to point a social moral or to adorn a social tale, my object is simply and solely the betterment of my readers. For this purpose I beg leave to call attention to a bit of gossip that comes to me from the District of Columbia. It runs to the effect that war has been declared by Washington hostesses of the careful sort upon those hoary old sinners who tell awful stories at dinner parties, not scrupling to let them be heard by young and tender birdlings. I quote my authority: "Some fiery talk has been reported as coming from the highly respectable father of a girl who is less than twenty-five, and directed against a man at present attached to a high tribunal of the land and who has held many lofty posts here and abroad. This worthy has long been famous for the risque stories he poured into any listening ear, stories which were unpardonably vulgar and had not even the excuse of being witty. The average girl either condones such conduct or ignores it, and not one in a thousand has the courage to resent. But the girl of this paragraph did, and her father sitting nearby and noticing her anger asked the reason the moment the dinner was over. She gave him an expurgated version of the affair, but his temper was aroused nevertheless, and for a time things looked squally and decidedly uncomfortable for the man who would a raconteur be. Of course the occurrence has been retailed over the tea cups, and some experienced dowagers are of the opinion that girls who have not sense enough to keep such things to themselves and prevent the menfolks from getting one another by the ears should be kept in the nursery." But others take a more serious view of the situation and there is to be a campaign against riskiness this winter. Now that is just what we need here. The risque stories one hears at certain San Francisco dinner tables are inexcusable and if the tellers do not reform they should be excluded from all dinners at which buds are present. Verbum sapienti sufficit.

Notes on "Macbeth"

By Edward F. O'Day

Mr. Sothern plays only one-half of Macbeth well; to the other tragic half his romantic powers are unequal. For the Macbeth who pauses on the blasted heath, after the weird sisters have vanished, to ask his tempted soul, "Why do I yield to that suggestion whose horrid image doth unfix my hair and make my seated heart knock at my ribs against the use of nature?" and who repels, although half-heartedly the evil that is gathering in his soul with the specious, "If chance will have me king, why chance may crown me without my stir,"—for this Macbeth he has sympathy and copious ability of interpretation. The Macbeth of courteous gentleness who turns pretty phrases naturally, telling Ross and Angus when they have brought the tidings of his investiture, "Kind gentlemen, your pains are registered where every day I turn the leaf to read them," who tells Duncan, "I'll be myself the harbinger, and make joyful the hearing of my wife with your approach"; who greets his wife as "my dearest love"; and who, in the midst of Banquo's murdering, can desire for his banquet guests that "good digestion wait on appetite and health on both";—this Macbeth lives in Mr. Sothern's acting. He is a Macbeth who is "too full of the milk of human kindness"; who "what he would highly, that would he holily"; or who at worst is an easy prey in the hands of fate and metaphysical aid. He is more the innocent flower than the serpent under it. It seems quite in keeping for Mr. Sothern's Macbeth to dwell on gentle things, to talk of innocent sleep, balm of hurt minds; but the awful significance of the words is lost. It does not seem that a murderer is talking. It is a philosopher musing who says, "I have lived long enough" or "Tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow," not a gore-glutted fiend. If Macbeth could be conceived as a Scottish Hamlet! But Macbeth is not that. We get conviction of only one-half of him from Mr. Sothern.

* * * * * * *

Much the same criticism applies to Miss Marlowe's Lady Macbeth. This woman is never unsexed. The milk is not turned to gall in her breast. The access and passage to remorse is not stopped up. She feels, we are sure of it, feels deeply the compunctious visitings of nature. Here is no woman to pluck the nipple from her babe's boneless gums and dash his brains out. Never! Her's is not the undaunted mettle to compose nothing but males. "Had he not resembled my father as he slept, I had done it." No, she wouldn't have had the evil courage even then. The Lady Macbeth of Shakespeare is, in the words of Hazlitt, "the great bad woman, whom we hate, but whom we fear more than we hate." Miss Marlowe doesn't fit the phrase. She goes directly counter to one particular of the part noticed by Coleridge. Lady Macbeth, he says, "evinces no womanly life, no wifely joy, at the return of her husband." But Miss Marlowe does. This part was for a Siddons to fill, if we may believe the critics of olden times, but not for a sweet wholesome Marlowe. Nance O'Neil was much more satisfactory in the part. And Madame Modjeska, most decidedly.

* * * * * * *

But then, these are two such difficult parts! In all the range of Shakespeare's women there is not a more defeating than Lady Macbeth. And only Lear and Hamlet are harder for the tragic actor than Macbeth. They speak too vigorously to the mind of the reader to give much intellectual enjoyment when the reader becomes a spectator and watches them on the stage.

* * * * * * *

The Greek Theatre production was a beautiful spectacle. Not as elaborate or as successful as the "As You Like It" of Miss Adams, but nevertheless worth going far to see. The lack of scenery was no drawback. Rather, by permitting the play to move swiftly from scene to scene, it was a positive advantage. Some spectacles were particularly effective, such as the vanishing of the witches. And others disappointed expectations. The battle had unlooked-for comic interludes. The knocking at the gate was amazingly inadequate. Do stage managers not read De Quincey? How any Shakespearean producer familiar with his essay could fail to wring the last jot of suggestion from that episode is inexplicable.

* * * * * * *

The company was a strong one. The Macduff of Mr. Frederick Lewis calls for especial appreciation. He was superb in that heart-tearing scene when Macduff learns of the slaughter of his wife and innocents. He reads blank verse beautifully. Unlike him Mr. Eric Blind who played Malcolm, read it execrably. The Banquo of Mr. Sydney Mather was exceptional. Miss Norah Lamison as the Gentlewoman showed the possession of an exquisitely modulated voice. The witches were eerie, but might have obtained better effects from their incantations. The Porter of Mr. Rowland Buckstone was a brief delight. He is a finished actor who won his audience by a dozen sentences, a great feat. Too bad his speeches were needlessly curtailed.

* * * * * * *

The text, we were informed, was that of the First Folio. But it was nothing of the kind. It was the slashed text to which we have perforce accustomed ourselves. To say therefore that the play was given "with a few omissions" was neither necessary nor justifiable. Why do Shakespearean players whose press agents are as careful as Mr. Sothern's and Miss Marlowe's to impress upon us the reverence shown to Shakespeare, countenance such misleading?

* * * * * * *

I noticed that when Mr. Sothern heard of his lady's death he exclaimed, "She would have died hereafter." Was this a slip of the tongue or a misreading of the line? Of course Shakespeare wrote, "She should have died hereafter." A small matter? Not at all, at least to one who understands in that exclamation the harassed cry of a bursting heart too crowded for another misfortune. Mr. Sothern's "would" destroys that meaning and substitutes a philosophical resignation that is out of character.

John Drew Next Week

John Drew in "Smith" will be seen at the Columbia next Monday. Thomas Freeman, the part which he plays in this comedy, has some thoroughly serious moments and it is said that Drew has done nothing finer than the thoroughly serious setting he gives to the man's sterling character. W. Somerset Maughan is the author of the piece. It is a distinct novelty. Smith, the pretty parlor-maid with whom Freeman falls in love, and who doesn't mind letting a gentleman kiss her on the cheek if, as she says, it gives him any pleasure, but haughtily disdains the same gentleman's overtures when he proposes marriage to her, because she knows her place, is a new stage type, and the author has drawn her with a great deal of drollness and subtlety. Mary Boland is said to impersonate this character with wonderful charm. Isabel Irving, Jane Laurel, Sybil Thorndike, Morton Selten, Hassard Short and Lewis Casson are also in the cast. Matinees Wednesdays and Saturdays.

The Mary Garden Concerts

The big musical and social events of the coming week will undoubtedly be the three concerts by Mary Garden, the most interesting personage on the operatic stage today and a woman who may truly be called a genius. Scottish Rite Auditorium will be the scene of these events, the first of which is scheduled for this Sunday afternoon, May 21, at 2:30 p. m. On this occasion the prima donna will sing the aria from Charpentier's "Louise," the work in which she made her first great success in Paris. The aria from Puccini's "La Tosca," the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria" with violin obligato and some groups of charming songs will complete Miss Garden's share of the program. The assisting artists will be Arturo Tibaldi, violinist and Howard Brockway, pianist-composer. The second concert is announced for next Thursday night, May 25, when the artist's principal offerings will be arias from Messager's "Mme. Chrysantheme," Massenet's "Thais" and "Herodiade," "The Song of the Hawk" from the new Herbert-Redding opera "Natoma" and some lighter lieder. The farewell concert will be given Sunday afternoon, May 28, with an entirely different program which will include the principal aria from "Natoma" and Puccini's "Mme. Butterfly."

Another Week of Shakespeare

In the week commencing Monday evening, Mr. E. H. Sothern and Miss Julia Marlowe will bring their successful engagement at the Savoy to a close. The novelty of next week's performances will be "The Merchant of Venice" to be given on Monday and Tuesday evenings. Mr. Sothern and Miss Marlowe have given it the most elaborate production of any of their Shakespearean presentations. Portia has long been Miss Marlowe's favorite role, ranking in the appreciation of the public beside her Juliet and Viola. The repertoire for the remainder of the week is as follows: Wednesday and Thursday nights, "Macbeth"; Thursday matinee, "As You Like It"; Friday and Saturday nights, "Romeo and Juliet," and Saturday matinee, "Taming of the Shrew." Sunday evening, May 28, that favorite actress, Miss May Robson, will begin a week's engagement at the Savoy in a new play, "The Rich Mrs. Repton," by R. C. Carton, author of "Lord and Lady Algy" and other successes.

"Sherlock Holmes" at the Alcazar

William Gillette's version of "Sherlock Holmes" will be the Alcazar's attraction the coming week, with Izetta Jewel, Sydney Ayres and the full strength of the company in well-fitting roles. Interest attaches to the fact that stage director Fred J. Butler will be seen as Professor Moriarty, a part in which he made a distinct personal hit when the play was last presented in the Sutter-street playhouse, about four years ago. But the chief reason for the revival consists of the fact that in the title role Sydney Ayres has done some of his most impressive acting as a stock leading man. "The Strange Case of Miss Faulkner," one of the most striking of Sir A. Conan Doyle's stories of the great detective, was chosen by Mr. Gillette as the basis of the play, and the adaptation adheres to the book as closely as stage requirements permit.

JOHN DREW

In his greatest comedy success "Smith" at the Columbia Theater.

Olga Nethersole has elicited the condolences of her New York friends. She wrote them that owing to the success of "Sister Beatrice" in San Francisco she would extend her tour and thereby miss the coronation. It seems that she just hates to miss it, too.

A Joe Hart Show at the Orpheum

Joseph Hart's production of Frank Craven's and George V. Hobart's one-act play "The Little Stranger" will be the headline feature at the Orpheum next week. The scene is a southern race-track and the story is of a broken-down "sport" who risks his last five dollars on a "long shot" to gain funds to provide for the little stranger expected at his home. Bowers, Walters and Crooker, "the three rubes," will present a comedy offering. The Five Armanis who come from the Orpheum's Paris affiliated theatre, the Alhambra, will appear in a musical review entitled "A Night in Naples." Another English music hall favorite has been persuaded to come to America and will seek the approval of the Orpheum audiences next week. He is Hal Forde and is known in London as "the swagger comedian." He has a sweet baritone voice, is of good appearance and well groomed. Forde possesses a repertoire of catchy songs and his original method of delivering them is expected to make him popular in this city. Bessie Barriscale and Howard Hickman will appear in a one-act dramatic episode by Mr. Hickman entitled "The Wrong Road" which affords these clever artists splendid opportunity for the display of realistic character delineation. Next week will be the last of Robledillo, Tom Waters and William Gould and Hattie Lorraine.

Pepito Arriola's Farewell

The final concert by the child marvel, Pepito Arriola, the most remarkable piano genius of the age, will be given at the Scottish Rite Auditorium this Saturday afternoon, May 20, at 2:30 o'clock. The "wunder-kind" will play the difficult "Appassionata Sonata" of Beethoven, Rubinstein's "Valse Caprice," a group of seven Chopin numbers, etc. A special rate of fifty cents to any seat will be made for children.

Mary Garden in Oakland

Mary Garden will appear in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse next Tuesday night, May 23, offering the beautiful program of her opening concert in this city. As evening concerts are rare occurrences in Oakland a large and fashionable audience will welcome the "Sarah Bernhardt of the Operatic Stage." The seats for this event are on sale at Ye Liberty box office only.

To prove that he could write a lyric offhand and win a bet from Harry B. Smith, the librettist, Florence Ziegfeld recently sat down to the piano and reeled off the following:

Lizzie girls, busy girls, up-in-the-air, dizzy girls,
Know-a-lot, turkey trot,
Like 'em? What? Whizzy girls!
Broadway pets, suffragettes, finest yet, the Lizzie girls,
Fizzy girls, quizzy girls,
Classy lassies, Lizzie girls!
Do you get 'em? Have you met 'em?
Nothing better, Lizzie girls
Quit your wooing, nothing doing, laughing, chaffing, Lizzie girls!

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Every day sees a small advance in security prices. Railroads and industrials alike are enjoying a better market. Standard issues have reached new high figures for the present movement. There is a notable revival in the output and absorption of bonds and short term notes, the publication of cheerful advices concerning the crops and an almost general growth of confidence in the financial community. Political prospects have brightened at home, Mexico is drawing up a peace compact and the impressive movement for an Anglo-American arbitration treaty, with all that would logically follow, has received a stimulus from events in Great Britain and at home. As to the decision in the trust case it was generally believed that it would be adverse and the best people in the trade look for a quick reaction. Crop prospects are very favorable at this writing and it looks as though we are in for a bumper crop of all commodities. Money is cheap and promises to be so for some time to come.

Wheat—Conditions have shaped a little more favorably for the owner of wheat. The favorable turn, although tardy, is being made the most of by the present owners of the cash and May delivery wheat here. They have already purchased a large percentage of their May troubles and July is as yet only a dim prospect with the delivery day at least six weeks away. It appears to be settled that the large May and cash wheat owners have entered on a long campaign and are already committed to the July delivery to a considerable extent. Even if the persistence in keeping July up is for no other purpose than to afford a profitable burial place for the May corpse, the attempt shows plenty of courage and resource and the trade has felt bound to respect it. General features of the situation are drifting rapidly towards normal. The world's available supplies have decreased rapidly and there have been sufficient crop ills in various parts to detract somewhat from the optimistic outlook of a few weeks ago. It all depends upon the harvest outcome and the market is therefore full of uncertainties and opportunities until a question of yield is settled.

Corn lost a trifle in price for the May delivery and barely held its own for the other months last week, despite the higher prices prevailing for wheat and oats. Receipts have been running more than double those of a year ago for several weeks. Last week's improvement in the eastern demand was lost this week and stocks should begin to show an accumulation. Weather conditions have been ideal for sowing the new crop and the acreage promises to show a fair increase over last year.

Cotton—The week, after having opened with a continuance of unfavorable wet weather in nearly all sections of the cotton belt, closes with a decided change for the better in climatic conditions in the southern States, and as a result, new crop prospects are more promising than they were a month ago. However, it will require the continuance of favorable, fair, warmer weather to make the outlook for the new crop satisfactory, as farm work is said to be somewhat behind and the fields need cleaning of weeds and grass while planting as yet has to be completed in all sections. Owing to the scarcity of cotton in the United States, (736,000 bales against 868,000 last year, of which only 154,000 bales are held in New York compared with 246,000 bales one year ago when the August position was cornered), spot cotton in the south has ruled stronger than the futures, due in part to the good trade demand at Liverpool. There are signs of efforts being made to manipulate the July option, and for this reason we would advise against trading in near months unless one be in possession of the actual cotton with which to make delivery. The successful termination of the probable manipulation will depend to a great extent on prospects of the new crop which in turn will be governed by weather conditions in the belt during the next two months.

Cruelty to Books

"The way some people handle books in street cars knocks that old Sunday school precept, 'Let not your angry passions rise' into smithereens so far as I am concerned," said the librarian. "I get especially wrathy when the abused books happen to belong to a public library. Most of them do belong there.

"Persons carrying a great pile of books are the worst offenders. A bunch of books carried under the arm get pretty unmanageable. They slip and slide around as if they had been greased.

"One way to prevent that is to slip the top cover of the bottom book inside the cover of the book just above it, and so on through the pile. The books cannot slip then, but heaven help the covers. They will get torn loose in no time.

"Every once in a while a subscriber who wants to save himself the trouble of chasing books in the streets locks a bundle of them together that way before leaving the library, but usually somebody who knows the effects stops him. In street cars he is free to do as he chooses unless some librarian catches him at it. Maybe they have no right to interfere then, but most of them do."

accustomed to see about the fortress was not likely to make me very fastidious, therefore the pretty young girl of about seventeen down there seemed to me all the more a marvel of beauty and attractiveness and I was overcome by a feeling of gratitude to the Creator who had placed such a piece of perfection in the world. While the girl walked slowly through the garden, looking at everything, she was accompanied by a fourteen-year-old boy, who shot reed arrows into the air from a bow of ashwood and rejoiced in their high flight. By chance one of these arrows came right up to where I was and fell beside me. Through that the boy perceived me and drew his sister's attention to me. I took off my hat and, bowing, threw the arrow down again. My fate and presence in the fortress were known throughout the town, so probably these young people knew at once who I was. They talked together and looked up at me, the boy frankly and full of curiosity, the girl more hastily, but, it seemed to me, with an expression of compassion on her sweet face.

"As I was now incessantly occupied with thoughts of escape and connected everything immediately with this idea, it occurred to me at once that here was the way for me to put myself in communication with the outside world. If this pretty girl could not, perhaps, help me, she would certainly not betray a poor prisoner who put himself in her hands. Then the doubt began to torment me whether I should see the girl again. She might be only on a short visit in this country-house and never appear again. All the same, I went on composing in my head a long letter in which I gave a full account of my situation and of all that would be necessary to secure my freedom. When, towards evening, I was once more locked in my cell I wrote it carefully down and appointed noontime from twelve to one for the venture. Then everyone in the fortress was at dinner and I was freest from observation, especially as the sentinel near me generally indulged in a little quiet meditation at this time. The girl was to write her answer on a slip of paper, stick this on the end of an arrow with a little wax or pitch and get her brother to shoot it up to me.

"With feverish expectancy I waited the next day for the pretty girl to appear in the garden again, but in vain—it remained empty. Only the boy raced about for a while, practicing with long, slender rods, which he used as spears. At last, in the afternoon, I saw the light dress gleaming amid the foliage. The girl walked slowly through the garden and disappeared under the old linden tree. It seemed an eternity until she appeared again, but now she was strolling along the path just beneath me. Now was the time! I cleared my throat as loudly as I could and as soon as she looked up I showed her my letter, weighted with a stone. As she looked away, surprised and somewhat confused, I threw it down. It fell right at her feet and I noticed that at first she looked startled and went on without picking it up. Then she seemed to consider a moment, turned around, picked up the paper and went with it back under the linden tree. After a while she came out again and walked slowly towards the house. My heart contracted convulsively as she went away thus without giving a sign. But suddenly she stood still and gave a quick glance up at me. Then again she turned away, nodded her head impressively three times and then hastened to the house. I almost shouted aloud for joy when I saw this, and the whole evening I had the greatest difficulty in suppressing the unusual cheerfulness which had taken possession of me.

"The next day all went well. The boy came and shot his reed arrows, as if for practice, up against the rock. Then he took another arrow, aimed carefully and shot it up to me. It did not go far enough; I saw the airy messenger mount close up to my hand and then fall back. The second time he was successful. I quickly detached the tiny piece of paper and threw the arrow down.

"She had written:

"'I will do all I can. My uncle will help me. You may trust him and also my brother Paul, who knows all and is proud to be entrusted with the secret. Be of good courage. In a fortnight all will be ready.'

"I pressed the note to my lips, read it, I suppose, a hundred times, and kept it as my greatest treasure. I will not dwell on the next two weeks. Enough that the time came when all was ready and I was to take flight at broad noonday. Fortune favored me in every respect. In the forenoon a thunder-storm came up; over the heath lay heavy, black clouds in which the lightning flashed and the thunder roared louder and louder. At a few minutes past twelve I stood on the edge of the rock and waited for the next clap of thunder to drown the noise of my fall. Then came a blinding flash of lightning. 'One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight,' I counted involuntarily, and then it cracked and roared mightily among the clouds. Invoking God's aid I jumped.

"How I got to the bottom I don't know yet. It thundered and roared about my ears, branches, struck me in the face, and there I was, standing on the ground! I hastened through shrubbery walks which hid me from sight to the gate. How often I had done this already in imagination! Near the open gate, sheltered by the shrubbery, stood a slight figure. It was she. In a passion of gratitude I stretched out both hands to her and, since no words could express our feelings, we kissed each other as if that were the natural thing to do. But she soon pushed me away, crying: 'Quick, quick! And may you have a safe journey!'

"Oh, what bliss and torment in one short moment! But I had to go on. In the road I saw the boy, Paul, whom I was to follow at some little distance. He led me to a small grove, near which stood a coach with a pair of fine horses. An elderly man who stood beside it, pushed me in, saying: 'In the box is a new suit and everything else you need, and, in the side pocket, money and the papers. God go with you!'

"I was about to thank him, but the horses started and off we went through the storm and rain and thunder, as fast as the animals could take us. Well, after all sorts of small adventures I got across the frontier and beyond—and was free. Free, and yet captive again, for that kiss at the garden-gate I never forgot.'

Frau Lindow, who had been busy for some little time over some vegetable beds nearby, now came nearer and asked:

"Well, what long story is this you are telling again?"

"It is the story of the famous kiss at the garden-gate!" replied Herr Lindow.

"You silly fellow!" said Frau Lindow. "Yes, that's what comes of having dealings with criminals!"

Suddenly all was clear to me, seeing the expressive looks exchanged by the old people.

"Old woman," cried the doctor, "do you remember that it is exactly forty years since that fateful kiss? Come, let us drink to a happy old age!"

We rose and the glasses clinked together. Then the old couple kissed each other, and a gleam of eternal youth seemed to transfigure their happy faces.

Discourages Familiarity

"After a man has learned to control his own organs of sneezing selling pepper for a living has its advantages," said the blond young man. "For one thing, it keeps undesirable acquaintances at a distance. Whenever I feel a desire to commune with my own soul all I have to do to secure the necessary privacy is to mention my occupation and people flee from me as if I had the plague.

"And I have got it, in one sense. It is impossible to handle ground pepper all day long without carrying home an ounce or two on my clothes, and a vigorous whack on my coat sleeve sends enough pepper flying to set a dozen people sneezing. For that reason a pepper salesman is immune from many of the annoyances that unprotected persons have to endure. No man who knows my occupation greets me with that familiar slap on the back that makes the most amiable man alive feel like fighting, and there isn't a porter on a train running into New York who pesters me with whiskbroom attentions. They all know that I sell pepper."

Auto Notes

Even further extensions of the continent-wide Rambler sales and service organization are now being made by The Thomas B. Jeffery Company. Last week The P. J. Downes Company of St. Paul was organized as a branch of The P. J. Downes Company, Minneapolis, and the appointment of this concern as exclusive representatives for St. Paul was made by the Rambler people. A. F. Manning, an automobile man of wide experience and Raymond Kelly, formerly commercial agent for the Minneapolis and St. Louis Railroad, and six years a resident of St. Paul, will have charge of the Rambler business there. St. Paul will make an effort to duplicate the record made by the Minneapolis branch in 1910, when four hundred thousand dollars worth of Rambler cars were sold during the season.

What promises to be the most interesting model that has been displayed on the local automobile market for some time is the new Stevens-Duryea Berline which arrived in San Francisco the other day. This car offers beyond question one of the most pleasing of this season's developments in body structure. It was among the sensational displays this winter at the National Automobile Shows where it listed advance sales that broke all records for a car of its ultra-high class.

Among sales reported for last Saturday by E. C. Collins of the Cartercar Auto Co. are a four passenger Cartercar touring car to J. T. McTarnahan and a fore-door Cartercar roadster to Dr. Julian L. Waller of this city.

Manager Elliot of the Oakland branch of the Haynes Auto Sales Co. reports increasing activity for the past week in transbay motor car trade circles. Among the deliveries made by Elliot was a five passenger Haynes touring car to A. C. Hinckley, chief of the Southern Pacific's mechanical department. As his position would indicate Mr. Hinckley is a mechanical expert of the highest qualifications, which fact adds interest to his selection of an automobile. The choice was made after a thorough investigation of the local market.

Three changes in the executive sales force of the Henderson Motor Sales Company, general distributors for Cole care, Indianapolis, have been reported to the Pacific Motor Car Co. E. H. Kisor, who was general sales manager of the Indianapolis branch, has been appointed Ohio manager with headquarters at Columbus. E. J. Kane, formerly manager of the Indianapolis factory of the Bishop and Babcock Company, becomes sales manager of the retail department of the Indianapolis office. D. B. Sullivan, formerly of the retail department, takes personal charge of the Indiana business for Cole cars.

Agents for all makes of cars in Sonoma County are over-sold. Especially is this true of the Chalmers and Hudson cars, their sales being twenty per cent greater than last year.

Three of the famous white-bonneted Lozier cars which were the marvel of the automobile racing season of 1910 have been entered in the 500-mile International Sweepstakes Race to be held over the Indianapolis Motor Speedway next Memorial Day, May 30. At the wheel of these famous cars will be Ralph Mulford, National Road Race champion of 1910, and Teddy Tetzlaff, holder of the American road race record and of the American Speedway 100-mile record, regardless of class. This is the first time that these two great drivers have been thrown together in competition and the outcome when they are both at the wheel of cars exactly alike will be watched with interest by motorists over the entire world. The Third Lozier car is entered by Dr. W. H. Chambers of McKeesport, Pa., and will be piloted by Harold Van Gorder, an eastern driver who has figured more or less prominently in minor events.

This is the best season ever for manufacturers of automobiles, according to Hugh Chalmers, one of the leading men of the industry, who said so before he left Detroit for a vacation of several weeks in Atlanta City. Mr. Chalmers said that ordinarily he would not be leaving Detroit right in the midst of the busy automobile season, but that just now, with sales keeping the factory running full force and even making night work necessary, he felt that he could not pick out a better time for a vacation.

"It would be interesting to know just how long the air pumped into a tire by the manufacturer when the car leaves the factory will remain in the tire," said C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of The Diamond Rubber Co. of New York, when told by M. A. Arnold of The First National Bank of Seattle, Wash., that he had a Diamond Tire on his Packard that has been on the car ever since he purchased it on November 27, 1909, and that although it has been run well over 10,000 miles this tire had never been off from the rim, as it had never occasioned any trouble of any kind.

Letters

A Southern Character Sketch

Here is another good book without a love interest, "Old Reliable," which is more of a character study than a novel, a series of episodes in the life of Zack Foster, a Mississippi negro of a type well known to southerners and tolerated by them as it would not be in any other civilized place on the globe. The portrait belongs in the gallery with some of the creations of Thomas Nelson Page and F. Hopkinson Smith. It is always interesting to note the difference between the sympathetic portrayal by a southerner and the sentimentalizing of the northern fictionist when dealing with the black race. Harris Dickson has done a good piece of work. From the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

Another Auto Tale

It is scarcely six months since Eleanor M. Ingram's short novel, "The Flying Mercury," was given to the reading public. It was a light, bright automobile story making no pretensions, yet so admirably done that it has left a more enduring impression than many labored productions from the pens of literary lights. Now we have from the same pen much such another story. Miss Ingram appears to know all the ins and outs of automobile racing, which knowledge she credits to her two brothers as instructors. At any rate, she can write of the speed maniacs in a manner that creates sympathy with her drivers even amongst those of us who have been driven off the roads and carry our hearts in our mouths every time we cross a city street. A very attractive little book, with illustrations in color by Edmund Frederick. From the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

With "Get Rich Quick Wallingford" on the stage, George Randolph Chester's new book detailing the early adventures of "Young Wallingford," comes in the nick of time. Wallingford, in those days, was known by a different and distasteful title which he discarded for no other reason than that he did not like it, and readers generally will admit that he did wisely, for Jonathan Reuben Wix was a palpable misfit for the large, florid, affable young man who was to develop into the larger, more florid and still more affable bunco artist. From the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

Books received from Lothrop, Lee and Shepard:

"At the Home Plate," by A. T. Dudley.

Judgment

"The question having been raised," said the man at the cafe table, "as to whether authors are human beings, we will attempt to answer it ourselves. There are many points of resemblance between authors and human beings which may or may not, in the aggregate serve to establish a conclusive amount of presumptive evidence that, in many instances, authors and human beings may, to all intents and purposes, be considered identical. 'Best Sellers' are of course barred. These are not authors at all, but Captains of Industry. No author who cares to believe in a hereafter would wish thus to be classed.

"Also we must eliminate from this argument authors of the Red Blood and Love-of-Life School. Such are rather to be reckoned as Intelligent Animals. Further, we positively must not include those facile wielders of the pen who muck rake. A scavenger is not fairly typical of the human being.

"We must also declare those authors who write for The Homely Ladies' Journal to be ineligible. We purpose to deal with human beings, not with angels on the right hand side. Nor is it possible for us to admit that ilk which nature-fakes; nor those writers who gather material in Africa; nor the sob-squad of the yellow journals. Nor authors who use the expression, 'her wide staring eyes leaped from their sockets, and his face fell.' These persons are merely liars; every mere liar is not an author; not necessarily a human being.

"It is, too, desirable to exclude the producers of society novels. The average human being has some slight regard for the feelings of his fellows, at times.

"Thus, by a simple process of exclusion ad absurdum we have demonstrated, after all that authors are not human beings. We may only add that we are not cocky, and are willing to be shown."

Now for Hitchcock

Postmaster Hitchcock having wiped out a deficit of $17,000,000 is now proposed as a fit subject of investigation. The magazines are after Mr. Hitchcock, and in the memorable words of Mr. Heney they will "get him." Mr. Hitchcock is really a far more objectionable person than was Mr. Ballinger. He has had the audacity to recommend the withdrawal of the prodigious subsidy which the people pay for the liberal education they get from the magazines. This is a species of lese majeste. Our magazine publishers are the court favorites of democracy. To treat them with disrespect is to imply a lack of respect for the sovereign people whose favor and esteem they enjoy. In the circumstances it is not surprising that Mr. Hearst, who publishes a magazine among other things, and who is recognized as the premier of all the court favorites, should demand that Mr Hitchcock be sent to the tower. The specific charge against the audacious Secretary is that he revoked the prerogative of a publisher against whom he had a grievance of a political nature. Thus, we are told, did he strike a blow against the liberty of the press and indirectly menace the rights of a free people. And so Mr. Hearst uttered a shriek for vengeance, one that caused sympathetic chords to vibrate in all the business offices of magazinedom. It will be interesting and instructive to watch developments. Mr. Hitchcock has a very good record as a public official, having put his department on a paying basis, thus accomplishing what formerly was regarded as an impossibility, but his record will not avail him for defensive purposes against the embattled court favorites. The charge that has been made the basis of the call for an investigation is mild and trivial compared with the accusations in process of incubation. Calumny has marked Secretary Hitchcock for her own.

A Journalist's Progress

Mr. William Randolph Hearst is rapidly winning recognition as the guide, philosopher and friend of all the people. This is as it should be. In this democratic era who is there better qualified to hold the lamp of counsel and light the path of progress than our premier journalist, the man with the largest circulation, the most expansive of all the mirrors of public opinion? Last week the New York Legislature, without, of course, the slightest suggestion from anybody connected with the Hearst papers, nor as a result of any wirepulling, but in a moment of inspiration and from a spontaneous craving for enlightenment, appealed to Mr. Hearst for an expression of his sentiments on the paramount questions of the hour. And Mr. Hearst, good, amiable and generous patriot, gave ear to the Macedonian cry from Albany. He packed his suitcase, went to the capital, and from his own papers we learn that "the occasion was one without precedent in that it was the first time that a private citizen had been asked to address the Legislature on pending legislation, the choice of measures for discussion being left entirely to the speaker." Without precedent indeed! But our manners and customs are undergoing swift changes in these progressive days of democracy. It seems but yesterday that Mr. Hearst started his fund for the relief of the families of the men who went to their death in Havana harbor and called on ex-President Cleveland for his co-operation. The reply must still be fresh in the minds of all. In substance it was this: "I must decline to permit the sorrow that I feel for the families of the men of the Maine to be made a means of promoting the vulgar advertising schemes of yellow journalism." Since the days of Cleveland our public men have become more liberal in their sentiments toward the great engine of public opinion which Mr. Hearst has exalted and glorified. They realize that in proportion as we extend the principles of democracy the greater becomes the power of the press. They see that our newspapers are something more than the schoolmasters of the common people; that in the domain of politics they exercise a tyranny which no jobchaser can afford to ignore. Formerly pulpit, platform, forum, all in one, the newspaper, now that we enjoy the blessings of the direct primary is also political boss and party convention. Once the giver of advice, the whole faculty of the people's university, the American journalist is now the regent of American sovereigns, and among politicians few there are that will not pay him reverence. So while the occasion in Albany "was one without precedent," be assured that it but marks the inception of a new practice in the politics of the nation. The probability is that when Mr. Hearst is next heard from as the counsel of statesmen it will be in the halls of legislation in Washington. This friend of the people who moves among us like a giant among common men is bound to reach his apotheosis in the near future. No bushel can much longer hide the light of his talents and virtues. With his newspapers almost everywhere he must soon be universally recognized as our most precious possession. And come to think of it how fortunate that at this stage of our history, approaching as we are a great unheaval in our affairs, there should be among us ready to direct our energies this inspired prophet of liberty whom we see going about making no vain display of his talents but discharging a duty to maintain a cause which lies nearest to his heart. Mr. Hearst is today our one best patriot. The rights of his countrymen enshrined in his heart communicate warmth and vital energy to every part of his being. He is above every species of duplicity, low art and cunning. In the downright sincerity of his nature he would scorn to impose by any hollow disguise. In him we see united the zeal of the patriot with the enlightened knowledge of the staesman and we know that as the high-priest of his party he has consecrated himself with pious zeal to the high duty of preserving the ark of democracy from the sacrilegious touch of a sodden plutocracy. We know, too, that he has a very keen appreciation of the intelligence and general character of the masses and that he will do to them precisely what they deserve to have done to them, and we rejoice in the reflection that as history must repeat itself they will do to him as they have been done by.

An Awful Prospect

The grand passion of the Sixty-second Congress is the passion for investigation. Almost everything under the sun is to be scrutinized officially by the zealous Representatives now assembled in Washington. Their curiosity is boundless. Thirty separate and distinct resolutions of investigation have been introduced thus far, and there are more to come. If the Representatives were to do nothing more than devote themselves to the inquisitions that have been demanded by resolution they would be kept busy for the next fifty years. Of all these inquisitions the one most recently called for is perhaps the only important one. The resolution calling for it is No. 153. It was introduced by Representative Rodenberg. This is the resolution:

Whereas, All the people of the United States without regard to race, nationality, creed, color, sex, or previous condition of servitude, are interested in the national game known as baseball; and

Whereas, The said national game of baseball seems to be about the only matter of national importance whose investigation has not been provided for since the convening of the Sixty-second Congress: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the committee on education are hereby required to inaugurate immediately a thorough and searching inquiry into the operation and manner of conducting said national game of baseball and to ascertain specifically the batting averages, hits, errors, two-baggers, home-runs, assists, sacrifices, slides, strike-outs, bunts, fouls, forced runs, flies and pop-ups, single and double plays of each and every individual member of the American and National Leagues and all minor leagues, including trolley leagues.

In making this investigation the committee shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, including umpires, and to examine them without administering oaths; and said committee is authorized to employ a competent stenographer while conducting said examination and to sit in the grandstand of the baseball park during the sessions of the House.

This resolution suggests the question, What's the matter with baseball? This is the first time in its history that the great national game has been threatened with contamination from politics. Hitherto it has enjoyed an unsullied reputation. From time immemorial it has been regarded as the one square sport in the galaxy of athletic pastimes. Now that its exponents are to be brought in contact with the Pharisees and Philistines of national politics the melancholy prospect is enough to make the bleachers of the whole country moan and sob in anguish.

Hamlet and the Critics

It is curious, the persistence of the notion that in the character of Hamlet there is a subtle psychic significance which is beyond the apprehension of mortal man. This familiar notion was given expression by one of our learned dramatic critics in his discussion of one of Mr. Sothern's performances. "It was as fine a Hamlet," he said, "as one could reasonably expect from the stage"—but "it was not Hamlet. The melancholy Dane has never yet lived upon the stage, and probably never will." In other words the melancholy Dane is beyond human power of impersonation. Enthusiastic commentators have said something like this before. Thus have they in their way paid tribute to the wonderful genius of Shakespeare. But this is not such high tribute as apparently they believe; for Shakespeare was one of the most practical of playwrights. He wrote for the stage, not for the closet. He created real men and women, and of all his creations there is none so human as Hamlet. Hamlet is of all times and of all countries. The very contradictions of his nature are a sign of his boundless humanity. Everybody can find something in Hamlet to remind him of himself. No two men judge him alike. Some have found him irresolute; others full of decision. Some insist that he is mad; others that his antic disposition is simulated. Is it not hard enough in real life to determine where sanity ends and insanity begins? The truth is that Hamlet is an incomprehensible person; and what one of us is there that can be read and understood by his fellows? Hamlet had a horror of lies, and so much of his career as we see is one long lie. How true to human kind! Now why should it be difficult to play Hamlet? As a matter of fact it is not half so difficult to make Hamlet vraisemblant as it is to make the Ghost so. The average stage ghost is such solid flesh that he makes you think of his cook. Shakespeare himself, conscious of the difficulty of impersonating the shade wouldn't trust the job to any of his actors. All that is required of the actor who plays Hamlet is that he illuminate the inherent beauty of the composition and give it a semblance of actuality and vitality and keep pace with the quickened sensibilities of his audience. But the average actor when he approaches Hamlet is awed by tradition. He is like the pugilist whose knees are knocking together before he enters the ring. He remembers that Garrick was inimitable in the words, "I have that within that passeth show"; that the most affecting touch of the elder Wallack was "That undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns"; that Kean was famous for his power of contrasted intonation; that Betterton was actually able to turn pale at sight of the ghost; and with all these scraps of tradition in his mind the average actor hasn't the courage of his own conception. He clothes the sombre Prince with a mystic poetic pall, and forgets that he must move and speak like a man not like a puppet spouting a playwright's lines. There is of course much of intellectual subtlety in Hamlet, but for an actor of temperament, intelligence and imagination the role so abounds in opportunities that the one danger attending its performance is that of emphasizing effects which are inherent in every situation and which need no elaboration. As to the assertion that the melancholy Dane never yet lived upon the stage, that of course is sublimated nonsense. The melancholy Dane is a legend. We interpret that legend as we interpret a picture. The business of every actor who plays Hamlet is to realize the Hamlet of his imagination and while making him consistent with the Prince in his tragic situations induce his audience to appreciate his perplexities and his intellectual and moral nature and sympathize with him in the performance of the deed from which his tortured soul had so long recoiled.

Our Next Senator

Knowing that martyrs to the cause of righteousness must inevitably come into their own we received with not the slightest tinge of incredulity the news from Washington, D. C., printed in the Times of that city as follows: "Francis J. Heney, all-around anti-grafter, is to be the next Senator from California." This news must have gladdened the heart of everybody who is at once capable of appreciating the prodigious service rendered to this State by the illustrious professional prosecutor and of apprehending the harsh consequences to him of his devotion to the interests of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Heney sowed the seeds and others gathered the fruit. Parched husks were his portion. It was as though a blind Providence had mistaken him for one to whom the principle of retribution was justly to be applied. Like Job severely has he been tried. He was the one volunteer in the whole band of mighty patriots. Nothing for him but office expenses, while his partner, Mr. Cobb, pocketed $25,000 no part of which could Francis J. conscientiously touch. And Cobb is to be an assistant to the attorney-general. The Hon. Hiram Johnson was handsomely remunerated in cash after a controversy over his fee and then he was boosted into the gubernatorial job. As a result of the agitation fanned by Heney the Lincoln-Roosevelt League of which his personality was the most active principle elected John D. Works to the Senate. The best Heney got was a chance to run for district attorney, the taking of which brought him nothing but humiliation. The sad story is briefly told by the Washington Times, thus: "It was simply a proposition of starving Heney out of California, and it came mighty near success. His friends would not permit it, his own fighting spirit was aroused, and he compromised at last by plunging into the great campaign which overturned the Southern Pacific machine, brought Johnson and the progressives into complete control and made Judge Works Senator. Then the turn came for Heney. Folks dearly love the gilded chariot and the music of the band. California discovered that it was proud of Heney, that he was one of the men who had saved it, and who had always been unselfish in his public services." By the turn that came for Heney is meant that he had been decided on as the logical man for Senator. This story seemed authentic, for Heney was in Washington when it was printed, and it was not unlikely he read the proof. But it implied that Heney was eagerly waiting for Senator Perkins to die. "There will be no regular vacancy," says the Times, "till 1915 when Senator Perkins' term expires; but the Senator's illness the past winter and spring has been so serious and persistent that many of his friends believe he will retire before the next regular session opens. In that event Heney will be named for the vacancy by Governor Johnson." Now the fact is that the Senator is in very good health for a man of his age, and the only "retiring" he is at all likely to do is by way of the grave, the frequent reminder of which by Heney's presence might greatly accelerate matters. Heney has taken occasion to deny that the story has any foundation and to express the hope that Senator Perkins may live out his term, but it is somewhat significant that the story was printed shortly after the visit of Meyer Lissner and Chester Rowell to Washington. These are the men, in the present state of politics in California, who are presumed to be vested with the power of proposing and disposing with reference to political honors and distinctions. Mr. Heney cannot say authoritatively that they have not decided on employing his feet to fill Senator Perkins' shoes. Notwithstanding Heney's denial the story does not lack plausibility. Heney is sometimes both politic and discreet, and it would be singular if he did not realize the expediency of disavowing responsibility for the story as printed by the Times. Admitting that he does cherish the ambition of succeeding Senator Perkins, should the latter "retire," must we not then reckon with the caprices of the living? The white man is a mighty "unsartin critter," and Governor Johnson is Caucasian through and through. Moreover Governor Johnson is a stickler for historical accuracy particularly respecting the vicissitudes of his own brilliant career. Governor Johnson believes that he put the Octopus out of business. During his campaign he wanted no assistance from Mr. Heney. He kept himself and Mr. Heney wide apart throughout the campaign, and when it was over he took exclusive possession of the pedestal which he has held ever since. In the circumstances how important for Mr. Heney that he should repudiate the Times story crediting him with the triumph achieved by the man who has the power of appointing a Senator in the event of the retirement of Senator Perkins!

Perspective Impressions

The dove of peace is a willing bird, but it can't find a place to alight in Mexico.

He who accepts the inevitable good-naturedly is the only genuine optimist.

Perhaps it might be well to have a directoress-general or a director-generaless for ornamental purposes.

Ultra-Progressivists tell us that after the Senate is popularized we shall put the referendum in the Federal constitution. Good! Let us be logical though the heavens fall. And let us have a government by the people even though it be necessary to hold an election every day. Business? Business is what's the matter with us. When we get a national referendum we'll abolish business.

A new league for the uplifting of the stage has been organized in Boston, but the pulpit is to be permitted to remain where it is with Dr. Brown, late of Oakland, as one of its ornaments.

Thus far "Weak Brother" Pardee has not taken occasion to affirm his confidence in his intimate frjend Assessor Dalton. Which reminds us that the light of true friendship is best seen when all around is dark

According to the gentleman who delivered the commencement address at Palo Alto the other day "we are behind every civilized nation except Russia." He might have added without fear of successful contradiction that we have more universities spreading the peculiar light of our civilization than all the nations of the earth including Russia.

If for no other purpose than to abate Mr. Hearst's damnable iteration let us admit that Mr. John Hays Hammond is the greatest American that ever lived and that ever may, can, will or shall live.

Whenever we can approve of anything done by David Starr Jordan we hasten to do so. This is the case now. He has separated himself from the office of International Commissioner of Fisheries.

The Presbyterians are trying a minister for heresy because he doesn't believe in the Bible Which reminds us that a great religious movement was started on the theory that there was nothing for Christians to believe in but the Bible, and that the proponents of that theory have been losing faith in the Bible ever since. Perhaps this is the irony of reform.

The Builders

Staggering slowly, and swaying
Heavily at each slow foot's lift and drag,
With tense eyes careless of the roar and throng
That under jut and jag
Of half-built wall and scaffold streams along,
Six bowed men straining strong
Bear hardly lifted, a huge lintel stone.
This ignorant thing and prone,
Mere dumbness, blindly weighing,
A brute piece of blank death, a bone
Of the stark mountain, helpless and inert,
Yet draws each sinew till the hot veins swell
And sweat-drops upon hand and forehead start,
Till with short pants the suffering heart
Throbs to the throat, where fiercely hurt
Crushed shoulders cannot heave; till thought and sense
Are nerved and narrowed to one aim intense,
One effort scarce to be supported longer!
What tyrant will in man or God were stronger
To summon, thrall and seize
The exaction of life's uttermost resource
That from the down-weighted breast and aching knees
To arms lifted in pain
And hands that grapple and strain
Upsurges, thrusting desperate to repel
The pressure and the force
Of this, which neither feels, nor hears, nor sees?

The Brutality of Moving Pictures

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I am told that the films exhibited in our moving picture shows are subject to some kind of censorship. If so it is of a very lax character. I have visited several of those shows of late, taking a child with me on each occasion and on no occasion could I conscientiously sit through the performance. My judgment of these shows on the whole is that they are of a most pernicious character. They are all good in spots, so good that it is too bad they should be marred by films that no child should be permitted to see. There is much wholesome entertainment in them for children, and each time that I visited a show it was with the hope that nothing would occur to jar on the sensibilities of little ones, but, alas, I was always disappointed. I am not thin-skinned, nor do I think that children should be kept in glass cases or reared with puritanic squeamishness, yet I have been shocked at the spectacle of little boys and girls gazing at some of the awful scenes presented in moving-picture shows. For example, in a little theater on Sacramento street near Central avenue last Sunday afternoon I saw a score of little ones viewing a scene of squalor and debauchery in a den occupied by a hag and a young girl. A man entered, produced a bottle of liquor, handed it to the woman and she drank. Then he forced the bottle between the lips of the girl and poured the liquor down her throat. In the next scene the girl was sprawling on the floor in an intoxicated condition. I was accompanied by a boy of seven and another under three years. I rushed them out of the place Two weeks ago I was in a show on Clement street near Sixth avenue, where I witnessed a burglary. The maid of the house was the friend of the burglars. To recover a golden necklace she went to their den, plied them with liquor, got them intoxicated and thus achieved a triumph. In the same show was presented a gallows scene, the noose hanging down and the black-robed priest was ready for the execution. Now where are our censors? Surely no person of ordinary intelligence believes that it does no harm to let children ranging from three to fifteen years witness such scenes as I have depicted. Why should little tots be given such gruesome impressions as they are bound to receive at moving picture shows? Why should boys and girls of ten be made familiar with the aspects of vice and all sorts of crime? Whenever a performance that appeals to prurient tastes is given at one of the big theaters an awful uproar is raised by our ministers and club women, but surely it is more desirable to safeguard children from contact with scenes of vice than to put salacity beyond the reach of grown-ups.

Sincerely yours,

May 23. —A Father.

A Royalist Heard From

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I read on the second page of Monday's Chronicle that Dr. J. de Sousa Bettencourt, Vice-Consul-General of Portugal, returned to his post Sunday after a year's absence in Portugal, bringing news of the new republic established in his native land. He says he is a personal friend of President Braga. Perhaps that's why he is so enthusiastic about the republic and the republicans. On the first page of Monday's Chronicle was a despatch from London to the effect that a counter-resolution is about to be started in Northern Portugal "where discontent with the new regime has been manifested in strikes at Oporto." From this despatch I learn that Lisbon is expected to follow the example of the North; that disorder has long been rampant at the capital; that robberies and housebreaking are of almost daily occurrence and the authorities seemingly powerless. At Oporto business is at a standstill and there is uneasiness everywhere. All this is corroborative of private advices which I have received. The Provisional Government of Portugal is very much in disfavor Its conduct has alienated some of the best men in the country. Take for instance, Jose Pereira de Sampaio, director of the Republican journal "Diario da Tarde" of Oporto. He is a Republican who enjoys a great reputation in Portugal on account of his literary ability, his honesty and disinterestedness. He became thoroughly disgusted with the Government owing to the manner in which the conservative and independent press was wiped out. It is notorious that the Provisional Government has never been able to preserve order or administer justice

XXIII—DUNCAN E. McKINLAY

By Edward F. O'Day

"Do you want to go back to Congress?"

I knew it was a bromidic question to ask a lame duck. Theoretically all lame ducks are waiting and yearning for another splash in the congressional pond. But one easily forgets that Duncan McKinlay is a lame duck. As he stood before me in one of the most cheerful offices in the none too cheerful Custom House, with the sun glinting on his light hair and the light of happiness shining in his eyes, he did not look like a lame duck. There is something cheerless about the idea of a lame duck. It suggests a creature of limited capacities reduced by regrettable accident from its wont of ungraceful waddling to still more ungraceful limping. Speaking figuratively, the mischance of politics has left Duncan McKinlay limping, but as it did not take him long to limp into a nicely furnished federal office from which he surveys the customs of the port for five thousand dollars a year, he is not a legitimate object of pity. Expend your commiseration on other fowls of the species, if you will, but shed no tears over the lame-duckishness of Duncan McKinlay.

As I looked at him and dealt my bromidic question McKinlay was very happy. He was in his element. He was embracing an armful of newspapers. The newspapers, be it confessed, have not always treated McKinlay with elaborate respect. Some of them have even called him "Dunk" McKinlay and "Dunk" is an abbreviation which displeases even so forgiving a public man as Duncan McPherson of Santa Cruz. But on the Chautauqua circuit and before Boards of Trade and Chambers of Commerce Duncan McKinlay is never thought of so disrespectfully and it happened that the newspapers which he was embracing were filled with the reports of his Chautauqua lectures, his Board of Trade speeches and his Chamber of Commerce talks. Hence the happiness that shone in the McKinlay eyes as he hugged the papers and returned my gaze.

"Do you want to go back to Congress?"

Speaking conservatively, the question did not please him. It evoked disagreeable memories. So I was not surprised to see the light of Chautauqua happiness fade from his eyes while a steely stare took its place. His answer was carefully considered.

"I shall never run again," he said, "against a millionaire under the direct primary law. My purse is not long enough to beat a man with ten millions. If a man cares to pose as a purist and at the same time buy votes, he can be nominated. For you can buy any constituency in America if you have enough money, especially under the direct primary law. All you have to do is to hire enough men to work for you. That was the way Sibley accomplished his election in Pennsylvania and you can't stop it except by a stringent purity of election law."

Decidedly, I was glad that I had put that bromidic question. I did not expect so piquant an answer. There is art in that answer. It says a great deal directly and by subtle indirection it suggests a great deal more. Of course one is never at liberty to read meanings into the language of the interviewed. One must take it for its superficial value and refrain from mining for its hidden metal. But if Duncan McKinlay had asked me, not in his capacity of lame duck, not in his capacity of surveyor of customs, but simply as man to man, what I thought he meant by that answer to my innocent question, I should have answered boldly that I considered it a hard swat at Congressman Bill Kent of Kentfield. Far be it from me to say whether Duncan McKinlay would have admitted the soft impeachment. I am quite sure he would have done nothing of the sort—for publication.

"I have been on the political rostrum," he told me, "for twenty years and I have never yet criticised a political opponent. I consider it ungentlemanly and impolitic. And I am not a squealer. I am a dead game sport, whether the game be politics or anything else."

So there you are. No use to ask McKinlay, for publication, whether he was aiming a Reno jolt at Kent of that ilk. One can only surmise these things, for purposes of publication. One can only recall that at the last election Duncan McKinlay did indeed run against a millionaire for Congress; and that of a verity the event proved that the McKinlay purse was not long enough to beat a man worth ten millions. One can only muse on the curious coincidence that ten millions is exactly the figure at which Bill Kent's fortune is estimated. Groping further into the maze of McKinlay's answer, one can only reflect that during the last congressional campaign in the second Californian district it was currently reported and firmly believed that a great deal of money was spent by a candidate who certainly did pose as a purist. One cannot get away from the fact that many men were hired to work for that candidate, but whether their "work" was really laborious or merely thirst-provoking I leave it to the experts to determine. For the rest I can only say that California, to the regret of many, lacks a stringent purity of election law; and that the late Congressman Sibley, had he lived in California, might have escaped many of the embarrassments which dimmed the glory of his congressional victory.

Analyzed thus the McKinlay answer would be pregnant with meaning. It would prove McKinlay the possessor of a pretty talent for euphemism. It would demonstrate that a man can be gentlemanly and politic and still criticise a political opponent. But McKinlay did not authorize me to indulge in analysis, for publication. Public men must be very careful of their public utterances. In this regard McKinlay is as careful as they make 'em. To borrow the language of one of our most epigrammatic superior judges, compared to McKinlay the Sphinx is a gibbering gossip.

Pursuing the subject of McKinlay's ambitions I found him indifferent to the lure of public life. In this, however, he is not singular. Most of the public men I have had the privilege of conversing with have been similarly indifferent.

"I have reached the point," he told me, "where I am almost able to choose my way of living. One road to me is very much the same as another. If at some future time I can be of service to my former constituents I shall be willing to serve them in Congress once more. But sometimes I think that this will be the last political office I shall ever hold."

One need not be too much alarmed at language of this sort. Those who are eager to see McKinlay continue in public life need not be downcast at the prospect uncovered by these words. It may be stated with confidence that he is not thinking of resigning his present position.

"This is a nice dignified position and I like it," he admitted, including in a quick gesture the whole sunlit room with its oaken furniture and its settee full of newspapers and newspaper cuttings. The sight of those cuttings brought the look of happiness back to his eyes; so he qualified his last statement.

"But there is something I like better. Lecturing. I want to follow up my Chautauqua work. I was receiving one hundred dollars a lecture when I quit it. Besides that I made many speeches for the love of the thing. Even now I am preparing lectures and speeches which I shall deliver free of charge. I do it because it's fun for me."

Thus does the propagandist overshadow the politician. Tired of swinging around the political circle, especially in competition with a millionaire, and not too deeply impressed with the honors and emoluments of a nice dignified federal job, McKinlay longs for the leisured going of the Chautauqua circuit wherein one jogs in comfort from peaceful town to sleepy hamlet spreading the gospel of political purity and economic enlightenment and ever and anon hearkening for the voice of the old constituency whom it will be a pleasure to serve if the demand is properly insistent and there is no millionaire with ten millions to interpose his disconcerting canvass. Meanwhile there is one of the sunniest rooms in the new Custom House as a comfortable point of vantage from which to survey the customs of the port at five thousand dollars per annum.

Encouraging Export Figures

Merchandise exports for the first nine months of the current fiscal year exceed by $100,000,000 those of any earlier corresponding period. Particularly noticeable is the increase in shipments of manufactured wares. In a list of thirty-three articles and groups of articles only two show a decrease in comparison with the preceding year. The exceptions are illuminating oil and railway rails. The gain in the list is from $361,000,000 in 1909 to $430,000,000 in 1911, an increase of nearly 20 per cent. Even cotton cloth shows a gain. The trade in automobiles grew from $5,400,000 to $8,300,000. There were gains of $2,000,000 in mowers and reapers, of $2,400,000 in tools and builders' hardware, of $900,000 in boots and shoes, of $2,000,000 in electrical appliances, of $900,000 in typewriters, of $2,600,000 in metal working machinery, of $1,800,000 in photographic goods, and of $2,100,000 in ploughs and cultivators. Never before has there been a record so satisfying in its scope and variety. The record in shipments of manufactures for further use in manufacturing is only less satisfactory. It shows an increase from $200,000,000 to $225,000,000. There was a gain of $6,000,000 in copper, of $5,000,000 in lumber, of $3,200,000 in resin. Upper leather and paraffin are the exceptions to a general increase. Foodstuffs show a decline from $296,000,000 to $287,000,000. Meat and dairy products made an insignificant gain of $2,000,000 and flour dropped $2,000,000. Corn increased $8,000,000 and wheat dropped $23,000,000, partly because of lower prices, but mainly because of smaller shipments. Fruit shows a $5,000,000 increase, and cattle a $3,500,000 decrease. As crops were good the only inference from the foodstuffs account is an increased domestic consumption.

Resting at Wormwood Scrubbs

It requires a degree of optimism worthy of Mark Tapley to discover the pleasant side of imprisonment for eighteen months, but Frederick Martyn has accomplished this seeming impossibility. Martyn is a London tradesman who got into the Bankruptcy Court and for an offense against his creditors was sentenced to eighteen months hard labor at Wormwood Scrubbs. He took his medicine with resignation and having finished his term, wrote "A Holiday in Gaol." Everything went on smoothly until the warden remonstrated with him for the "beastly habit" of washing before each meal. The warden said it spoiled the look of the wash bowl and affected his reputation for not keeping things tidy. Martyn was reported only once, and that was for reading the Bible during the chapel service. Religion is purely official in the great gaols, and they don't want too much of it. There is a Bible in every cell, but the prisoners are terribly afraid of reading a book with any religion in it. "Give me a Braddon," is the prisoner's cry for fiction. The chaplain gave one convict a copy of Grant Allen's "Tents of Shem," but he wouldn't open the book, and it was three days before he could get another. "Sherlock Holmes" was excluded as not tending to the moral elevation of the prisoners. Martyn, although he had been used to good dinners, did not find the food unpalatable; but he sadly missed both mustard and pepper, which for some unknown reason are regarded as luxuries. The tragedy of his stay in the Scrubbs was due to a maliciously jocular warden who told him that he would have roast beef and plum pudding and a cup of beer on Christmas Day. But after morning service in the chapel, where he sang lustily, Martyn found the warden enjoying his cruel joke as the prisoners sat down to a repast of a little meat with the greasy cocoa, bread and potatoes, according to the rule. Still the wardens were humane enough when they were treated with deference and respect. Their duties are very onerous, and Martyn says that "if there are any persons in the prisons who do work that can be honestly described as hard labor it is the wardens and not the prisoner who is sentenced to it." In fact, the wardens are "a decent lot of fellows."

Bearding the Mayor

The pastor of a Syrian Greek Orthodox Church recently wrote a letter to Mayor Gaynor complaining of the frequent indignities to which he was subjected while walking the streets of New York, on account of the luxuriant beard he wears. It seems that the pastor's "beard and hoary hair stream'd, like a meteor, to the troubled air" and that mischievous boys tincanned him. They were too young to realize that "he that hath a beard is more than a youth, and he that hath none is less than a man." Mayor Gaynor was not unduly sympathetic, as may be seen from his answering letter: Reverend and Dear Sir: Your letter informing me that as you walk about the city visiting the homes of your parishioners people apply opprobrious names to you and throw empty cans and rubbish at you and otherwise assault you on account of your beard is at hand. You ask me: "Is it a crime in the city of New York to wear a beard?" No, it is not. I wear one myself and nobody ever takes any notice of it. How is it they take notice of your beard? Have you trimmed it in some peculiar way contrary to the Scriptures? For you know the Scriptures say: "Ye shall not round the corners of your heads, neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard." Yes, if they assault you, throw cans at you, you have a right to defend yourself to the last extremity, but if you find it necessary I will have a detective go around with you for a few days until we arrest some of those who are wronging you. Are you certain that it is your beard which is the cause of the trouble. Sincerely yours, W. J. Gaynor, Mayor.

A Flurry on the Persian Border

Another of the little disturbances which are constantly breaking out under cover of the pax Britannica is reported from the Persian border. The Government of India has determined to put down gun running and has sent out a combined land and naval force with that object in view. It is India that acts, and not Great Britain, though the ships naturally are British and the scene of operations is one about which Germany has no say, so that if the Powers make trouble later and Russia feels that her pretentions in Persia are threatened, the Foreign Office will be able to disavow anything that may have been done. The gun running has become a serious nuisance; it is the cause of more disorder inland, along the border of India and in southern Persia. Apart from the illicit traffic, the Sultan of Muscat, under an agreement between England and France which the former country is trying to modify, has the right to trade in arms and ammunition within his domains. The best customers are the Afghans, whom the British hardly care to see well armed, but with whom they cannot interfere officially, and especially the Afridi tribes in the mountain passes, over whom they do try to exercise supervision and whose possession of arms is an immediate danger. The trade is carried on by smuggling boatloads of arms and ammunition from the Arabian coast of the Persian Gulf to points on the Persian and Baluchistan shores, where, if they escape the vigilance of the British cruisers, they are delivered to armed bodies of Afghans or Afridis who have crossed the intervening country to receive them.

Porto Rico's Prosperity

To any one not familiar with the facts the great growth of Porto Rican trade will seem exaggerated. Since 1901 the exterior trade of the island has grown from $17,000,000 to $68,000,000. Conditions are very good in all industries. Coffee planting, for a long time stagnant, is now prospering. Most of the coffee goes to Cuba where Porto Rico gets the benefit of a preferential rate of duty. Many Americans are going into the fruit industry. Projects for the capitalization of the island's greatest resources, climate and scenery, are being pushed vigorously. There is to be a big hotel at San Juan which is bound to become a great resort. There are 800 miles of fine automobile roads in the island. A great advantage is that the season lasts for five months instead of for sixty or seventy days as in many eastern winter resorts. Last year there were 8,000 tourists and many more this winter. One improvement which, however, diminishes the picturesqueness of the natives, is the comparative elimination of the hookworm. Major Bailey Ashford, the man who discovered the hookworm disease in the western hemisphere, has cured 300,000 cases in Porto Rico. There is hardly any hookworm now in the towns and lowlands, but it still exists in the coffee districts and the hill country where about seventy-five per cent of the laboring classes are affected, thus reducing the value of labor fifty per cent.

Selective Cannibalism

If cannibalism is "the eating of human flesh by human beings" the Papuans of New Guinea are cannibals in spite of Dr. H. A. Lorenz. In addressing the Royal Geographical Society in London recently on the subject of his successful ascent of Wilhelmina Peak (15,125 feet) in the Snow Mountains the doctor made this defence of these natives of New Guinea: "Until more convincing proofs are forthcoming I cannot believe that the Papuans, whom we visited, are real cannibals—that is to say, that they feed on human flesh, the conditions in which they live being too favorable. That there exist ceremonies at which the heart and the brains are consumed in order to secure the courage and the intellect of the slain enemy I can readily believe, but I do not consider that cannibalism." It is not an attractive subject, but how much of an enemy must a Papuan devour to make him a cannibal in the judgment of Dr. Lorenz?

The Hill

By Adelheid Weber (From the German)

May 3, 18—.

I am seventeen today. Will my life begin now?—the true, real, large, mysterious, alluring, terrible life? That life which holds undreamed-of grandeur and unknown fear—through whose fathomless eyes I would look into the profoundest depths?

Mama says, and all my aunts repeat, that I, with my seventeen years, am altogether fortunate in a sense in which I never will be again. I am young, healthy, pretty, rich; I have a dear brother, a sister who preaches of reason, school friends who come to visit me gladly and with whom I may sing, dance, ride, play, and even a couple of young fellows who say pretty things to me. Oh, yes, I am in love with everything that belongs to me, naturally. I love our beautiful park, our fields and our forest. I love our people and our animals, especially the fillies, who scamper about as if everything lay before them, and the cows with their big, soft, stupid, surprised eyes. I always think they see something of life, but are not able to understand it. Still, behind our park, the fields, the wood and the sunshine and the rain, behind the dear circumscribed day's life, lie the hills that point backward with their blue fingers. And far beyond them, so far that I cannot see it, lies the big hill, the highest peak—and he who stands on the summit looks into the clouds and over the earth, and sees the beauty and the mystery and the flame.

Shall I ever reach the summit of that hill? Shall I?

Of all those with whom I live, who has been on that hill? Not mama. Certainly not Maxi. They are both happy in the garden. And the silly servant girls, they never dream that there is a hill.

But Arno—Cousin Arno? Yes! He knows everything, he's seen everything, he can do everything. In my infancy— for he was at college when I was still toddling, and is now, at the age of thirty, head physician at the hospital—when I was still very little, he was my all in all, my highest example and my surest refuge. When others would laugh or scold me for my questions he always answered them, and his answers, from the beginning to the middle and end, contained the truth. He had faith in me, and under his eyes I was able to stretch myself, to grow—live.

With his tall, thin and slightly stooped figure, his longish, refined, fair face, his light, clear, kindly eyes, his deliberate and concise way of speaking, he seemed to me like Mahadoh, the Lord of Earth, who wanders among people as a friend and a man. And now he is coming here! He will be here in a fortnight! That is my biggest, biggest birthday gift!

May 24, 18—.

Yes, sing now, nightingale; blossom, all ye shrubs; murmur and jump, dear brook, for I am to be a bride. I am to be his bride, he who has always been the light in my life, without whom I was not able to picture my existence. He who has been bound up with all my thoughts ever since I can remember—the first, the wisest, the best of all men—loves me. Now I shall live, live!

We are to be married in the coming year. I am quite content. I am now all his and nothing touches me that does not emanate from or lead to him.

I am a bride! I am really and truly his bride!

Florence, May 3, 18—.

It is three weeks now since I have been his wife—here in Florence, where life is like a flower. I am his young wife!

It seems to me as if he were standing on the hill, like a giant, holding me in his outstretched hand between Heaven and earth, as Zeus held Nike. And I am looking down at life from the height. But there is still something unreal to me about it. I feel as if uprooted, partly flying and partly balancing myself. Nothing that I have experienced, thought or believed, compares with my present situation. What I am now living bursts on me like the stormings from another world. There is a joy in me as of a thousand singing larks—but it is all a dream. I am flying, and only his dear outstretched hand upholds me.

Berlin, September 8, 18—.

Most delightful are the evenings alone with him by the fireside. I sit on his knee and we gaze into the leaping flames and love each other.

Sometimes we go together and listen to some grand music, and when it sounds most beautiful our eyes bathe in each other and our souls, like a pair of little birds, seat themselves on the wings of the eagle and soar with him high above space and time.

Sometimes also friends come to visit us, and they say clever things to Arno and I listen with all my ears, as he says. Or they compliment me and I am pleased that their praise may make me more beautiful in his eyes. Everything is like the singing of birds in the forest, through which I am going hand in hand with the most beloved of men—through the beautiful, green wood, up, up to the hill above, and life grows ever grander and nobler.

October 10, 18—.

For two together, yes! Arno always keeps pace with me. No, he presses on and leads me with him, and we grow ever nearer together, we two.

But the third! Will not that be the wedge to separate us? How can I keep pace with him with a burden in my arms?

I am so full of anxiety. When the worst is over I shall be hedged in by my duties, and shall always be thinking of the other.

But I will not give in! I am still so young! I must still go on growing, learning, experiencing all the delights of life, even with two pairs of arms pressing on me.

My hill! My beautiful hill!

November 5, 18—.

It is beginning now, and it will soon drive us apart. I shall become nothing more than his servant, his housekeeper. It is true I am being looked after as I have never been before; but it is only for his sake, and I am often so irritated as to lose all my self control. Arno is always quiet and waiting silently until I come to myself again. I am always in the wrong; but it seems to me as if the sum total of all this wrong will amount to a right.

Today I am to experience a very great event. The Countess Hahn-Hahn has come once more from Berlin, before she enters the convent, and is to take breakfast with Meta Elbenschutz. And although Meta loves me dearly and knows my enthusiastic respect for the Countess Hahn-Hahn—(the countess always insists on her title before her nom-de-plume; no common person could have written those novels in which countesses live and suffer)—but I am losing myself in a Chinese puzzle-box; it is always so, thinking about Arno. Meta has invited me to meet the countess, the most interesting woman of the century, at whose feet men have thrown themselves and who, tired of fame, is now about to retire to a convent. She was the poetess who had raised for us the ideal woman: the noble-minded woman freed from the prose of the work-a-day life, and she lives now only for the furthering of the "immense soul" and her ardent heart, both of which a man could never understand. A man only wants a wife for his servant, and to be a nurse for his children. I have learned that now also for myself and without looking into the novels of the countess. Ah! She is really standing on the hill and won't allow any man to bring her down! But I—

I would have spoken to Arno about that breakfast, but I cannot bear his jeers at the countess. I hoped he'd be at the hospital when I should have to leave, and so hurried dressing myself. But I wanted to wear my shot-gold and green dress and couldn't fasten my waist. As I was struggling with it, red in the face—it was troublesome to call my maid—and tore at the buttons, Arno suddenly entered.

"What are you doing?" he asked in his quiet, peaceful way. I became redder still and vexation made me obstinate.

"I am getting ready to breakfast with Meta Elbenschutz," I answered and looked him defiantly in the eyes.

He laughed a little and came closer. He looked mildly irritated and serious. I turned towards the mirror and began strenuously to fix my waist. Behind me I saw Arno's quietly smiling face looking on.

"It won't do, little Elsie," he said in a friendly tone, "and you won't please the countess in your condition. She loves only heavenly women, with 'immense' but empty souls. A blooming mother would be most obnoxious to her."

"And to me, too!" I exclaimed, beside myself.

"You don't believe that," he answered. "You are young and do not understand, but you are not heartless and lost to a sense of duty."

Up to this point I know every word we said to each other. But now my words began running from me and then galloping, and his answers fell like sword-thrusts, until, at last—

But I will let it rest here.

In the end I threw my waist and then myself on the sofa and fell into hysterical sobbing.

And he, who had stood quiet with tender patience at all my nervous excitement, he went out of the room without even looking at me and without a word, and left me to lie in my tears.

My heart stood still with quite a new experience of fear; my sobs ceased as if the closing door had cut them off. I raised myself and looked about me. The room was really empty.

A great anger shot glowing to my head. Then came the hot shame that I had bared my troubles before such cold eyes. But all vanished before this new and strange feeling of fear. I felt—and I can explain it no differently—as if I had been walking for a long time, and always hand in hand in eager talk with a loved person, and he had now suddenly let go my hand and had turned and let me alone; and I was now seeing for the first time that the country through which I had been

Immunity for Kent

Apparently there is a conspiracy of silence among the dailies of San Francisco in the interest of Representative "Billy" Kent, the multi-millionaire reformer, concerning whose business affairs a great deal of interesting information is coming out in Washington. Why the dailies are protecting Mr. Kent from unpleasant publicity I am curious to know. I can account for their amiable attitude toward him on no other hypothesis than that he has some powerful connections through which he commands their respect and indulgence. Kent, though engaged in many business enterprises, is seldom heard of as a figure in the commercial world. For example it is not generally known that he is one of the principal owners of the Tamalpais railroad. Until the Golconda Cattle Company was indicted it was not generally known that he was the financial backer of that corporation. Of late it has been learned that he is one of the largest sheep owners in the West. He is reported to sell between $100,000 and $200,000 worth of wool annually. Furthermore it is said that the expense of production including labor, rent of lands and interest on the investment are offset by his profits from the natural increase of his flocks and the sale of their meat products. He owns 30,000 sheep in several States. And now he is making political capital out of his sentiment toward the wool schedule. He is in favor of free wool, and he can well afford to be as he knows that there isn't much chance of the tariff being reduced.

Favored by the Octopus

That there is a compact of some kind between Kent and the daily press is a suspicion justified by their apparent reluctance to print the news about him even when it is of the most sensational character. For example though his campaign for Congress was marked by a prodigality unsurpassed in the history of the State, though the scandal of it was of a character that appealed most potently to the newspaper instinct of sensationalism it was never exploited in the press. Nor has the local press published the news from Washington of his efforts to extricate himself from the embarrassment resulting from the indictment of the Golconda Company. Nay, they have even suppressed a most sensational piece of news which might serve as a very juicy morsel of food for thought in these days of pharisaical reform. This piece of news was wired to the Sacramento Union last Monday. It is to the effect that Kent, the vociferous reformer, is a preferred shipper over the Southern Pacific and has been allowed to lease grazing lands from that company at unusually low prices. Now, how about this? Incredible, isn't it? Would Mr. Kent, the progressive reformer, the uncompromising enemy of the Octopus, the financial backer of the current dispensation, the man with the leg to which all the virtuous patriots in California are clinging tenaciously—would this illustrious patriot with the Chicago past accept favors from the corporation that is to be put out of business on account of its pravity and traditional iniquities? Let us hope that Mr. Kent is but for the moment a victim of malign misrepresentation. Perhaps the "interests" are conspiring against him. The "interests" are incorrigible.

His Generous Proposal

According to the story from Washington Secretary of the Interior Fisher has sent the papers in the case against Kent's company to the attorney-general without recommendation. Furthermore the papers show that even after indictment the company instead of repenting fenced another tract of twenty-five thousand acres of government land. And the despatch says Kent has been trying to settle the case out of court and that he has offered, now that he has been caught, to pay the government rental at the same rates he pays the Southern Pacific. Shades of Gifford Pinchot! this is awful. Something wrong about it of course, but why are the dailies silent? Kent being innocent has nothing to conceal. The fierce white light for him at all times, so why not let it beat?

Kent's Briar Pipe

Even as Governor Johnson grafted democratic simplicity on the gubernatorial dignity, so has that other sterling reformer the Hon. Bill Kent of Kentfield carried the ways of the plain people into aristocratic Washington. And both have accomplished this through the medium of a briar pipe. From an observing correspondent I learn that "Kent is one of the few congressional pipe smokers noticed around the Capitol. Many statesmen smoke pipes in the privacy of their offices or apartments, but Kent sees no reason why one should not smoke a pipe in public as well as a cigarette or a cigar. He is a familiar sight in the House lobbies and corridors smoking a briar pipe, which he evidently enjoys as much as most other millionaires enjoy expensive Havanas." This is an age of symbols and I see a symbolical significance in this devotion of Governor Johnson and Congressman Kent to the homely briar. I do not mean to insinuate any depreciation of the affection which these noted reformers profess for their fellows, so I will not apply to them the Swinburnian line, "Their love is like a briar that rasps the flesh." No, these men are philosophers and they absorb philosophy with their nicotine. The thoughts which flit through their great minds as they pull on their pipes were admirably expressed three hundred years ago by George Withers in the following verses:

The Indian weed, withered quite,
Green at noon, cut down at night,
Shows thy decay; all flesh is hay.
Thus thinke, then drinke tobacco.

The pipe that is so lily-white
Shows thee to be a mortal wight;
And even such, gone with a touch.
Thus thinke, then drinke tobacco.

And when the smoke ascends on high,
Thinke thou beholdst the vanity
Of worldly stuffe, gone with a puffe.
Thus thinke, then drinke tobacco.

And when the pipe grows foul within,
Think on thy soule defil'd with sin,
And then the fire it doth require.
Thus thinke, then drinke tobacco.

The ashes that are left behind
May serve to put thee still in mind,
That unto dust return thou must.
Thus thinke, then drinke tobacco.

Hard-Working Works

Senator John D. Works is one of the busiest men in Washington. Although sent to the national capital for the prime purpose of securing legislation desired by California, he is no narrow sectionalist but embraces other parts of the country in the broad scope of his energetic statesmanship. Since his arrival in Washington he has been investigating local conditions and finds much to reform. As a first step in his laudable design he has introduced two bills. One of these aims to reduce the number of saloons from 528 to 100. He has discovered that Washington has nearly the same population as Los Angeles which possesses 200 saloons. Why he should want Washington to do with half as many as

Los Angeles it is difficult to say. Perhaps he thinks that Washington is only half as thirsty as Los Angeles. Los Angeles, it must be conceded, is quite a thirsty town; but it cannot measure its drinking capacity against Washington. To go no further with the argument, Washington must slake the thirst of 391 congressmen and 91 senators (leaving Senator Works out of the reckoning). Another bill introduced by Senator Works would compel all the street railways of the District of Columbia to exchange transfers. This bit of proposed legislation was also inspired by study of conditions in Los Angeles. Clearly, having removed the beam in Los Angeles Senator Works is after the mote in Washington.

The First Taft Editor

Controversy has been waging between Chester Rowell of the Fresno Republican and Friend Richardson of the Berkeley Gazette as to which one wrote the first editorial in California urging the Republican party to make Taft its standard bearer. After a recent interview with the President, Rowell claimed the honor, very much to the disgust of Richardson who insisted that his was the first editorial pen to make the suggestion. I asked Duncan McKinlay the other day whether he was in a position to settle the dispute and he promptly replied in the affirmative. He told me that after he returned from the Philippines whither he had accompanied the Taft party, he received a tip from Washington that Roosevelt would not be a candidate for the presidency but would enlist all his following in the cause of Taft. McKinlay says Editor Richardson called on him just after he received this tip and that after hearing the news Richardson hurried to his sanctum and wrote the pioneer Taft editorial. He added that the second one was published in the Oakland Tribune two days later. "But where did Rowell come in?" I asked. In common with many others I had always supposed that he too was a pioneer of the Taft movement. "He came in at the tail end of the procession," said McKinlay.

Taft and California Politics

But no matter where Chester Rowell figured in the last Taft campaign, it is much more interesting to speculate as to where he and his reforming associates will figure in the next one. Meyer Lissner has been in Washington with Rowell and I learn from a correspondent who mirrors the thoughts and sentiments of California reformers that the national capital is "still throbbing with gossip" about their visit. Apparently Rowell and Lissner played no favorites in Washington. They conferred with La Follette, Cummins and Bristow on the one hand and with President Taft on the other. At the conclusion of a series of pow-wows they exhibited the restraint of which they are capable at a pinch by refraining from writing a presidential and vice-presidential slate for the guidance of the next national convention. What they did do was "simply to talk about Governor Johnson for a place on the ticket," (I am quoting the friendly correspondent), "leaving one to infer that if Taft is to have the renomination, it would be excellent politics to name Johnson as his running mate." Whether President Taft and Senators La Follette, Bristow and Cummins agree with Rowell and Lissner that this would be "excellent politics" I am at a loss to guess. But the possibilities of the approaching political line-up in California Republicanism may be inferred from the friendly correspondent's statement that "of course, if the progressives are eventually to give Taft their support, they will have to come into a semblance of harmony with the California regulars." "A semblance of harmony" is a great thing but it doesn't carry elections.

The Old Story

Once more the police department is in the midst of political intrigue. There was a time when the police department was, as it should be, out of politics. One man ruled the destinies of the police department for a quarter of a century, and in those days property and individuals enjoyed absolute security. The chief of police was independent of editors, mayors and political bosses. It wasn't essential to his welfare to keep his ear either to the ground or to the telephone wire leading to editorial rooms. He involved himself in no intrigues, he attended to nothing but police business. This halcyon state of affairs ended when the Hon. James D. Phelan invented the Charter with its special facilities for the oiling of political machines. From that time police department scandals and intrigues have been a continuous performance. The Charter made the chief of police the mayor's puppet, and such being the case Mayor McCarthy is justified in insisting that Chief Seymour shall be beholden to him rather than to Mr. Fremont Older or any other equally sacrosanct citizen. If we don't like Mayor McCarthy it is our privilege to turn him out at the end of his term, but meanwhile the police department is his oyster. If the people have more confidence in Chief Seymour than in Mayor McCarthy the removal of the chief will do the mayor more harm than good, but if the influences that are employing Chief Seymour as a pretext for swatting Mayor McCarthy are identical with those that conducted the conspiracy against Chief Biggy then let us not be too sure that the whole truth has come to the surface, but let us rather expect the usual reaction that comes from intemperate zeal for the public good in the midst of a political campaign.

"Are you sure he married her for her money?"
"Absolutely. I've seen her!"

He Saved Hays Hammond

I saw John Harper sitting in the palm court of the Palace the other day and the sight of him evoked old memories. John Harper is a grizzled veteran of the mines who has had as many ups and downs as any man who ever wrested a fortune from the bowels of the earth. At present he has a little mine up at Hennessé Pass in Sierra County and spends most of his time there, hopeful, as all old miners always are, of once more striking it rich. Being a Welchman Harper was born for the mining game and as a young man in New York he speculated in Comstock shares and made a lot of money. Then he came West and won the friendship of John W. Mackay. The two were great pals and when Mackay would stroll into the old Palace and ask for "John," it was always understood that he meant Harper. Perhaps no man in California knows more about mineralogy and metallurgy than John Harper does. He has the miner's wonderful eye for piercing the surface of the ground and seeing what lies beneath. Second only to Mackay as his faithful friend was Adolph Spreckels and this intimacy still exists. But it was his friendship with Mackay which gave him a place in history. That friendship made it possible for John Harper to save the life of John Hays Hammond in the exciting days after the Jamieson raid.

The Message to Baden-Baden

It will be remembered that there was tremendous excitement in this country when the news came that John Hays Hammond, with Captain Thomas Mein of Oakland and others, was lying in a Transvaal jail under sentence of death as a result of his participation in Dr. Jamieson's harry. Those were parlous days for outlanders in the Transvaal and to add to the difficulty of saving Hammond's life was the division of sentiment about his case in the minds of his countrymen Some Americans insisted that the Government should intervene in his behalf; others were just as positive that it should not. Among others Colonel John P. Irish spread the propaganda of non-intervention. Hammond's father-in-law, his brother General Hammond and others met nightly at the Palace to devise ways and means of saving him. They were in desperate straits and enlisted the assistance of a young newspaperman who is still very much in the game here, for the purpose of working up public opinion. One night the cabal was on the point of giving up the fight. They were sitting disconsolately in the Palace court, trying to think of some forlorn hope, when John Harper appeared on the scene.

"Here's the very man we want!" exclaimed the newspaperman. He told Harper of the situation. "I'll cable to John W. Mackay," said Harper. As luck would have it, Mr. and Mrs. Mackay were at Baden-Baden where they had been entertaining the Prince and Princess of Wales, afterwards King Edward and Queen Alexandra. Harper cabled at once to Mackay asking him to enlist the assistance of the Prince of Wales. Mackay did so. The result was the Prince of Wales' famous message to Oom Paul Kruger in which he expressed the hope that no Americans would be made to suffer for participation in the Raid. Oom Paul replied with his equally famous message in which he said that while he could not but feel hostility for Queen Victoria he had nothing but the highest regard for her son and that he would be pleased to consider his request. Hammond's sentence was commuted and he got off with the payment of a heavy fine.

Hammond's Fight with Sully

By the way, when John Hays Hammond arrives in London as special envoy from the United States to the coronation, he might regale King George with the details of his recent scrap with Daniel Sully, the one time cotton king. There were incidents in that scrap which should prove interesting to the king as indicative of American court proceedure. Sully recently brought suit against Hammond for $1,500,000 damages. This was the culmination of a long and bitter feud between the two men. The particular incident which I imagine would tickle the risibles of England's unhumorous ruler occurred in Washington before Examiner Harper who was taking testimony in the suit. Sully's attorney had been badgering Hammond for two hours, and after Hammond had been called a liar twice by the attorney he lost his temper. Finally he blurted out: "This is all a foolish delay. It is simply a foolish attempt to keep me in the city. Maybe you think you can make me stay here till after the 26th or 27th." The reference of course was to Hays Hammond's intention of sailing at that time for dear old Lunnon. Sully's lawyer became wrathy. His face flushed and he shook his finger, Shortridgewise, at the special ambassador But his language was neither Shortridgian nor Chesterfieldian (the two terms are really synonymous). "I don't give a damn when you go or where," he shouted; "but until you answer my questions properly you won't get away from this city tonight or for some time to come." "I have answered all your questions a dozen times," Hay Hammond replied hotly. "You lie," returned the attorney. Hammond made a jump for the lawyer and the lawyer, nothing loth, made a jump for Hammond. But they were intercepted and the picturesque possibility of our special envoy appearing at Westminster with a black eye or a broken nose was averted. Am I right in thinking that King George would enjoy this incident? But will Hays Hammond tell him about it? I have my doubts.

Hearst Is For Him

At the conclusion of that near-bloody hearing Hammond announced that he would leave for Canada and would not return to American jurisdiction until after he had seen King George properly crowned. But evidently he has changed his mind. I noted the other day a despatch in the Examiner which announced that Mr. and Mrs. Hays Hammond would be the dinner guests of Mr. and Mrs. William Randolph Hearst in New York. The lure of the Hearst mahogany is evidently too strong for Hammond's resolution. And well it may be so. For Mr. Hearst has developed of late an astonishing affection for Hammond. Just why this is so I am at a loss to explain, but the reason will be forthcoming, I am sure. Mr. Hearst is an artist in the pursuit of the ulterior motive. It may be that he is desirous of attending the coronation in Hammond's train. If he does, the readers of the Hearst papers will be treated to one of the young millionaire's characteristic screeds. For Hearst hates kings and despises coronations; and if he writes an account of the ceremony at the Abbey he will blister the gilt off the trappings of British state with the white heat of his republican scorn. Only the other day, in an editorial boost of Hays Hammond, obligingly written in response to the request of "a reader," Hearst took occasion to remark that the coronation would be "rather a foolish performance." That was the second Hearst editorial devoted to Hammond within a short space of time. In the first our premier editor suggested that Hammond be sent to Berlin to succeed David Jayne Hill, the retiring ambassador. No wonder the curious are asking, Why is Hearst so strong for Hammond?

Dalton's Dilemma

Assessor Dalton appears to be in a very grave predicament. Literally "caught with the goods on him" it seems difficult to conceive a defense sufficiently plausible to create a reasonable doubt of his guilt in the minds of .. jury. But while the facts appear to be against Dalton the law may be in his favor. In some States a man cannot be convicted of a crime which he was tempted to commit by an officer of justice, and it is by no means certain that a district attorney of this State may participate in a scheme to decoy a person into the commission of a crime and then procure the conviction of the person for the crime thus committed. In Dalton's case, however, it appears that the trap was a matter of his own making. But of course there is another side to the story; at least there is the side which Dalton promises to present. He may tell us that the marked bills were put into his pocket while he wasn't looking. True, he claimed the money when it was taken out of his pocket, but he may expect the jury to believe that he did so in the excitement of the moment. Juries are some times remarkably credulous. This is especially so when a public service corporation is on one side of a case and an individual on the other. There was a time, by the way, when the Spring Valley Water Company would have had small chance of convincing anybody that it had refused to "come through" with a bribe for a public official. And it may be, in view of the long-pending negotiations for the purchase of the plant and the conversions that have occurred, that over in the virtuous town of Oakland there are people sceptical of the reformation of the company.

Lost, One Hundred Thousand Acres

Henry Miller, the cattle king, has lost one hundred thousand acres of land and doesn't know where to find them. It is an unique predicament. One hundred thousand acres of land are not easily lost. A tract of that size covers considerable space on any map. But just the same Henry Miller has lost them. They seem to have disappeared as completely as the lost island of Atlantis and so far careful searching has not discovered them. Miller has had his attorneys busily engaged in subdividing 600,000 acres of his immense holdings. They have been poring over maps, conning deeds and searching records. In their labors they suddenly realized that they had only accounted for five hundred thousand acres. Where were the other one hundred thousand? Miller is one of those wonderful men who are accustomed to keep all their holdings neatly and accurately tabulated in their minds. But Miller is pretty old; his mind is not as keen as it was of yore; and when he was consulted he couldn't for the life of him tell where those one hundred thousand acres ought to be. Are they in California? or in Nevada? or in Idaho? or in Wyoming? He is trying to find out.

The Metropolitan Club in Washington

The Metropolitan Club, the leading organization of its kind in the national capital, which recently aroused the ire of President Taft by blackballing some of his friends has an exclusiveness all its own. It is perhaps the only club in America which looks askance at the applicant for membership who is "in trade." A striking example of its aversion to commercialism in an applicant for membership was furnished in the incident of the two Magruder brothers, J. H. and A. F., scions of an old and distinguished Southern family, financially reduced like many of their kind by the civil war. A. F. Magruder became a surgeon in the navy. His brother became a grocer, and amassed wealth in his business while he garnered nothing but rank and the small pay of a naval officer. The naval brother has long been a popular member of the Metropolitan Club. The grocer brother, despite blue blood and wealth has never been able to get in. So it has been with others in similar position. Wealth is no key to Metropolitan Club membership, nor is poverty a bar to it. Joseph Pulitzer of New York was barred, and it was said that it was because he was a Jew.

McCawley and Potts

Lieutenant-Colonel Charles L. McCawley, of the marines, secretary of the club, who resigned following the Taft incident, is the son of the late Brigadier-General C. G. McCawley, long commandant of the Marine Corps. "Charlie" McCawley has for years been one of the Beaux Brummels of Washington. He is an intimate friend of Theodore Roosevelt, who appointed him military aid at the White House. A gallant soldier in spite of his almost foppish appearance, "Charlie" distinguished himself at Guantanamo, Cuba, in 1898. Captain Templin Morris Potts, of the navy, a governor of the club who resigned with McCawley, is of an old Washington family. He served as flag-secretary to the late Rear-Admiral S. R. Franklin, on the old Pensacola, now the station ship at Goat Island.

Dick Not Disappointed

When I read in the newspapers that a gentleman of whose political activities I had never heard had been appointed to the coveted office of chief wharfinger under the Harbor Commission, my heart went out in sympathy to the Hon. Dick Welch. I had taken it for granted that Dick was a candidate for that position and I had looked on him as rather a formidable candidate. Certainly he deserved well of the admiration, for he fell into line with the Governor's wishes in the matter of the election of a United States senator, although the gubernatorial wishes were in direct opposition to the instructions he had received from the voters of his district. Having pleased the Governor in that and in many other matters Dick was entitled to a reward and I took it for granted that that reward would be the office of chief wharfinger. In my surprise at the appointment of another I could not but express my sympathy to Dick. Imagine my amazement when he told me that he had never sought the office, had never entertained the thought of being a candidate for it, had never discussed the possibility of being a candidate for it with the Governor or anybody else, including all newspapermen, and that the story of his candidacy had been manufactured out of whole cloth by newspapermen who wanted to have a little fun with him. Verily, my amazement was unbounded at this sweeping disclaimer. The only thing Dick did not say was that he would have absolutely refused to take the job if it had been offered to him.

cluding the members of the unofficial "Police Court Bar Association," deluged him with floral offerings. There were enough set pieces to command the respect of the most exacting undertaker at an important funeral and more than sufficient cut flowers to soothe the vanity of a prima donna on her opening night. The peculiar odor of the police court was lost in the exotic fragrance of the blooms that shed their radiance on the new dispenser of justice. His modest blushes were dimmed by the riotous glow of color and his manly beauty paled to insignificance before the opulent charms of roses, carnations, heliotrope and forget-me-nots. Among the other set pieces was a huge affair showing the scales of justice done in all the colors of the rainbow. As they left the cunning fingers of the florist those scales were evenly balanced, but their equilibrium had been slightly disturbed by careless handling. As one onlooker put it, "They inclined just a little bit in the direction of 'a pull.'"

Yellow Journalism and the Japs

From the columns of the Hawaiian Gazette I have just extracted a significant instance of the malign influence exerted by yellow journalism on international relations. That the yellow journals in question happen to be those conducted by William Randolph Hearst simply bears out what I have said time and time again, that the Hearst papers are a serious menace to peace and a provocative to jingoism in this and other nations. The Gazette tells how the Japanese in Hawaii have published a book consisting largely of clippings from articles in the Hearst papers which express an antagonistic opinion of the Japanese people. These clippings are supplemented by sneering criticisms of the American people. The book, it seems, has been widely circulated in the Hawaiian Islands. "Probably you can find one in your servants' quarters," says the Gazette. Whether the book is also for sale in the Japanese book shops of this city I do not know, but I would not be surprised to learn that such was the case. Would it not be well for Mr. Hearst, instead of making speeches in favor of universal peace, to introduce a little conservatism into the columns of his newspapers and thus avoid inflaming the minds of ignorant Japanese as well as ignorant Americans?

Osculation and Press Agency

The stage kiss has long been a favorite theme with the press agent. It came into fashion when Olga Nethersole first conceived the idea of making Carmen's labial embracings the feature of her interpretation of the role of the hot-blooded cigarette-maker. She was so successful in gaining notoriety with the Carmen kiss that she elaborated it into the Sapho kiss and kissing by the clock has been an overshadowing accompaniment of all her roles ever since, not excepting "Sister Beatrice." Other actresses found the stage kiss an easy road to the first page of the yellow journals and have cultivated it assiduously. It loomed large in the New York production of "Natoma," the Redding-Herbert opera. But it remained for Mary Garden to discover for the press agents the importance of the kiss off-stage. In that momentous discovery Charlie Lummis of Los Angeles collaborated and to the great satisfaction of both Mary Garden and Charlie Lummis, their little osculatory interlude was conspicuously noted by the newspapers. So satisfactory were the advertising results that Mary Garden lost no time in repeating the performance. As soon as she had arrived in San Francisco she implanted two chaste salutes on the bewhiskered lips of her dear friend Joe Redding and of course the smacks echoed in every local room in town. The off-stage kiss has evidently come to stay. Let us hope that it will not be overdone by the enthusiastic press agents.

Why Los Angeles is Different

"Why is Los Angeles so different from San Francisco?" was asked of a former San Franciscan who now makes his home in the southern city. "That's a hard question to answer offhand," was the reply, "but it's easy to suggest one reason. Los Angeles has an Iowa society of 35,000 members and a Kansas society of 20,000."

John Drew Was Ruffled

Rare indeed are the occasions when John Drew loses his admirable equipoise. He is a man of carefully modulated equanimity, so to speak, and it is hard to disturb the placidity of his even keel. When occasions chance to arise calling for the exercise of fine scorn or gentlemanly sarcasm, to the end that some too forward person may be gently forced back into his proper position, John Drew is the man to dispense the scorn or turn loose the sarcasm. Only once, so far as I know, has John Drew been found without a word for the obliteration of an exuberant personality. It happened in Portland a couple of years ago, the scene being the lobby of the Hotel Portland and the protagonist of the drama William Thigpen, formerly chief clerk of that hostelry. Picture John Drew, the pink of tailored, barbered and booted perfection, approaching the desk to register. Picture Clerk Thigpen embracing him with a smile of welcome and making captive of his unresisting hand. Picture Thigpen saying, "Why, hello John! How are you? Awfully glad to see you." Picture Drew seeking to quell this obstreperousness of a perfect stranger by a quick lift of the eyebrows. Picture then the clerk continuing, "I hear Ethel's coming soon" and Drew making the mistake of his life by gasping, "Ethel?" "Why, of course, your niece, Ethel Barrymore. We'll be glad to see her. Meanwhile, John, welcome to our city of roses." Picture all this and try to imagine how John Drew felt.

They Are at the Coronation

Have you missed your pet waiter or your favorite barber lately? Inquire into his absence and you will doubtless be surprised to learn that he is off to the coronation. Barbers and waiters are among the greatest travelers in the world and some of them wouldn't think of missing an event like the crowning of His British Majesty. The reason is not far to seek. Barbers and waiters have little trouble working their way across the world. They can find work almost anywhere. At the present time New York is full of barbers and waiters who are marking time until the opportunity to cross the Atlantic presents itself. They are particularly anxious to get to London for the coronation because American barbers and American waiters are very much in demand there. So if the waiter who is used to anticipating your wants or the barber who doesn't have to be told how to trim your hair is missing, don't expect to see him again till after the coronation.

The Divided Barrys

While Richard Barry, the spectacular young war correspondent of this city, is lambasting the cause of woman's suffrage in magazine articles and lectures and drawing down upon his head the lightnings of suffragette wrath, his mother, Mrs. George Barry of Monrovia in this State, is taking the other side of the controversy. I noted the other day that she delivered a speech before an association of suffragettes. Her husband, I believe, is also active in the cause. So is Richard's younger brother Griffin who lately addressed a suffrage meeting in New York. So Richard stands alone in the family. By the way, he has been made an editor of Hampton's Magazine and is already performing the pleasant and unpleasant functions of the job. A local newspaperman went to considerable pains to prepare an article for Hampton's on a subject of great current interest, but Barry offered only $35 for it. What the newspaperman said in his letter declining this remuneration is too acidulous for print but has sent a chuckle through the local rooms of San Francisco.

Miss Miller To Be a Trained Nurse

A very pretty and attractive young society girl will be missed at the smart functions next season, if a plan which she has matured does not break down under the weight of parental and friendly expostulation. I refer to Miss Marian Miller, the daughter of Mr. C. O. G. Miller. This young lady has made up her mind to turn her back on the frivolities and inanities of swagger society and to enter the Children's Hospital for a course in trained nursing. She plans to begin in September and to spend three years in the probation required before a certificate can be obtained. Just what is the actuating motive with Miss Miller I cannot say, but I am inclined to think that she has tired of the monotonous round of teas, receptions and balls that command the time and the energy of the debutante. The false standards which obtain in society may have palled on her, for she has the reputation of being a sensible girl whose insight is unusually acute. That she has had no lack of admirers since her debut adds to the interest of the situation. Her friends are hoping that she will change her mind, some because they look with disfavor upon any young woman who has the independence to choose a useful career and others because they realize the rigors of the hospital training. It will be interesting to see whether Miss Miller persists in her determination. Her health, by the way, has been none too robust. Only recently she returned from a European trip during which she underwent an operation for appendicitis. Miss Miller's mother was the first Mrs. C. O. G. Miller (Mae Tucker of Oakland) who died many years ago.

MRS. ROBERT M. FITZGERALD

Will Mrs. Fry Join Her?

Miss Marian Miller has always been an intimate friend of Mrs. Dollie MacGavin Fry and acted as bridesmaid on the occasion of the church ceremony which followed Dollie MacGavin's first marriage to Douglas Fry. It is current gossip that Mrs. Fry may join her chum at the Children's Hospital when the courts have untied the knot which was tied so suddenly and apparently so auspiciously only a short time ago.

Trained Nurses in Society

Society has already given several recruits to the career of trained nursing. One of the first was Miss Betty Ashe who took a course in Bellevue Hospital, New York. She graduated with honors and her training has been of great value in the settlement and other charity work to which she has given herself so unreservedly. Miss Mary Hoffmann, now Mrs. Johnson of New York, took the course at Bellevue with Miss Ashe, but her capricious temperament prevented her from graduating. Miss Emily Du Bois essayed the career a couple of years ago but did not stay with it. Miss Alyse Warner, the attractive daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Alexander Warner, tried it but found the life too strenuous for her constitution. Miss Elisa Partridge, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Partridge of San Rafael who is also a close friend of Mrs. Douglas Fry, will graduate soon from Cooper College.

Concerning the Size of Feet

At the party which Mr. and Mrs. Harry Alston Williams and their charming daughters, the Misses Muriel, Florence and Corona gave last week in Berkeley, not the least attractive feature of the evening were the solo dances on the verrandah. While the guests were supping at small tables Miss Marian Crocker, the graceful daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Crocker, gave an Indian dance which was pronounced a very artistic performance. Another interesting number was that of Miss Lucy Harrison and her fiance who gave a Dutch dance, wearing wooden shoes. Several other maids contributed with equal success to the program. And apropos of this party, let me commend a certain gallant young man for self denial. A pretty young girl complained that her slippers were not comfortable and the young man offered her his pumps. She accepted the offer and tripped the fantastic all evening while he of course retired in his stockings to the background and did not dance. Query—were the young girl's feet very large—or were the young man's feet extremely small?

A Pig for Miss Crocker

With the finest kennels in California, I am told Miss Jennie Crocker wishes to add a pig to her collection of pets. She but recently confided to a friend her longing for a porker. The heiress would not own a guinea pig. The pet she would cherish must be a simple suckling pig. White with pink eyes are the specifications. Some of the jeunesse doree to whom Miss Crocker's least wish is law are now assiduously pursuing the search of a pig that shall comply with the stated requirements.

The Rainbow Blingumites

Lunching at the St. Francis the other day I saw a group of Blingumites and I was almost blinded by the hues of their sartorial embellishment. All the colors of the spectrum were repeated. Mrs. Vincent Whitney's head-gear was red. It was a spot of primary color that stood out boldly to greet the eye on entering the dining-room. Blue I saw on Mrs. Thomas Eastland's head where reposed a chapeau of clear ultrmarine. The piquant countenance of Mrs. Flora Dean Magee was framed in purple. Mrs. Will Taylor supplied the green note and offered green plumage of some rare bird with its green head-covering that vied with Mrs. Whitney's scarlet. Pink I saw repeated but my dazzled optics could no longer distinguish features. I do not know who the lady in pink was.

[illegible]

She Knew the Way

Those who attended the big McNear party recently given at McNear's Landing are laughing over the mishap of pretty Miss Helen Bertheau.

Miss Bertheau undertook to show one of the guests the attractions of the grounds surrounding the house. She was confident that her many visits had familiarized her with the place and that she could act as a successful cicerone. But alas for such misplaced confidence! They hadn't gone very far before they walked into a fountain. As a result they had to spend quite a long time before a roaring fire drying their clothes.

Mrs. Huntington Coming West

Mrs. Collis P. Huntington may be expected in California within a short time. Two weeks ago she underwent an operation for appendicitis in her big Fifth Avenue home and is now slowly recovering. Owing to her age it was feared by many of her friends that she might have difficulty in pulling through, despite the careful conditions under which the operation was performed, but she rallied promptly from the anesthetic and is convalescing satisfactorily. Mrs. Huntington thinks that the balmy air of California will hasten her recovery and she will start West just as soon as he is able to undertake the journey.

The Slimness of Mrs. Taylor

Mrs. Will Taylor's newly acquired slenderness is very becoming to this animated young matron. She is the second of the Hopkins sisters and is the only one of that pulchritudinous trio to incline to embonpoint. Mrs. Gus Taylor and Mrs. Fred McNear have always had the slim willowy forms that are the envy of their plump friends. Mrs. Taylor's was gained by a rigid system of dieting and gymnastics. All three of the sisters are members of a dancing class that is composed of half a dozen young matrons intent on preserving youth and grace. Miss Florence Hopkins is also a member of the class and dances in a bewitching manner.

Vesta as an Actress

Vesta Shortridge Bruguiere will not find the stage an unfamiliar medium for the exercise of her talents. Although she has never acted in professional company she was very successful as an amateur before her marriage to the temperamental Emil opened up other fields of activity. She was a prominent member of the old Beta Sigma Dramatic Club which gave many finished performances in the days before the fire. Most of the girls who won plaudits in that club have settled down to the calm joys of domesticity. Mrs. Loretta Nolan O'Hara, Mrs. Marcella Fitzgibbon Hogan and Mrs. Therese Murphy Tatum have evinced no longing for the professional stage. But the two other girls who were leaders in the Beta Sigma Club found matrimony distasteful and decided to turn their histrionic talents to account. Only a short time ago Mrs. Lurline Lyons Montgomery joined the Olga Nethersole company and now Mrs. Vesta Shortridge Bruguiere is to have her try-out at the Alcazar.

Generous Joe Redding

Generous collaborator that he is Joseph D. Redding gives all praise to Victor Herbert for "Natoma." It is, musically, in the opinion of the librettist, a great opera, destined to become a classic. It is a great interpretation of an American theme, and unique in music. Thus Mr. Redding, whose eulogies of Herbert are ever ready. Over Mary Garden's performance he will soar into flights of rhapsody. Redding has constituted himself the host of the famous song-bird in her local passage. But seductive Mary has taken opportunity to renew several old acquaintances. Ernest Wiltsee, erstwhile of Paris, has divided the burden of her entertainment.

A Family Casualty

The Family Club Farm opened auspiciously last week. Two hundred members were in attendance and there was only one casualty reported. Jim Armsby sustained a fracture of the fore-arm. He engaged in a base-ball game Sunday morning when the accident occurred, and is now about the club with his arm in a plaster cast but with no diminution of his enthusiasm for life on the Farm. Jim Armsby is the only man in the Family Club who wears a dress-suit for dinner every night. He is pointed to with pride when visitors are shown through the building.

He Admires John Drew

Richard Tobin was at the Columbia with the Fred Kohls Monday night and hastened to extend the hospitality of his house at Burlingame to John Drew on the latter's arrival. The two are old friends. On previous visits Drew has been the guest of Tobin and has entertained him in turn at his Long Island farm. Tobin tells of journeying to New York for the purpose of witnessing Drew's first appearance as a star. He was in the metropolis long enough to assist at this occasion and left next day on the home trip. Through this friendship of long standing Drew's niece Ethel Barrymore became intimate with the Burlingame circle. Mrs. Joseph Sadoc Tobin is her particular chum in California.

The Happy Grahams

It turns out for once that where there was a deal of smoke there was no fire. After the sensational stories about the difficulties which were supposed to be threatening the marital peace of Mr. and Mrs. William Miller Graham of Bellosguardo and London, it appears that all is serene between them. Word comes to me from London where they have been installed at the Ritz, hoping against hope to obtain a suitable house for coronation entertainment, that Mr. and Mrs. Graham are as devoted to each other as bride and groom. I am glad to be able to chronicle this. It always pains me to hear that the dove of peace is fluttering restlessly about any connubial nest. We can only attribute the stories which occupied our attention not long ago to the exaggerations of gossip and express our joy that they lacked foundation.

Mrs. Sproule Here

Mrs. William Sproule was the center of a group in the Palace court the other day. Her hair has lost none of its Leslie Carter effulgence and she looked strikingly handsome. Mrs. Sproule is the only daughter of the house of Baird which has given three or four sons to the stage of local endeavor. They have distinguished themselves in the limelight on sundry occasions. Mrs. Veronica Baird is living in Europe from which point of vantage she still controls the Baird millions. Mrs. Sproule was married when very young to Barry Baldwin, the marriage being against her mother's wishes. She was a widow for several years before her union with William Sproule, at that time a Southern Pacific official. He is now associated with the Guggenheims and their home is in New York.

A Social-Literary Note

Whenever a man or woman whose family figures in our society produces a book I hasten to applaud and to call the effort to the attention of those busy persons who are so crowded with social engagements that they find little time for reading. I do this on the theory that if the excellence of the work itself does not commend it to their perusal the fact that they extend social recognition to the family of the author may induce them to spend a few hours turning over the pages. In this hope I mention the fact that Stanton Davis Kirkham has just added another volume to the respectable list which represents his versatile literary activities. It is called "East and West" and consists of a series of pleasing essays devoted to "comparative studies of nature in eastern and western States." Stanton Davis Kirkham is the son of the late Major Murray Davis, U. S. A., and of the late Mrs. Davis who was Miss Julia Kirkham, oldest daughter of General Kirkham who was Quartermaster at the Presidio in early days. General Kirkham adopted his grandchild and had him change his name. The Putnams have published "East and West" and it is a very meritorious performance.

An Index Epurgatorius for the Convivial

"Truly rural," said the man with the untouched highball, addressing the man with the half-finished beer and the man who had not yet got the cocktail he had ordered, "has too long stood as the acid test for inebriety. It is not. It is, on the contrary, if not easy to pronounce, at least not impossible of accomplishment, even to a gentleman who is walking on both sides of the street at the same time.

"Look at the lack of observation displayed by the journalistic blasksmiths who endeavor to portray the speech of a gentleman suffering from tangled legs. Their only idea is to make him use the letters 'sh' in every word. All you have to do is to listen to the speech of a stepson of Bacchus and you can learn for yourself that he never uses those letters. Some of these literary hodcarriers represent him as addressing his wife in some such way as this: 'M' dearsh, I've beensh at zhe offish, notsh at zhe clubsh.' No drunken man could possibly say 'M' dearsh' if he tried, and none ever would say 'beensh' or 'clubsh.' Rummies never put the letters 'sh' in their words, and rarely turn 's' into 'sh.'

"But what I was going to say was that I have compiled for the benefit of gentlemen who are uncertain how far they can wrestle with dangerous words a sort of index expurgatorius. It contains words and combinations which they should avoid as the plague. 'Truly rural' is not in the list, because, as I have said, it is not impossible of achievement."

"Seems mee thass ver'valuable thing," said the man with the cocktail, which had now arrived. "Less hear innex expurg-torus."

"Here it is," said the man with the highball, producing a paper from his pocket. "The first phrase is 'index expurgatorius,' and you, Frank, have just given a convincing proof that it deserves a place on the list."

"Next comes 'consecutive sentences.' Let's hear you say that, Bert."

"C'sec'v sessesses," replied the man with the beer. He had not been dealing with beer alone.

"Excellent," said the author of the index. "Next comes 'statistical abstract.' Both of you try that."

"Sississikil absrk," essayed the man with the beer.

"Satiti—statitisk—oh, say it yourself," said the man with the cocktail.

"The excellence of my index is already demonstrated," said the theorist with the highball. "I will now take the rest of it as proved, and will not trouble you to aid me with demonstrations. Here is the remainder of my index expurgatorius:

"Specific instance.
"Lineal descendants.
"Completely disintegrated.
"Perfectly legitimate.
"Purposelessness.
"Incipient symptoms.
"Present status.
"Inexcusable slovenliness.
"Municipal building.
"Perfectly obvious.
"Felicitous description.
"Surrounded by an impenetrable forest.
"Psychological inexactitude.

"That list," concluded the highball theorist, folding it up, "is far from complete; but by actual observation I have found it to contain the real acid tests. I have jotted them down from time to time as they have dropped from the lips of gentlemen who have been looking upon the cocktail when it is dark brown, and as I make further observations I shall increase the list."

'Warr'ry'—warr'ry gonav?" said the man with the cocktail.

John Drew in "Smith"

By Edward F. O'Day

"What a ridiculous play! Imagine a gentleman marrying a servant girl!" Immediately I resented that remark. There was so much toploftiness of emphasis on the word "gentleman" and so much scorn in the mention of "servant girl" that I conceived a violent dislike for the unknown speaker. To obtain local habitation for this dislike I peered around cautiously and ascertained that the amateur dramatic critic who had passed this sentence on "Smith" was a fat, smug, middle-aged man a little too conspicuously marked by the externals of prosperity. Just the sort of man, I thought, who might be expected to make that sort of remark. Not that the remark was altogether at fault. The fault was in the collocation of the words "gentleman" and "servant girl" and that collocation, to my resentful mind, spoke volumes as to the character of the fat, smug, overprosperous man behind me. If he had said, "Imagine a servant girl marrying a gentleman!" I would not have made the same objection to his criticism. For I suppose that as a general rule it is unwise for servant girls to marry gentlemen. But the unwisdom of such matches must be charged, it seems to me, not so much to the servant girls as to the gentlemen. Perhaps most of us have known cases in point. In those cases within our personal experience, perhaps it is not too much to say that we have usually been sorry for the servant girls and wholly unsympathetic with the gentlemen. Supposing, of course, that the marriages turned out bad, as is very frequently the case with such matches. It is easy to say that such matches turn out bad because the servant girls have entered a sphere for which their lowly duties had not fitted them. And it is usually as false as it is easy. It is much more to the point to say that the gentlemen have measured their temporary enthusiasm for a pretty face or an alluring figure, for a knack of cooking or a genius in providing creature comforts against certain very well defined class prejudices and that the class prejudices—Lord save the mark!—have persisted when the temporary enthusiasm has disappeared. It is a safe wager that after a year or so of such union the wife has added other good qualities to the admirable traits she possessed as a servant girl, while the husband has deteriorated. Always providing that the servant girl was a good girl as well as a good servant girl. Only a crazy Quixote picks out a slattern for his Dulcinea. On these premises I feel myself justified in condemning the remark of the man behind me at the Columbia. I need not point out to those who have seen "Smith" that the remark was wholly uncalled for by anything in the play. Mr. Somerset Maugham had very carefully pointed out that the distinction between a man and a gentleman which is of tremendous importance in the rarefied atmosphere of Kensington meant absolutely nothing in Rhodesia, country of magnificent distances. But because the Kensingtonians are no more capable of appreciating this than the smug San Franciscan behind me "Smith" becomes a play of social satire when it might easily have remained a play of farce comedy. If "Smith" had been merely a farce comedy my smug neighbor would have laughed heartily at the romance of the gentleman and the servant girl; but he could not assimilate the satire. Unconsciously he justified the purpose of Mr. Somerset Maugham by resenting it. There is still another way of regarding the matter. There are many definitions of a gentleman. Essayists are as fond of trying their hand at defining this word as they are at differentiating wit and humor. And on the stage there are as many varieties of gentlemen as there are kinds of actors who attempt to portray gentlemanly parts. I suppose we haven't a sounder gentleman in America, on stage or off, than Mr. John Drew. I need not point out that his gentleness is not a matter of mannerisms or clothes. It goes to the deeps of his heart and soul. It is the thing of all things which makes him such a splendid actor. And so, when we find Mr. John Drew obliged by the requirements of "Smith" to reject a glittering ornament of the drawing room and look for his wife below stairs, some of us are uneasily conscious that Mr. John Drew has a better estimate of comparative values than we have or would dare to have. No doubt it is absurd thus to knit the character of the actor to the character of the part he happens to be playing, but that is a trick of the mind from which few of us are free. Mr. John Drew has become something of a tradition. He stands for certain ideals which we are bound to admire. We feel that Mr. John Drew might be capable of doing just the thing which the character he plays in "Smith" is represented as doing. We may be wrong about this, but the feeling is there in a sneaking sort of way. It is partially justified by the apparent sincerity with which he attacks the role provided for him by Mr. Maugham. Mr. Drew seems to be as much in sympathy with his role as Miss Isabel Irving is out of sympathy with hers. After all, actors and actresses are very human and cannot help carving their own names on the parts they play. From first to last the part played by Mr. Drew is a sound part. It is consistent from first to last. So is the part played by Miss Irving; it is really too consistent for her too obvious wholesomeness. Consistent too is the part played by Mr. Hassard Short, a part to make the English squirm but not too intelligible to provincial Americans. Miss Sybil Thorndike's part doesn't ring true to the end. Mr. Maugham permits himself the dangerous luxury of over-sentimentalizing that part. For the purpose, no doubt, of reassuring those who are afraid that the servant girl will not make good as the wife of a gentleman he shows us a lady who decides that it will be best for her to become a servant girl. If it is the subtly ironical intention of Mr. Maugham to suggest to us that it is much easier for a servant girl to become a lady than for a lady to become a servant girl, his wit cannot be too much applauded. But the reading of such an intention into the situation brings us perilously near to the attitude of my smug neighbor at the Columbia who could not understand that "servant girls" and "gentlemen" were not created on different planes. I am not going to fall into the error of adopting Mr. Smug's viewpoint and saying, "What a ridiculous play! Imagine a lady becoming a servant girl!" It is so consoling to know that out in Rhodesia they still repeat the words of old John Ball, "When Adam delved and Eve span, where was then the gentleman?" But in Mr. Somerset Maugham's England they put old John to death.

Gossip of the Theatre

Bewitching Mary Garden

They have witches in Scotland, whence came Mary Garden, and she is one. She came from there when she was a little girl, and she's been dashing round to Chicago and over to Paris and back to New York and now to San Francisco, bewitching busily. Glance at her face or study it and you must own it is not pretty nor handsome at all, yet you draw in your breath and say, "The beauty!" Judge her form by the modern accepted standards and you'll admit she is buxom, not to say stout, yet you say, "What a divine form! What a Juno!" You know very well she is no spring chicken for she frankly owns 1877 as the year of her birth—and you know a woman cannot with impunity take off more than seven years from her age. But I'm sure Mary took off the whole seven because you have only to see Mary to know positively that she does everything in the extreme. And yet you actually stop subtracting 1870 from 1911 and marvel, "How young she is too!" As for her voice, even when she freezes your blood with her audible breathing and singing off pitch as sometimes she does, you love to hear her sing. Ah! these modern witches! They have a weird sense of dramatic values. And though they are so undemonstrative they are seething with sentiment inside. Mary went to Paris and learned how to express her very intense emotions. She does it so well that I've no doubt she is doing it for generations of repressed Scotch ancestors, which, perhaps, is so gratifying to them that they bestow upon her supernatural assistance in bewitching mortals. When Mary Garden walked upon the stage Sunday afternoon, before the curious gaze of her waiting audience, she reminded me of some splendid mettlesome, far-famed race horse prancing into a race course before an admiring multitude. She has the most entrancing walk I ever saw and more magnetism to the square inch—and she has her share of inches—than anyone else I can think of. I have never seen her in opera but I can well believe all the panegyrics on her realistic acting. I wonder, by the way, why Mary didn't take up the drama instead of opera, for there she might have been peerless, whilst in grand opera she is by no means to be ranked with such superb artists as Melba or Tetrazzini, with Gadski or Schumann-Heink or Sembrich, or even with Gerville-Reache or Berlindi. She is to be classed as a singer only with such industrious vocalists as Walker, Homer, Lemon, Farrar, Neilson and Cavalieri, pleasing vocalists to whom has been denied the open-sesame to that glorious temple dedicated to the high priestesses of song. Perhaps they entered too late in life into the Labyrinth of song, or perhaps their service does not please the goddess of music like that of her faithful and gifted favorites. The eastern papers for several years have been telling us all about Mary's musical shortcomings, so it was our own fault if we were disappointed. However, Mary can sing ballads and simple songs most delightfully. She has the true Scotch appreciation of word pictures united with great intelligence and plenty of natural sweetness of tone to reproduce them.

Billie Burke Coming

John Drew has one more week at the Columbia. He will be followed by his old leading lady, Miss Billie Burke, in another comedy by W. Somerset Maugham, the author of "Smith." Miss Burke will be at the Columbia in "Mrs. Dot" for two weeks commencing Monday, June 5. Some of the critics regard "Mrs. Dot" as the best play so far written by Maugham, which is high praise. The title role is said to fit Miss Burke "to a dot."

Mary Robson Coming

E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe will conclude one of the most successful Shakespearean seasons ever known in San Francisco at the Savoy this Saturday evening and on Sunday night that favorite comedienne, May Robson, will begin a limited engagement in "The Rejuvenation of Aunt Mary" in which she scored so signally on two previous visits to this city. Since she was last here, Miss Robson has duplicated her American success in London, where she was immediately recognized as being an exceptional actress and her eight weeks' engagement at Terry's Theatre was most successful, both from an artistic and financial standpoint. The star is supported by the same excellent cast that crossed the pond with her and the production afforded by manager L. S. Sire is said to be of a high order of merit. In addition to the regular matinees of Thursday and Saturday there will be a special afternoon performance on Tuesday, Decoration Day. "The Rejuvenation of Aunt Mary" will be the last attraction of the season at the Savoy Theatre.

"The House Next Door" at the Alcazar

Food for thought is supplied to both Jew and Gentile by "The House Next Door" which is to be given its first presentation in San Francisco next Monday evening at the Alcazar. It is a three-act comedy by J. Hartley Manners, the noted English playwright, and while giving excellent entertainment it incidentally performs a great ethical and social service. While its main purpose is to entertain by ridiculing the prejudice that divides people who in all other characteristics are fitted for each other's companionship, it is so full of humor, geniality and pathos as to be a power for sympathy and goodwill between Hebrew and Christian. Both can witness it with pleasure and go away from it with moral profit. Unusual pains have been taken by Belasco & Mayer to make their production of this charming comedy worthy of its intrinsic merit and the almost prohibitive royalty they paid to obtain it.

A Tasty Menu at the Orpheum

The first appearance of those two favorite comedians, William H. Macart and Ethlynne Bradford next week at the Orpheum will be a theatrical event of importance. Their vehicle will be a wholesome and mirthful comedy entitled "A Legitimate Hold Up." Mr. Macart and Miss Bradford have gained much renown in musical comedies. "The Musikal Girls" who also come to the Orpheum next week are bound to win the approbation of lovers of all sorts of music—those of ragtime as well as grand opera. They are all musicians of recognized ability as was evidenced when they were soloists with the Ladies' Fadettes Orchestra of Boston. Mary Wilizek, the violinist, toured the country with the Thomas Orchestra, before she became Concert Mistress with the Fadettes; Lillian Pringle, the 'cellist, recently returned from Germany after a four years' further study of music. Equally capable and studious is Eleanor Piper, the cornettist who for five years was a Fadette star. Then there is Edith Swan-Corbett whose tone on the trombone is said to be unequaled. She is also a very beautiful woman. Last but by no means least is Estelle M. Churchill who is the same jolly "drummer girl" as when she was with the Faddettes. Ed Wynn and P. O'Malley Jennings are not new to Orpheumites, though this is their first season together. Mr. Wynn is best remembered as the funny college boy with the accommodating hat that could be twisted into about fifty different shapes. Mr. Jennings was a distinct hit as the eccentric English comedian in "A Night on a Houseboat." Henry Clive, the favorite entertainer whose clever travesty on "Second Sight" and "Thought Transmission" is expected to be one of the greatest hits of the coming bill is a versatile artist and keen satirist. His act this season is entirely new and is burlesque magic. The holdovers will be Bowers, Walters and Crooker; The Five Armanis; Hal Forde and "The Little Stranger."

Eating in the Provinces

"The only change necessary to fit our show for different parts of the country is in the table manners," said a vaudeville star. "About a third of the play takes place around a supper table. We represent a laborer's family. The play doesn't aim to be funny, still for the sake of variety we try to raise a few laughs in that supper scene. In New York all our funny points are made on table manners. We take soup from the end of the spoon, drink out of our saucers, and eat with our knives. Even if we are playing on the Bowery that perversion of table etiquette raised a laugh.

"In country towns we have to cut out all that kind of realism. The audiences won't stand for it. Theatrical troupes from New York are supposed to mirror good manners, no matter what kind of a play they appear in ,and the influential members of the community will not permit us to set a bad example.

"Of course it looks incongrous to see a man in overalls and a woman dripping suds from the wash tub eating with Fifth Avenue grace and daintiness, but that is the audience's demand, and we have to raise our laughs by less legitimate means."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The great relief felt by the industrial community at the lifting of the burden of uncertainty which has long surrounded the outcome of the Standard Oil suit and the general satisfaction at the character of the final decision, expressed by the leaders in the commercial world, were quickly reflected in the market during the past week. All kinds of securities were in good demand and prices kept gradually climbing without a reaction right up to the end of the week. The steady advance frightened the big short interest and with the public taking hold on a large scale sales of stocks for one day ran up over one million shares. In fact it was the best week Wall Street has seen for a long time. Everything in the situation now points to higher prices. Crop news is favorable and money is cheap. These two factors are the basis of an extended upturn, and a better market is now confidentally expected.

Wheat—Dry weather both in the northwest and southwest up to the last few days of the week was responsible for the advance in futures. The market was further lifted by the prospect of postponement of the Canadian reciprocity treaty until fall, through the adjournment of the Canadian Parliament and our Congress. The chief depressive was the reciprocity treaty, and when it became evident there would be a long delay, the market began to show firmness on the domestic situation. The latter is stronger than usual on the old crop supplies, for notwithstanding the large harvest reported, the movement in sight thus far does not confirm the crop of 695 million bushels. Since the first of the year there has been insistent comment on the poor flour trade. The visible supply of wheat has been declining slowly and steadily. While the winter acreage is the largest since the spring of 1903, and the general average above normal at this period, the elements of trouble are to be found in the weakened condition of the plant in the southwest, and the probability, if present conditions continue, of a lower promise than indicated at the close of last month. With warmer weather prevailing the growth of the plant will be more rapid and more exact conditions will develop. At the moment the market seems to be in a rut although the under tone looks strong and it does not take much to frighten the shorts.

Corn—Supplies have run down to the lowest in several years, the consumption off the farm has been normal, and the depletion of supplies is largely measured by the increased exports. As this is the season of the year when Argentina has furnished large shipments to Europe, there will be more or less constant demand for our corn during the summer months. So far in the crop year the western primary markets reported daily by the Chicago Board of Trade have received 110 million bushels or 15 million bushels more than in the same period last year. The shipments have been 14 million larger than last year. Local consumption has been 9 million bushels larger than last year. From now on the market will be affected by the weather as regards the growing crop, and as the market is selling well below last year's prices, a good upturn can be expected from this level.

Cotton—Failure of the court decisions to produce an unfavorable effect on the stock market was reflected in a higher market for cotton, despite developments which in ordinary circumstances would have occasioned an easier feeling. Trading however was on the order of manipulation, and as the new crop deliveries are offered at so big a discount, 275 points off July for October, fall and winter months shared in the advance established. With one or two trust decisions out of the way, the trade undoubtedly has been impressed with the possibility of capital, so long idle, seeking investment, and of business improving in the United States from now on, but it remains to be seen whether such conditions will materialize. Insofar as Manchester is concerned, trade reports from there of late are somewhat less promising, there being less demand for goods, cloths moving slowly, yarns quiet. In the matter of raw material, the same is true of the situation in Liverpool. There conditions are denoted in the smaller demand for spot cotton in the south the past few days. There was little or nothing doing. As regards the weather, conditions and indications remain favorable, and crop accounts continue to improve. However, we have had two weeks of dry weather and rain is said to be needed in all sections of the cotton belt except southern Texas where there is ample supply of moisture in the soil. The market however derives its strength from the strong statistical position of the staple in America, the total stock in New York being about 108,000 bales less than one year ago, and of this it is said about 50,000 bales will be shipped away, while the south holds less cotton than last year.

walking was quite strange to me, and I became sore afraid.

Quite quickly, before the shame came back to harden me, I ran through the empty rooms to the door of his study. I knocked loudly, opened instantly to the words "come in," saw him sitting at his desk and immediately ran up to him.

In the first impulse—for he had intended to stand coldly before me—he opened his arms and drew me to his knee. Then I cried again, but this time on his neck.

Later, after we had loved each other, he said: "Elsie, don't again make such scenes as we have just had. Every person has the image of another in himself, and when that fades away, it may happen that he may lose the person himself as well as the picture."

Then I became quite cold, and I said: "Oh, no, Arno, but it is not right to make one's own image of another person and then expect him to be always like it. Love me, just as I am. Show me the right way, scold me; yes, for all I care, you may beat me—" I had to laugh, the idea of his beating me seemed so ridiculous in the face of the image I had of him in my heart. Then I noticed that I had indeed made an image of him for myself, and he was right. Truly, I must not make such a scene again.

Berlin, December, 18—.

Is it really two years since I last wrote in this book? And I would not have written now did I not wish to enter Arno's deed in it, so that I might always see it before me when I feel impatient with my duty. Since the birth of Reini and also even of little Willy, I have gone very seldom either to concerts or theaters. Perhaps because I was always either too tired in the evening to dress or to give up a part of my night's rest for them. Therefore when Arno brought two tickets for a matinee at the Academy of Music, I threw my arms joyfully about his neck. I was to hear Liszt again, and once more with my dearest husband, as before when I was as yet free and ever so happy.

Indeed it was but a drop in the goblet. Arno had been able to secure only one seat in the fourth row for me, while for himself he could obtain only a seat at the back, near the exit. But I knew he would have, with me, the highest enjoyment.

Shortly before its fulfillment something happened which threatened to destroy my hopes. Yesterday, Reini caught a sore throat and was feverish. Of course, I wanted to stay at home. But Arno gave me his word that I could go without any worry. And so I went. My heart and mind were not quite free from anxiety, but I went. Arno took me to my reserved seat, and as he left me the little, vicious thorn pushed itself deeper in my heart. But then Liszt came and began to agitate the strings of the instrument, my soul trembled in harmony, and I forgot the whole world, and my soul was in Paradise. While still dazed by the heavenly sounds and the thunder of the divine music of the wonderful master sounding in my ear and heart, I followed the streaming people as they left the hall. At the exit, Arno took my hand and drew me towards him. When we had got outside he placed my arm within his.

"Were you happy, Elsie?" he asked.

"I was in heaven," I answered. "And you, were you not overcome by that demon-like rhapsody?"

"I prefer to see its echo on your face, dearest," he said.

I was silent. His answer was not sufficiently enthusiastic to please me. I could not understand how he could measure divine beauty by even the most beloved of earthly beings.

We spoke little while in the carriage. Arrived before our house, he left me at the door to make his hospital rounds. When I reached the steps to the house I thought for the first time of Reini and flew up. As I entered the children's room I saw Reini sitting in his cot, holding out in delight a little wooden doll.

"Papa, papa!" he cried out. And the maid explained:

"The professor brought him it. He has been here playing with the child all the time you were away."

He had taken me to the Academy of Music and after he had left me in my seat had gone back to Reini, so that I could have my enjoyment.

And I, I who had often bemoaned and pitied myself when compelled to remain with the children, because I could not listen to music, read books—I who only yesterday had been thinking that the Hill of my young days was getting further and further away from me—I cried.

April 16, 18—.

Our little Susie is one year old today. Arno caressed me very lovingly and said: "This beautiful being owes its life to you. Without your care it would never have lived. It was always very delicate; but the little girl is all right now, and the dear mother can now get back her red cheeks." I am very happy.

May 5, 18—.

My birthday today. And perhaps, I think, the birth of our fourth child.

Easter, 18—.

I feel today a little like an old mother who is sending her son away on his travels. Reini has gone to school. It is the first step of the child away from its mother. We must now, Arno and I, give up being our son's guardian, his fate, his omnipotence. Next year Willy will go, then little Susie, and finally our sweet baby. And life, slowly but surely, step by step, will set them free from us, and we shall be again alone—we two old folk.

Oh, but what silly thoughts are these! We have still many, many years in which to work and care for them, and then—

Yes—then we two old trees, with our branches closer locked, will entwine each other.

Whitsuntide, 18—.

It is pleasant here in the old nest. I am sitting once more at my morning's coffee with mama on the round bench by the marble-topped table, and Arno and the little ones are sitting with us. The church bells sound in the distance and the blackbirds are piping in the elm tree growing through the table. The birches glitter like glass, and the daisies are stealing along the grass on the turf with a dew drop on each golden knot. I remember once making a wreath of daisies while the dew was still on them, reflecting colors in green, red and blue, and placing it on my heart; and I thought I was a little princess, and mother scolded me for my wet feet. How long ago was that? Is it impossible that it is my little baby there who is plucking the flowers for a wreath—my youngest, who is now nine years old, as I was then? And mama is also scolding her for her wet feet. And behind the garden the old hills loom blue, everything just as then—only my life has gradually glided away, like a dream, like a dream.

Whit Monday.

Mama said today laughingly: "I could never have believed that you would have believed that you would have devoted yourself so completely to your husband and children, you had such big ideas in your head. Elsie, do you remember the Hill you were always talking of climbing?"

Her words sent a shock through my heart. Indeed, I had forgotten all about the Hill—the Hill—and the mystery—and the flame. There behind stood the blue ranges that called to me and lit up my youth. Now they have disappeared. I had not noticed that they had vanished. I have had so much to do. And now life is even and full of more definite and smaller duties and joys.

Mama caught me in tears and read these words over my shoulder: "We must all come to that, child," she said. "Happy is she whom so wise a husband as yours leads quietly there, and gives himself to his fellows and children."

Berlin, Easter, 18—.

It is five years now since I wrote in this book, and the word "Dairy," which is stamped in golden letters on the cover, is become a misnomer. When we get old we work, and we think and feel; but we don't write down our feelings any more. But I only want to mark here the milestones on the road of our life, as we might do in a family Bible. That is why I am writing today, since today our Reini has received his diploma, Summa cum laude.

June 15, 18—.

Our beloved Sabina is dead. I must not cry. Arno was deeply attached to the child. He is ageing. I must look after him and comfort him. My dear child! Sleep well!

October 12, 18—.

Susie is a bride. I am so happy because of her. I suffered for her sake for years when her love first showed itself, because Arno would not hear of her engagement, and Reinhart was still a poor student. But my brave little girl pulled through. And now Reinhart has obtained a splendid practice and has been called to Gottingen. I will persuade Arno to let her bring her young household. My dear Susie hung on my neck, overflowing with joy.

November 5, 18—

Willy obtained his troop today. Reini is a famous doctor, Willy a fine officer, Susie a happy wife and mother! And they all come to their old mother whenever they want advice or help or comfort. And even now Susie's little ones are coming to me, from the little Elsie, whose nose must be wiped, to Arno, who has a hole in his sleeve which I must mend quickly. They are good children.

January 8, 1900.

My dear husband is released from his long suffering and is now quietly asleep. The children all want me to stay with them; but I am an old woman and must not over-burden their young households. They will come to me as they have always done. And I am not alone. I have my thoughts. And these survey life up and down and see its splendor and its shadows, how fate builds and destroys, and note all the little brooks flowing steadily to the big sea. And no one thing is important in itself, for each implies a greater, because each is lost in the other and nothing is destroyed; and so from eternity to eternity, all things are and build up together the great world-whole.

New Year's Day, 1905.

Today, in the night of the New Year, as I could not sleep, I took this book out of my desk where it had been lying untouched for years, and read it through from beginning to end. On my seventeenth birthday I wrote my first sentence in it, and it reads: "Will my life begin now?—the true, real, large, mysterious, alluring, terrible life?" Today I am writing my last words, for my life is soon to end—quietly and softly my little brook is gliding into the endless waters. Truly it is the genuine life I have lived—great and small, bitter and sweet, ever seeming, and yet a deep, deep mystery. Have I been on that Hill to which I was drawn in my youth? That Hill at whose foot I lay, at first in tears, and then overcome, but always climbing, more and more joyful under the loving burdens of my growing duties? That Hill I had almost forgotten because of the little time I had in which to think to myself?

Yes—I have been on the Hill. My way lay between thickly growing trees that hid it from me, but it lay upward, and now I am standing on the top, and life is below me and I look into the clouds over the earth, and I see the beauty and the mystery and the flame.

For we must be old and have lived our life so that it is below us. Now the air about me is light and clear, and I am deliciously tired.

I shall sleep well on my Hill.

Figg—Talk about useless activity! Brown has a hundred irons in the fire and hardly one of them ever gets hot.

Fogg—Yes, and if one does he only succeeds in burning his fingers with it.

Auto Notes

Once more has Mt. Diablo been scaled, but the accomplishment of the feat this time establishes a new record in motordom. On Sunday, April 29, a one and one-half ton White Gasoline truck accomplished what has been considered up to this time an impossibility. Probably there never has been a more difficult journey completed successfully than this feat of driving the heavy loaded commercial vehicle over practically impassible roads.

According to advices received by S. G. Chapman, the Abbott-Detroit factory will market about $5,000,000 worth of cars this season. Over half of their 3,000 output has already gone out on delivery and with a long list of advance orders listed it is practically certain that the fag end of the 1911 season will find a decided shortage of Abbott cars. To meet this big demand the factory facilities were recently increased one-third and thirty Abbott-Detroits are now being built daily.

The Stevens-Duryea comes into the lime light in the Glidden Reciprocity Tour and in the selection of the Stevens-Duryea Six as the Path Finder, the company received well merited recognition, for it is generally held by well-informed motorists that this tour will be the most important Glidden ever held and it was therefore essential to have for the Pathfinding service the best possible car.

The Chalmers "30" touring car, owned by Mr. A. Cohnreich and driven by Mr. Charles Ellis, has run 27,800 miles at a total expense of only $19.20 for injury repairs. This is a good record and it is in keeping with the experience of most of the owners of Chalmers cars.

Hudson owners have been touring in Europe to a great extent during the past year. All of them report just one trouble—carburetor adjustment. It seems impossible to buy the same kind of gasolene twice in Europe. During the Continental tour made by E. A. Schieler of Boston in his Hudson car, he negotiated the mountains of Switzerland and many of the other highways of Europe without using a single extra part or making any adjustment except to the carburetor. From Interlaken to Lucern, the way is very hilly but of course the scenery is among the finest in the world and every motorist in Europe braves that rough country in his car for the sake of the wonderful views. Mr. Schieler made the trip without incident, except for finding a new kind of gasolene every time it was necessary to fill his tank.

Since Fred Hall broke the record between Denver and Colorado Springs, with a Lozier car in March, desperate efforts have been made by a number of manufacturers to lower his time, but without success. Two cars were wrecked in the attempt through reckless driving. One Denver dealer has sent telegrams to the East, announcing that the Lozier record was broken. The Denver Motor Club, in order to set at rest all questions regarding this record, on April 13th wired the Lozier Company as follows: "The only official record for stripped car from Denver to Colorado Springs and return was made by the Lozier car under the auspices of the Denver Motor Club on March 30th. Statements made by other people unauthorized by our club."

The Diamond Rubber Co. are in receipt of a letter from Mr. A. McCalman of Portland in which the writer states: "On April 15, 1909, I purchased a 30 horsepower Studebaker equipped with Diamond Tires. These tires, I was told, had been on this car for one year previous to coming into my possession. At any rate all four of the tires have given me a mileage of 12,000 miles and two of the original four are still on the car, showing every prospect of running many more miles."

For Summer Reading

As will be readily surmised, "The Stolen Singer" is a bit of comic opera summer fiction which will make no deep draught on the intellect of its readers, though it is bright and amusing in its way. The caste includes a princess of one of those mythical kingdoms which have crowded the map of Europe since Zenda was located; the singer who was stolen; a biological investigator in love with the princess; his cousin and chum, a Lynn manufacturer of shoes; a political agent of the grand duke of Krolvetz, and a chorus of seamen, servants and rural habitants of the Maine coast. The princess Augusta Stephanie, with a big fortune of her own, had refused to marry in accordance with the wishes of her tyrannous and impoverished guardian, but had escaped to America and under the chaperonage of her aunt, was known as Melanie Regnier. Agatha Redmond, the singer, belonging to a different stratum of society, had never heard of the other, much less that there was a striking personal resemblance between them, and the political agent, Chatelard, sent by the grand duke to seize the recalcitrant princess and return with her in the royal yacht to Krolvetz, confused both by the similarity of the names Regnier and Redmond, and the likeness, abducted the wrong lady. Hambleton, the shoe manufacturer, happened to catch a glimpse of Agatha Redmond as the speeding automobile was carrying her away, and scenting something wrong, he followed on impulse, found himself made a prisoner on board the mysterious yacht, suffered shipwreck, and swam for a day and a night, saving his own life and Agatha's, and fell deeper in love than he was in the Atlantic. Of course they were eventually saved, else there would be no story, the remainder of which is played out in a Maine farm house where the other characters converge in time to take their places on the stage and pair off in regulation style, the princess and the biologist, the singer and her rescuer, with some of the minor characters looking on to good purpose. The author, Martha Bellinger, appears to be a newcomer in the field of fiction. If so, it is a creditable first effort. From Bobbs-Merrill of Indianapolis.

"Yellowstone Nights"

The "Yellowstone Nights" of Herbert Quick is made up of more than a dozen short stories strung together on the thread of a fortnight's sight-seeing trip in Yellowstone Park. The passengers who put themselves under the guidance of Aconite Driscoll, ex-cowboy, prove to be congenial travel-mates, and to enliven their camp fires and noon halts they agree to tell a story in turn as their names are drawn from the hat. Aconite himself is a character whose like survives now only in fiction, for the railroad and the automobile have driven the stage and its drivers from the road. The passengers whom chance brought together on this occasion were a small-calibred professor from a small fresh water college, a poet, a painter, a bride, who was a daughter of wealth and her groom who had fought his own way up, the Colonel, a lawyer, and one who described himself as a "hired man," a group sufficiently diversified to insure variety both in the style and substance of their narrations. Aconite, the driver, was primed to overflowing with history, real and manufactured, and he had that inimitable gift of solemn exaggeration and humorous twisting of his sentences, that quizzical half joke and whole earnest manner of delivery that seemed as much the part of the equipment of the old knights of the reins as their broad brimmed hats and long whip lashes. Any one of the stories could stand alone and many of them have already appeared in periodicals, but they gain from the present setting and stand out "as good as new." The stories range from love to law, from the city to the cattle range and back by way of the mines, and each is colored by the angle of vision of its narrator. When Herbert Quick takes time off to write fiction no one would ever suspect him of being at other times as serious as a catalogue of statistics. "Yellowstone Nights" ought to make its appeal chiefly to men, which is to say that it has rather more substance to it than most books of short stories. From Bobbs-Merrill Co.

Refined Torture

The oft-recurring question of the meanest man had found its way into the conversation.

"The meanest man on earth," alleged Jones, "lives in Philadelphia—City of Brotherly Love. He resides in an apartment hotel. His bedroom window gives upon a court which is possessed of terrific acoustic properties. This meanest man snores. With the coming of Spring sleepers in the court opened wider their windows. So also did the mean—the accomplished snorer. His fellow-tenants suffered. They begged him to desist. Now what do you think he did?

Nobody guessed.

"He rigged up a megaphone, caused it to project into the open court, and snored into it all night."

The Great Mexican

For nearly forty years Porfirio Diaz ruled the destinies of Mexico. Few are the heroes of history whose power extended over so great a length of time. To stand high in this world is to be frequently shaken, and supremacy to be maintained for the briefest period calls for genius of the highest order. The extraordinary duration, therefore, of the career of Porfirio Diaz argues that in him are the elements of greatness. It may be thought of him that his superiority was local; in other words that he bulked large in the midst of small men, but the power that guides large masses of men and shapes the channels in which the energies of a people flow, the intellect that establishes the independence, the glory and durable prosperity of a country, are not the result of the inferiority of associations. In the flesh of a man who accomplishes such things is lodged a compound product the salient principle of which is divine genius. Unquestionably Diaz was a despot; as much so as was Cromwell, but who shall say that a despotism in Mexico was not more suitable to the people than a democracy? Unquestionably the political convulsion by which Diaz was cast out of his seat of power was in a large measure the result of too long denied guaranteed rights. The conviction was widespread among the people of Mexico that they were unfairly dealt with. But whether good is to result from the revolution is a question that time only can solve. All revolutions have not ushered in new epochs in the world's progress. Madero is today regarded as his country's sower appointed to sow the land with wheat that all his countrymen may have bread. It may turn out that he has sown it with chaff. Today acclaimed the liberator of his country; tomorrow he may follow Diaz into exile.

Why Calendars Are Crowded

Judge Graham has called attention to the fact that though the calendars of the Superior Court are crowded with cases the four judges who came from the interior of the State to lighten the burdens of their confreres of this city and relieve congestion are transacting very little business. According to Judge Graham it is the lawyers who are to blame since most of them would rather postpone than try their cases. This is precisely as it always has been. Yet there has been much clamor for more judges, and the legislature at its last session, the model legislature that incarnated purity and reform, passed a bill increasing the number of judges, and it was only because organized labor protested that Governor Johnson consigned it to a pigeon-hole. The clamor for more judges, as everybody knows who knows anything about the state of affairs in our Superior Courts, is nothing more than the clamor of third-rate lawyers who hope to be appointed to the bench. While it is true that the calendars are crowded with cases, a very large percentage of the cases are never to be tried. When a lawyer has a bad case he is not eager to go to trial, and there are lawyers who start bad cases never intending to try them. Some cases are started merely for the purpose of blackmail; others merely for the purpose of getting a fee from a fool of a client; others because a foolish client has a fool for an attorney. From all of which it may be inferred that there is considerable rottenness and no small measure of incompetency in the legal profession in San Francisco. The inference may be indulged without fear of doing injustice to a learned and honorable profession the morals of which are no better and no worse than the morals of the times.

The Celebration of Kent

"It is beyond dispute," says the Chico Enterprise, "that we have a congressman (William Kent) who is neither a factotum, a functionary nor a sycophant, but most emphatically a 'live one.'" In the editor of the Chico Enterprise Congressman Kent has a warm admirer, a passionate panegyrist. Mr. Kent's maiden speech in Congress, in the opinion of the Chico editor, is conclusive of his force of character, his rare ability, his personal independence and his devotion to the interests of the nation. What the intrinsic merits of this speech are the hero worshiper of Chico does not tell us. Enough for him that the speech drew the fire of the standpat papers, including even that big Eastern journal, the New York Sun which described Mr. Kent as "an amoosin little cus." In addition to this prima facie evidence of the greatness of the speech there is the unimpeachable testimony of a Mark Sullivan whom the Chico editor describes as "the congressional commenter of Collier's Weekly." Mark tells us that "the serious parts of Kent's speech were entirely consistent with his possession of an honorary degree from Yale, and that no speech in the present session has gone more directly to the heart of the philosophy of government." This though vague enough to come within the category of glittering generalities is, we presume, what puts Congressman Kent's status as a statesman "beyond dispute," for nothing more dogmatically didactic or sweeping does the Chico editor submit to our consideration by way of justifying his high appreciation of the source of the pactolian stream that flowed through Chico last fall. What Mr. Mark Sullivan may conceive to be consistent with an honorary degree from Yale is beyond our power of conjecture. We have always understood that it is not advisable to take an honorary degree at its face value. As to the heart of the philosophy of government that is an organ which in these progressive days floats somewhere between the kidneys and the liver and is accessible to almost any tyro in political surgery.

Hiram's Coup de Grace

Those deluded persons who regard the recall as a transient madness that marks an epoch in the history of the eccentricities of the human mind, and who believe that like a mountain torrent it will pass away with the storm that gave it birth, must have received a shock the other day when they learned that Governor Hiram Johnson had vindicated the sanity of it beyond question or quibble. Of this notable feat they were informed by that most eminent of all contemporary authorities, The Bulletin. Thus: "California's plain-spoken and square-dealing Governor leveled the enemies fortifications." And this is the irresistible logic with which he did the leveling: "I am not attacking the courts, but the courts are the bulwark of the people, and I believe in democracy. Our last Legislature made the recall applicable to every official, and this is taken by some of our Eastern friends as an attack on the judiciary. But it is not so—it is not even uncomplimentary to the judiciary. It will make no weak judge more weak, nor will it make a strong judge less strong." These sentiments The Bulletin quotes as self-evident principles neither to be gainsaid nor brought within the domain of controversy. Fascinated by so brilliant an intellectual feat our contemporary joyously affirms: "There you have the truth about the recall of the judiciary." There to be sure is the truth embalmed in a few gleaming phrases. To appreciate what at first blush may appear to you as the spluttering of an egomaniacal anarchist you must understand that when our foremost statesman winds himself into the marrow of a subject you must not expect arguments dexterous and species, you must not look for subtlety, or vain display of the power of recondite analysis. Absolved from the laws of vulgar logic, Hiram, when addressing the multitude, disdaining the refinements of sophistry, puts to flight a host of syllogisms with an ipse dixit. Close reasoning was never one of Hiram's intellectual characteristics, as one may learn from a memorable case which he lost in his professional career, and which led to the writing of an opinion that rankles and calls for vengeance by way of the recall. No, Hiram is of the "plain-spoken and square-dealing" type of statesmen. When you find him sloshing about refuting all refutable positions you must consider that he is one of the Elect whom God always informs as to what is good and what is bad, and that from him you should be satisfied to receive opinion as irrefragable reason for opinion. No chicken-hearted diffidence has he as to the value of his opinions. No guessing for him as to the depth and danger of his ignorance. When he ope's his mouth let all other barks be smothered. It is for him whom we adore in the fullness of his self-sufficiency to impose his individual sentiment on all the people.

So the final, the complete answer to all arguments against the recall is that Hiram believes in democracy, Hiram doesn't consider the recall uncomplimentary to the judiciary, Hiram believes that it will have no enervating or debilitating effects on the juridical constitution. At this blast of his mouth razed were the walls of Jericho. Retrogressive lunatics there are who will ask, When did democracy challenge the validity of the eternal conception of justice? The answer is, When Hiram ascended the throne.

A Sane But Futile Suggestion

At a progressive Republican banquet in Chicago a week ago the Hon. Moses E. Clapp, junior Senator from Minnesota and an ardent propagandist of the gospel of modernism in statecraft, asked: Why not a third party? A pertinent question this, and one that insurgents in all parties should answer. If the demand for modernism in government is universal, as the insurgents tell us, then why should they not apostatize and vindicate their passionate attachment to their principles in the inspiring shade of a standard of their own creation, a true and unequivocal symbol of their political faith? If they are more concerned about principle than consequence, if they must have everything their own way to the minutest tittle, there is but one straightforward course for them to pursue, and that is the course that leads to a convention in which may be articulated the sentiments and ideas peculiar to insurgency. Acting as they are at present the progressive statesmen appear to lack the courage of their convictions. The most prominent of them appear to have espoused as their seven cardinal principles the five loaves and the two fishes. For example, "Battle Bob" La Follette though he insists that his principles are "stuff o' the conscience," gives us the impression that he is much preoccupied with bargaining for place and power. Standing midway between both parties, liking neither, flaming with denunciation of men and measures, he is to be conciliated by nomination for President, and though he must perceive there is small chance of that consummation he is not for leading a detachment into the heat of battle on his own orders. "Battle Bob," one may predict without the slightest fear of proving a bad prophet, will be found supporting the national ticket of the Republican party in the next campaign notwithstanding the failure of the platform to embody some of his most cherished principles. "Battle Bob" is impetuous, but not indiscreet.

The Jury System

Another jury has gone wrong, and justice has miscarried again. So we are told with reference to the trial of a San Mateo official accused of accepting a bribe. For the punishment of grafters the jury system doesn't give satisfaction. Indeed the jury system along with all other ancient institutions is fallen into disrepute. But no zealous reformer has yet invented a substitute. The reformers who have given it their consideration have come to the conclusion that to improve the administration of justice the jury system must either be abolished or so altered as to eliminate the substance and preserve the form. These reformers have great faith in science. They would have justice administered with scientific precision, and to that end in the determination of all cases they would employ nothing but cold and impartial reason. They would have us depend entirely on the intellectual processes of the man on the bench. They would have all conduct judged by the immutable standards of right and wrong. In the suggestions of these scientific reformers we are not disposed to concur. The jury system with all its imperfections still commands our veneration. We know that culprits go free that jurymen may return to the bosom of their families; that one juror occasionally starves eleven into compliance; that in the jury-box a pinch of pity often outweighs a peck of evidence, but we continue to agree with the statesman who remarked some centuries ago that the whole machinery of State, all the apparatus of the system and its varied workings end in simply bringing twelve good men into a box. What if the verdict go contrary to the law and the evidence as apparently it often does? Well, let us remember that as there is more of human nature than of science in the jury-box there is also likely to be more of moral than of legal justice and that legal justice ought to form the nearest approach to moral justice that human tribunals are capable of effecting. If juries are not scientifically accurate it is because the brain is not wholly the organ of the intellect. A delusion that has become universal is that which identifies the brain and the mind and ignores the fact that as feeling is the chief component of the mind, the intellect is the servant of the emotions. The substance of the mind is exceedingly complicated. In it are many independent principles interwoven with the nature of man as an emotional as well as an intelligent being. Each faculty is modified by another both in what regards our own good and the good of others, and it is as a result of the play of all the faculties that verdicts are rendered in the courts of justice. Is it desirable that they should always appear to correspond with the principles of the science of law? The jury system was not given to us to that end. It was and ought to be expected that feeling as well as reason should influence jurymen. The trouble with most of us is that we greatly exaggerate the importance of reason. While we flatter ourselves that it distinguishes us from the beasts of the field we fail to perceive that it is inadequate to raise us to the level of God whom we sometimes make the subject of metaphysical discussion. Reason is never of so little value as when it fails to discover its own insufficiency. It has been said that the heart has reasons which reason does not understand. This is the whole explanation of verdicts that seem contrary to law and evidence. When juries refuse to convict grafters it may be because the heart revolts at the methods employed in the interest of justice. To put the stamp of disapproval on those methods may be more important to society than to convict a mere grafter. Jurors may not be able to reason that such is the case. They may not be able to interpret their own verdict. They speak from the heart and what they say they do not understand; but as out of the mouth of babes and sucklings comes wisdom so out of the unscientific jury-box may come justice.

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over

By Robert McTavish

Seven Years' Work at Panama

The seventh year of Panama Canal construction by Americans ended on May 4. Only one-fourth of the great task of excavation remains to be done, 138,000,000 cubic yards having been removed from the line of the canal, leaving only 44,000,000 yards to be cut away. The placing of the concrete in the locks is more than 52 per cent completed, the installing of the lock-gates has begun, and 70 per cent of the filling for the Gatun dam, which will feed the canal with water, has been done. The lock-gates are staggering in their vast proportions, compared with the timber gates of the canals in this country. Each leaf, of which there are two in a gate, is 7 feet thick, 65 feet long, and from 47 to 82 feet in height, there being ninety-two of these leaves. Special hoisting machinery has been installed to place these masses of steel. One of the unexpected obstacles in the construction was the development of twenty-two slides in the Culebra Cut, within a distance of nine miles, but it is stated that these will not delay the completion of the canal, as the earth can easily be removed by dredges after the water is turned on.

The Term of Enlistment

A controversy as to whether five years or three years is the proper enlistment period for the army has arisen because of Representative Hays' bills to change back from three years to the longer term. Two major-generals, Wood and Ainsworth, have appeared before the House Military Affairs Committee to discuss the bill, General Wood for and General Ainsworth against. Curiously enough, both were originally medical men, and not professionally trained soldiers. General Wood's contention is that the shorter term scatters more men of military training throughout the country, and General Ainsworth thinks that it will be cheaper to have the longer term. He is unquestionably correct in this view; if the question of economy is to decide, his opinion should prevail. Against the bill it is also argued that there will be more desertions, for it was in the hope of checking desertions that the term was originally reduced. But it has not had an appreciable effect; the percentage of desertions still runs very high, and many of them occur in the first year or so, just as there are many applications for discharge by purchase in the first two years of a recruit's service.

Japan's Attitude as to War

There have been various reports that the Japanese government was expending vast sums of money in enlarging her navy and preparing for some future great conflict. How groundless are such reports can be learned by a knowledge of what has actually been done and what it is proposed to do in the future. Since the termination of the war with Russia the additions to the Japanese navy have simply been sufficient to replace the vessels that have become too old to be of service and have been cast aside. And even to do this has taxed the country to the utmost. With the loss of fifty to seventy-five million dollars by the recent floods the conditions are still worse, and it remains to be seen what will be the outcome. One of the leading statesmen, Mr. Matsuda, says: "The people are groaning under the heavy burden of taxation and the slightest addition will be enough to crush them. The government's first duty is to lessen the burden." In one of the Tokio papers is a recent article on "The Cause of Dullness in Business," in which the author writes: "It is the heavy taxation borne by the people during and since the war, that is robbing the people of their purchasing power and producing depression in the commerce and industries of the country." In a recent speech the Premier who is also the Minister of Finance, Marquis Katsura, outlined the government policy; and he showed that the annual expenditure which it is proposed to make during the coming six years is only sufficient to replace such vessels in the navy as become worthless from age. Thus the spirit of peace appears to prevail everywhere except in the talk of the professional jingoes and representatives of certain trusts which might profit by hostilities.

British Trade in Mexico

Great Britain has $260,000,000 capital sunk in Mexico, while the United States has $305,000,000 invested in that country, but only about 10 per cent of Mexico's foreign trade is with the United Kingdom. This fact has been rankling in the breasts of the ninety members of the Mexican section of the London Chamber of Commerce, which is beginning a vigorous agitation in favor of the development of trade relations between Mexico and Great Britain. One of the hindrances to the introduction of British manufactures into Mexico hitherto has been the high freights that have ruled between Great Britain and Mexico as compared with Continental ports. The various shipping lines have, however, arranged for a readjustment of rates which will equalize freights as from July 1 next. A special committee of the section is considering the best means of arranging for collective representation of British manufacturers in Mexico on co-operative lines by which the expenses would be shared by firms participating in the scheme. The recent upheaval has been a bar to effective work along this line.

Divorce Law for Italy

Italy is almost the only large country where divorce does not exist, but the Minister of Justice has just announced in the Chamber that he will soon present a bill on the subject in order to suppress the strange anomalies existing in the country. While divorce does not exist, those Italians who have money and influence have recourse to the system of going to a country where a divorce can be obtained. They take citizenship in that country and are soon returning home, free and unincumbered. The country in which this can be most easily done is Hungary, and to go there from Italy is a matter of only a few hours. The result is that there are in Italy quite a number of persons who, although Italian born, are now Hungarian subjects and owe to their Hungarian citizenship the possibility of marrying again. The Italian courts at first tried to resist this way of evading the law, but they had to cease doing so on remonstrances from the countries interested, which could not admit that an act, entirely legal according to their legislation, should be objected to by foreign governments.

Holland is Sinking

Geologists have of late years come to the conclusion that the entire central European plain, which extends from southwestern France through the low countries and north Germany to the Russian Baltic provinces, is slowly sinking. The lowest section of this great coastal region is that part of Holland which lies from fifteen to twenty feet below sea level and has to be protected by immense dams and dykes against the danger of being submerged. A Dutch engineer named Ten Cate has studied this subject and he deals with Holland's danger at length in a Dutch technical paper. His investigations go back 2,000 years, and his conclusion is that the Dutch coast line sinks eight inches every 100 years. This does not seem very alarming, but every little counts in a country which lies naturally so low as the Dutch coastal provinces. Besides there is no justification for assuming that the settling down process will always be regular, and a sudden subsidence would be a very grave matter indeed. Ten Cate proves his assertions by pointing to the situation of remains of Roman settlements in the Low Countries, which he calculates must now lie from five to fifteen feet below their original level. They were built some sixteen centuries ago. There are of course the historical facts of the formation of the Zuyder Zee, the Dollart and other bays at great flood tides. Sufficient data exist for the last 200 years according to which the subsidence of the Dutch littoral can be figured out to a nicety, and for that period it amounts to 36 centimeters, or about 14½ inches. A further indication of the lowering of Holland's level is the fact that the low hills or mounds to which as late as the Middle Ages people and their cattle used to flee for safety at flood times would not now afford the necessary protection.

The Bee Feast in North Africa

The villages of the Atlas have been celebrating the bee feast, which falls on April 29. The famous monastery of the Medidjie order sends monks to all the larger villages and these dervishes are the principal performers. The ceremony takes place in the open air and begins with a duel between a yellow and a black bee, represented by two Berbers with heads draped in yellow and black cloths. Then a Medidjie dervish appears. He plays a melody on a long flute and capers wildly. His body is covered with bees and thousands of bees follow him. He picks them up in handfuls and throws them on the ground, where they crawl until suddenly they rise together and scatter in every direction. One traveler explains the dervish's power over the bees by suggesting that he hides a queen bee on his person in a tiny box, and Humboldt says that the medicine men of Central America have a similar power.

XXIV—MAX HIRSCH

By Edward F. O'Day

"What theater was Max Hirsch connected with in San Francisco?" I was asked a few days ago.

When I replied that he had never been connected with any of our theaters, my interrogator demanded:

"Then how is it that he's so well known here?"

Will Greenbaum who is Max Hirsch's most intimate friend in San Francisco says that it is on account of his white hair. This explanation is disparaging. It also seeks to establish a mischievous precedent. All those upon whom Mother Nature has played capillary tricks will understand what I mean. If a man's distinction in this or any other community is to be laid to the color of his hair, what recognition will he receive for his laboriously acquired accomplishments of mind and heart? Shall a hundred virtues be slighted merely because the possessor is thatched in an unusual color scheme? Speaking dispassionately and of course impersonally, I reply, Certainly not! So let us instantly dismiss Will Greenbaum's frivolous explanation and seek one that has the deep-toned ring of conviction about it.

Do I hear somebody saying: "Why seek reasons for Mr. Hirsch's being so well known? If he is well known, he isn't well known to me. Who is Max Hirsch?"

Well, I cheerfully admit that Max Hirsch is not one who forces himself on the public eye. He is a modest gentleman. He was in town for a week and managed to keep out of the newspapers. When he might have been giving interviews to the press he was exploring Muir Woods with Will Greenbaum or renewing old acquaintances in the hotel lobbies. But if you are a lover of opera you surely know Max Hirsch, at least by sight. Many a time during the big operatic seasons at the old Grand Opera House in Mission street you saw him emerge from the wings, a tall, broad shouldered, athletic figure crowned with snowy hair—(apparently we cannot ignore that hair)—and heard him express his regret that Madame Soandso or Senor Whatshisname was prevented by sudden illness from singing the big role of the evening's opera. Yes, that was Max Hirsch, for twenty-seven years the treasurer of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Every time the Metropolitan stars came to San Francisco Max Hirsch came with them. The last time was when the season was rudely interrupted by earthquake and fire. You remember that last night in the Grand Opera House? Of course you do. You were there? Naturally! There are as many San Franciscans who were in the Grand Opera House on that historic occasion as there are New Englanders whose ancestors came over in the Mayflower. As a souvenir of the next morning's sudden awakening and flight Max Hirsch carries the big brass key of his apartment at the Palace.

"It is my pocket piece," he says. "It has never left me since April 18, 1906."

Max Hirsch loves San Francisco. As a man of warm heart he loves the city and he loves his many local friends. As a man of business he has a great respect for the footings in the financial statements that he is in the habit of taking East after a sojourn here. If we ever acquire a big opera house Max Hirsch may be induced to make his home with us. But when he intimated as much, Will Greenbaum laughed a scoffing laugh.

"There is as much chance of prying him away from New York as there is of getting me away from San Francisco," declared Greenbaum. "Besides, when will we have an opera house?"

Which seems to settle the question, but is rather discouraging.

At the beginning of April Max Hirsch left Andreas Dippel in Chicago for the purpose of taking charge of Mary Garden's concert tour. The tour brought him back to San Francisco. Now the exigencies of the tour have taken him away from San Francisco and he was very sorry to go.

"It is one of the best music towns in the country," he says.

He ought to know. There isn't a city in the country large enough to be worth a star's while which Max Hirsch hasn't visited. And there isn't a great musical star who has sung in America in the last twenty-five years with whom he hasn't been associated.

MAX HIRSCH

Born in New York forty-seven years ago he began as a boy selling librettos, turning down opera seats and distributing lithographs. When the Metropolitan Opera Company was organized with Henry Abby as manager and Maurice Grau as director, he became its treasurer. He saw Abby fail for $160,000 and helped Dr. Leopold Damrosch reorganize the company. He has been through all its subsequent changes of management. Two years ago composers, artists and Metropolitan stockholders helped him celebrate his silver jubilee.

"The only man who ever made grand opera pay," he said, "was Maurice Grau. He alone declared a dividend for the stockholders. Of course we weren't paying the enormous salaries then that we are paying now. Although the company embraced all the leading singers of the world, it was smaller and we had no opposition. Besides, we gave the public what they wanted. We stuck to the favorite Italian and German operas."

Not that Hirsch does not think highly of the new operas. He speaks with respect of "Thais" and "Herodiade." He thinks "Natoma" will last.

"Although it is hard to say," he confessed. "We saw it born. We saw the artists working with the authors, living their parts. I regard Mary Garden as being in the first rank of singers. Whether another singer could do 'Natoma' as well as she is not easy to decide. But 'Natoma' looks good. Of course the critics were very severe on the text—"

At this point Max Hirsch smiled his engaging, bashful-boyish smile and made a peculiar gesture, as who should say, "Strange beings, the critics!"

I am afraid he doesn't take them too seriously, either here or in New York.

"They do not always know when changes are made in the printed program," he said. "It is amusing to read their remarks about the beautiful way in which the aria from 'Louise' or 'Herodiade' was sung when you happen to know that it wasn't sung at all. But of course in a city like San Francisco the critics cannot be as familiar with music as they are with drama. They get so few musical events during a season."

I wonder how the music critics would like to hear that? Some of them regard their work so solemnly. But Hirsch was quick to give them company in their misery.

"In an audience such as that which hears Mary Garden," he said, "not more than five in two thousand will know that changes have been made in the printed program. Sometimes when changes are necessary the artists will worry and ask me to have the changes announced. But I tell them not to mind; that nobody will know the difference."

Is Hirsch right about this? For the sake of the critics I hope that he has underestimated our musical knowledge.

Hirsch surprised me by declaring that artistic temperament is not translatable into plain ordinary temper as often as many of us have been led to believe. He says that operatic stars rarely sulk and that when they fail to appear it is usually because they are in physical pain. Sometimes they insist on singing, even when they are desperately ill. That, he says, was the case with Sybil Sanderson when she appeared here after winning fame abroad and made a wretched failure before her old friends.

"She was absolutely unfit to sing," he says. "I think that failure broke her heart."

Men and women, he speaks affectionately of them all. He has no illusions about them. Some of them he regards as one regards silly children who will grow up and learn to behave. When a Gadski quarrels with a Fremstad or a Melba with a Calve over the choice of dressing rooms which differ only in the color of the wall paper, he shrugs his shoulders and smiles. He knows they will be ashamed of themselves in a very little while.

"Grau used to say, 'Why should I worry? Hirsch is paid to do the worrying.' But I have had very little cause to worry. These people are very easy to handle, if you handle them like men and women. And I was never tired in my life."

His appearance seems to bear out the statement. But then, Max Hirsch is an exceptional man. A man who can laugh at the eccentricities of operatic stars and find amusement in the mistakes of musical critics must be an exceptional man. Your ordinary man who has to do with musicians is a serious person. He would tear his hair at such things. Not so Max Hirsch. That may be one of his capillary eccentricities.

Too Late

By Camille Mauclair (From the French)

Having assured himself that not a living soul was near this sequestered spot, meagrely illuminated by a few isolated gas lanterns and the pale radiance of the moon, Victor Deleutre heaved a deep sigh of relief and leaning for a moment for support against the stone parapet of the bridge, waited for the violent throbbing of his heart to subside into its normal beat. Then, very carefully and without the least manifestation of haste, he examined his attire and found it had not in any way become disarranged.

After all, the struggle had been a short one; and to hurl Julian Naviere into the Seine, Deleutre had caught him entirely off his guard and with such dexterity of hold, that a realization of peril must have come to his victim when it was too late. A gurgling cry of despair, and Naviere had disappeared beneath the dark and swiftly flowing waters of the river. No other sound had disturbed the tranquility of the night.

Deleutre was not long in gaining complete control over himself; yet he lingered for a moment or two at his post. On yonder side of the river, some distance from where he stood, but so far that no one could have seen what had happened on the bridge, there lay a number of boats. He waited lest one of these might be pushed from its moorings out on the river in response to Naviere's cry of distress, but discerned no sign of activity. There was deathlike stillness all around. Evidently there had been no witness to the deed. Then he moved. With a long and steady stride he left the bridge, the faint rays of the moon, now risen higher in the starlight heaven, encompassing his athletic frame with a dim and weird luster.

Deleutre was a business man of a cool, calculating disposition. He had attended a commercial banquet, that had lasted well into the night. As he was leaving, Julian Naviere, his competitor in business, offered his company and not being able to secure a cab proposed a walk in the cold crisp October air. Deleutre accepted, although he could not bear the man. More than once of late he had been severely hit financially by Naviere's foresight and cunning and even now, under the influence of the banquet's liquid concomitants, the man made bold to speak quite freely of still greater plans, which revealed to Deleutre's view and endless store of future troubles. But he showed nothing of impatience in his manner. Indeed, he listened attentively, though with a growing inward irritation. Then of a sudden, as they neared the bridge, an uncontrollable desire arose within him, to rid himself of this dangerous rival by one fell blow. A terrible determination and a peculiar indifference to consequences had taken possession of him. The possibility of committing a crime blazed upon his feverish imagination simultaneously with a lightning consideration of the means by which to execute it. He, Deleutre, otherwise deliberate and self-possessed, felt himself unexpectedly under the spell of a strange and horrible impulse to cause his hands, as it were, to move in reflex action, as they clutched his companion's throat and shoulder and hurled him to his watery grave.

He made his way home unmolested, went to bed, and fell into a deep slumber untroubled by either dreams or morbid fancies. When he at length awoke it was broad day. He arose, dressed himself with care and attended to his regular duties with customary punctiliousness. Absolute calm seemed to reside within him; nor did his thoughts cling to the recollection of the preceding night's drama; only from time to time would they revert to it. Not until he had arrived at his office and there disposed of his mail did he reflect upon his deed. With the methodical precision of the trained professional he passed in review in logical sequence the separate circumstances that had led up to the murder. He was sensible of a certain callous apathy towards the moral phase of his act. He felt neither contented nor distressed at the death of Naviere; yet he was alive to the fact of having committed a crime. But what seemed to appeal to him more forcibly was the circumstance that his friend's demise would result in pecuniary profit to himself; and he began to ponder over the manner and means by which he might with prudence repair his recent losses with his most dangerous competitor removed. Fear of discovery seemed absent. Indeed, he was quite astonished at his calmness and at a strange feeling of superiority and self-reliance, which appeared to raise him above all considerations of moral guilt or thoughts of personal peril.

He ate a hearty lunch and smoked his cigar with an apparent relish. After returning to the seclusion of his office he again fell to musing, when he was abruptly arrested by an extraordinary impulse. On his desk before him lay his opened letter copy book. With an air of complete abstraction he drew from his pocket a pencil and in a bold hand on the blank page of the copy book he wrote:

"In reply to your favor of the . . . . inst. we hasten to inform you that on the night of . . . inst. Mr. Victor Deleutre threw Mr Julian Naviere into the Seine river from the Grenelle bridge."

He paused. He felt a chill creep down his back, a momentary faintness overcame him, and with a swift and furtive glance around his office to assure himself that he was not unobserved, he tore the leaf from the book and flung it into the grate, where it soon was burnt to ashes. The temporary gloom which had oppressed him lifted. For an instant only had he labored under its gruesome pall, and then with so indistinct a perception of its significance, that he dismissed the incident with a contemptuous smile while he watched the incriminating message curl up in smoke. "Bosh," he mumbled to himself, "if I told the story it would be out—but as I won't ever again be so foolish as to set it down in black and white—" He stopped, drew himself up sharply, startled at the sound of his own voice.

The disappearance of Mr. Naviere occasioned a considerable stir throughout Paris. His body was taken two days later from the Seine near St. Cloud. There were no visible marks of physical violence, and neither money nor valuables were missing. His circumstances in life had been such as to preclude supposition of suicide. Indications pointed rather to an unfortunate accident or a murder through some other motive than that of robbery.

Mr. Deleutre was asked to appear before the prefect of police. Being a man of good standing in the community he was treated with consideration. In response to questions by the prefect, he related without the slightest show of embarrassment how he had accompanied Mr. Naviere from the banquet hall to the bridge and how, after offering to escort him home and having been refused, he left him there and returned to his own residence. He remained silent as to what Naviere had told him of his various business, but indulged in warm words of praise concerning the character and habits of the deceased, deploring at the same time the horrible fate that had befallen him. When he had concluded the prefect thanked him and he was allowed to leave.

The following day he attended the funeral obsequies of his friend. He was disturbed neither by a sense of fear nor lulled into an incautious repose. Moreover he felt no necessity for the exercise of any great amount of self-control. The part he played came to him quite naturally, as if he were carrying out a preconceived plan, carefully rehearsed in every detail. But he did it all in a rather perfunctory, mechanical sort of way, much as one reads a newspaper without stopping to spell the words or analyze the sentences.

A week passed and he gradually lapsed into his former staid and exemplary mode of life, apparently oblivious to the excitement he had caused or the possibility of further developments. Then there arrived another summons from the prefect. The officer of the law was as courteous and affable as at their first meeting and explained that the matter had practically been disposed of, that all the evidence tended toward the confirmation of the accident theory, and that Mr. Deleutre's presence had only been requested for the purpose of obtaining from him some light on the man's business prospects and plans, which perchance he may have revealed to so close a friend. Deleutre again appeared perfectly at ease and in a voice devoid of any trace of emotion or suppressed excitement, proceeded to tell at some length all that Naviere had confided to him. The prefect listened attentively and, as Deleutre progressed, began to manifest an obsequiousness of conduct bordering on friendly interest. When Deleutre had concluded he assured him that was the last time he would be importuned and, handing him a pen, bade him affix his signature to the transcript of the statements he had just made. Deleutre mechanically took the pen and wrote:

"In reply to your favor of ..... inst. we hasten to inform you that on the night of ..... inst. Mr. Victor Deleutre threw Mr. Julian Naviere into the Seine river from the Grenelle bridge."

He had written very rapidly, not so rapidly, however, that his action escaped the notice of the watchful official, who said:

"What are you doing, Mr. Deleutre? I asked you only for your signature."

Deleutre looked blankly at the official. "I am through," he mumbled, "all you need now is the date—" He started. The veil lifting as suddenly as it had enshrouded his mind, exposed to him with awful vividness the harrowing consequences that would follow in the train of this fatal lapse. An ashy pallor spread over his features. In speechless terror and with trembling knees he tottered forward and reached for the document—too late.

The Inferiority of Woman

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Just a few lines of your valuable space, if you please. I am not a suffragist, much less a suffragette. Instead of prating about woman's rights when I should be performing woman's duties, I keep house for my husband and children, and when I have half an hour to spend, instead of going to hear Dr. Aked or Father Gleason or any other reverend gentleman talk about the franchise for woman, I take the telephone off the hook and bestow myself in my husband's Morris chair for the purpose of improving my mind with some good book. Recently I have been reading Lecky's History of European Morals. That book was not written for women, but my husband thinks it is a good book for a woman of brains, and he approves my reading it. (No doubt you think I am conceited.) In the chapter devoted to the Position of Woman Lecky makes some remarks that ought to be called to the attention of the suffragists and the suffragettes. I think they demolish the entire position of those horrid creatures. Please give me space for them. Lecky says: "Intellectually, a certain inferiority of the female sex can hardly be denied when we remember how almost exclusively the foremost places in every department of science, literature and art have been occupied by men, how infinitesimally small is the number of women who have shown in any form the very highest order of genius, how many of the greatest men have achieved their greatness in defiance of the most adverse circumstances, and how completely women have failed in obtaining the first position, even in music or painting, for the cultivation of which their circumstances would appear most propitious. It is as impossible to find a female Raphael, or a female Handel, as a female Shakespeare or Newton. Women are intellectually more desultory and volatile than men; they are more occupied with particular instances than with general principles; they judge rather by intuitive perceptions than by deliberate reasoning or past experience." Again Lecky says: "In the ethics of intellect they are decidedly inferior. To repeat an expression I have already employed, women very rarely love truth, though they love passionately what they call 'the truth,' or opinions they have received from others, and hate vehemently those who differ from them. They are little capable of impartiality or of doubt; their thinking is chiefly a mode of feeling; though being generous in their acts, they are rarely generous in their opinions or in their judgments." And so on. I think Lecky is a dear and I hereby subscribe to every word of the above. But then, you see, instead of being a female politician I am

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Perhaps your subscriber would like to add this to his collection of macaronics:

Felis sedit by a hole,

The Spectator

Listen to the Preachers!

The seeds of depravity always being sown in our midst are so continually threatening to shoot out into full growth and luxuriance, and we are so seldom anywhere but on the brink of perdition that I have ceased to be affrighted by the awful prospect which our vigilant moralists are almost incessantly painting. Our pulpiteers may pulpitoot till the cows come home and be as rancorous as they please, and I'll refuse to bat an eye or elevate a brow. I've become absolutely callous to their clamor. This comes from that familiarity which breeds a tired feeling. I know them these many moons, these pious sentinels on the outskirts of virtue's realm; with their crotchets and conceits, their principles and predilections I am more than tolerably well acquainted, and therefore far from being susceptible to their enthusiasms. These clergymen, ever sensitive to the emotions of the daily press, always alert to echo the simulated sentiments by which our unmoral journalists impart verisimilitude to their otherwise bald and unconvincing narratives, have unconsciously taken on the complexion and absorbed the humor of the polluted source of all our demoralization. Every time a newspaper has a fit the preachers in town writhe in sympathetic agony.

Our Great Crisis

The other day Mayor McCarthy resolved to get rid of Chief of Police Seymour, whereupon the newspapers shrieked in unison and rage at what they described as a step preliminary to the complete surrender of the city to the forces of evil. Chief Seymour awoke to find himself famous as the only honest policeman that ever ruled the department. If reputation is the most precious of jewels what a boon for Seymour was the Mayor's resolution to get rid of his services! For be it known this is the same Seymour to whom the newspapers were pointing the finger of suspicion some months ago when Frank Daroux was reported to have the power to issue permits for the opening of gambling hells. Now far be it from me to impugn the integrity of Seymour whom I have always regarded as a police official superior in many respects to the prevailing standards of his profession. I had no criticism to offer respecting the Chief when he appeared to be the only man in San Francisco unconscious of the fact that the tiger was rampant, and I have none now. Indeed, I am not inclined to challenge his ability or his integrity. But I do challenge the sincerity of the daily newspapers that discovered his great virtues just about the time they learned that he was to be ousted from his position. Also do I challenge the intelligence, if not the sincerity, of the ministers who have been telling us that because he is to be removed we have "reached a crisis in the moral and spiritual life of the community." A lot these ministers know about the affairs of this community! Not less informed than the rest of them is the reverend gentleman who exclaimed at a meeting last Monday, "The Chinese lotteries will be opened again in our district if there is a change." What an awful calamity that would be! Yet the white lotteries are running right along, and the virtuous daily newspapers are publishing the winning numbers, and no Chief of Police even tried to stop them for a minute. Do the ministers know why they are unmolested? And, by the way, why are the ministers complaisant?

The Real Reason

With the McCarthy administration I am not in sympathy. I have never been in sympathy with any labor administration. But I am intolerant of nothing so much as pharisaism, and that is chiefly what inspires the assaults directed against McCarthy for his determination to remove Chief Seymour. Now this pharisaism by which the impression is deepened abroad that San Francisco is a modern Babylon where vice flaunts itself with impunity and all forms of wickedness are encouraged, is not to be justified even as a pretext for damning a labor administration. There are principles on which we ought to be able to obtain a change of administration without bespattering our family linen for exhibition purposes. The newspapers have not told the truth about the differences between McCarthy and Seymour. A little of the truth is that Chief Seymour has ignored the wishes of the Mayor with reference to the sphere of a certain captain's activities, and this certain captain is believed to receive a great deal of inspiration from a newspaper, which, from a period anterior to the death of Chief Biggy has meddled in police affairs in the interest of certain distinguished citizens who might not unjustly be regarded as commercial rivals of Jerome Bassity.

Work for Able Hands

If the clergymen who affect to be deeply concerned about the fate of Chief Seymour are sincerely eager to promote the moral welfare of the community I will gladly find good work for their able hands to do. I would direct their attention to a letter which appeared in Town Talk last week. It was signed "A Father." The writer complained of the pernicious character of the cheap moving picture shows, and he described some of the shocking scenes that are exhibited to boys and girls. He asked "Why should boys and girls of ten be made familiar with the aspects of vice and all sorts of crime?" And he said, "Whenever a performance that appeals to prurient tastes is given at one of the big theatres an awful uproar is raised by our ministers and club women, but surely it is more desirable to safeguard children from contact with scenes of vice than to put salacity beyond the reach of grown-ups." That letter was read by Mrs. W. H. Nicholl of the board of censors who has taken occasion to inform me that "A Father" was guilty of no exaggeration and that she greatly deplored the futility thus far of the efforts of herself and associates to bar the presentation of brutal and indecent pictures. She told me of an arrest that had been made, and of the incorrigibility of some of the theatre managers, but nothing of any assistance received from any aggressively righteous clergyman. Singularly enough no clergyman has taken enough interest in the matter to co-operate in any way with the board of censors. Perhaps the neglect of the clergy is due to the silence of the press.

He Knows Burns

"Bert." Schlessinger, the attorney who has been engaged for the purpose, as it is said, of conducting an anti-Burns bureau for the benefit of the McNamara brothers is exceptionally well qualified for whatever duties he may be called on to perform in that connection. He has had a very wide and intimate experience of Burns and his methods. He was one of the attorneys for the prosecution in the Dimmick case, and it was Burns who gathered the evidence. Dimmick is the man who was convicted of the crime of stealing $30,000 from the Mint. Ever since that conviction rumor has been persistent that Dimmick was not the man that committed the crime. If he took the money nobody has ever learned what he did with it. During his incarceration in the penitentiary his family was in dire distress, and since his liberation he has been employed in a very humble capacity. His friends never lost confidence in his integrity and at San Quentin he compelled belief in his innocence even among convicts, of whom it is said they never go wrong in sizing up one of their number. As Schlessinger has also been opposed to Burns in several cases he has been able to view him from all angles. His employment argues that the contest in Los Angeles will be a most bitter one and that the main scheme of the defense will be to picture the detective as a man utterly unscrupulous and capable of inventing frame-ups of the basest character. So while it will be a life-and-death struggle for the defendants the outcome will be decidedly fateful for the man who put them behind bars.

An Artist and a Critic

I stepped into the tapestry room of the St. Francis the other day to look at the portrait of Mr. Henry T. Scott which is on exhibition there. It is a conscientious performance. I was going to say that there was a certain amount of inspiration in it, but perhaps that would be going too far. The artists who are inspired by the study of hardheaded American millionaires of business are few and far between. There is no poetry in the type and your painter is ever a poet. With the American society woman, on the other hand, the big painters are usually very successful, for she is a poetical subject—though the poetry in her is sometimes the poetry of decadence. While I was studying the canvass from which the rugged features of Mr. Scott looked forth, I had the pleasure of being presented to the artist who is Mr. Louis Mark of Budapest. From one of the art critics of the morning papers I learn with interest that Mr. Mark is an artist of wide renown and that he has had many distinguished sitters since his arrival in this country. From the same source I have plucked a rare bloom of art criticism. Mr. Mark has other canvasses on exhibition in his apartments at the St. Francis and the art critic had been to see them. Among others mention is made of "a painting of a Denver girl, which is startling in its sheer beauty of expression and charm. Done in tones of blue and gray, the girl in her simple street costume, her wealth of hair crowned by a sweeping hat, is a poem of youth. She is ethical with the joy of living." I confess that "ethical with the joy of living" is a new one on me. What has ethics which is moral science or the science of moral duty, to do with the joy of living? Was there any definite idea in the mind of the art critic when that sentence was penned? Or was it just a chance agglomeration of words? I wonder what the distinguished artist from Budapest thought when he read that sentence.

Poets at Our World's Fair

Which of our World's Fair directors conceived the idea of organizing a World's Congress of Poets for the exposition? I am anxious to know in order that I may do fitting honor to a great imagination. A World's Congress of Poets would be a scream. Its lure would dim the glories of the Midway or the Trail or whatever we are going to call our ballyhoodom. To see a collection of poets with their eyes in fine frenzy rolling and their long locks tousled by lily white fingers, men and women who care naught for the common or garden attractions of world's fairs would hasten from the four corners of the globe. As Chicago had her Parliament of Religions, by all means let San Francisco have her Congress of Poets. That the proposition has been made—and made seriously—I learn from a newspaper account of the meeting of the Poetry Society in New York. The Poetry Society is sometimes irreverently called the Poets' Union. George Sterling who is a charter member says the purpose of the society is to awaken a more general interest in poetry, but he doesn't pretend to know how this is being done. At the last meeting, presided over by Poet Edward J. Wheeler, the editor of Current Literature, Poetess Jessie B. Rittenhouse said that interest in the Poetry Society was widespread, especially on the Pacific Coast. "One of the promoters of the Panama Exposition," she said, "has written to the society suggesting that it organize a World's Congress of Poets for the exposition. There have been world's congresses of religion, of art, of science, but never of poets. Why not of poets?" And we can only echo, Why not?

Who Conceived the Idea?

Would that the Fair director who broached this pretty project could be induced to emerge from obscurity so that we might all hail him as he deserves. It is extremely difficult to ascertain his identity by a posteriori reasoning or a process of elimination. President Charley Moore, it seems to me, would never think of a Congress of Poets. Editor De Young has no use for poets and besides, he is too busy "putting it in the Park." Will Crocker might be the man, for he has a subtle humor and likes to laugh in his sleeve; but, if I am not mistaken, he would get more fun out of a Congress of Itinerant Governors than one of poets. Reuben Hale of the mysterious smile may possibly have conceived the idea. He is a poet himself, as all will testify who read his recent address to the students of the University of the Pacific. Certainly Jim McNab had nothing to do with it. What has Pegasus to do with dray horses or the cart of Thespis with teaming trucks? And Jim Rolph is of course too intent on politics to bother about poetry. Frank Brown? Well, well! Here may be the very man! He looks the poet, with his mane of iron gray hair and his dreamy eyes. flow rhythmically and his oratorical utterances are modulated to versicular intonations. As Sydney Smith cultivated literature on a little oat meal, may not Brown lubricate poetry with Palmer Oil? If he be not the man, at least he ought to be.

The Poets' Reception Committee

It would be necessary, of course, to pick with extreme care a poetical committee of reception, to the end that the world's verse-smiths might find themselves at home when they visit our peninsula of the farthest west. Imagine how awkward Kipling would feel if he were mistaken for Alfred Austin by a blundering committeeman. Let us remember that Mayor McCarthy delivered a panegyric of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe under the appellation of Miss Julia Ward Howard, and take no chances. For chairman of that committee I would suggest George Sterling with an orchid in his button hole and on his waistcoat that fifty dollar nugget button which formerly belonged to Joaquin Miller and of which Sterling is mighty proud. Joaquin himself would come next, dressed in his deerskin gaberdine and his high boots, his whiskers streaming in the breeze. Joe Redding with the libretto of "Natoma" peeping from his trouser's pocket, MacLafferty of Oakland, McGroarty of the sunny southland, the fair author of "Eureka, California, Hail" which was turned down by a prosaic legislature, Tommy Nunan, the Examiner's poetical music critic and our French Consul who apotheosized divine Sarah bi-lingually might also be asked to serve. If more are needed, let Editor Charley Phillips of the Monitor suggest their names. The members of the Caedmon Club will bear me out in the declaration that he is our only divining rod for the discovery of subterranean Helicons.

Is Poetry Passing?

In the opinion of many wise ones, poetry is fast passing away, so our World's Congress of Poets might possess an historical significance such as would belong, let us say, to a World's Congress of Dodos. But perhaps poetry would survive the congress. Let us not be pessimistic like Poet W. B. Yeats who thinks that the Muse is withering under "the curse of too much print," an opinion echoed by the London Times which remarks tentatively, "No one of course would propose that poetry should cease to be printed," a sinister suggestion that has been received in gloomy silence. Let us rather be optimistic like Poet Edwin Markham who says, "We are told that the poet will disappear with the advancement of science, but this is not so. Without poetry we should be mere thinking machines, mere logic choppers." Over in England there seems to be a feeling that the vitality of poetry will soon be put to a severe test. The sentiment is that if the Muse survives Alfred Austin's coronation ode, she will have vindicated her immortality. If the poet laureate cannot kill poetry, they argue, nobody can. Which seems a substantial argument. Meanwhile a correspondent sends me some lines and wants to know if they are really from Austin's forthcoming ode. The correspondent says that he has seen them published as such, but has his doubts. Here they are:

Where are the 'orses? Where is the coach?
Wot is a-stoppin' ov there approach?
Oh, 'ere's 'is 'ighness! Tyke off yer 'at!
'Aven't ye manners, ye low-'eaded rat?
'Owl fer 'is 'ighness! 'Ail t' the crown,
'Ere's tuppence ha'penny, drink 'is 'ealth down!

My opinion is that Austin did not write these lines. There is too much spirit in them.

Our Vanishing Aquarium

The herd of seals that visits the rocks near the Cliff House seems doomed to extinction. And though those seals are as great an attraction as anything else peculiar to San Francisco nobody appears to care a tinker's imprecation how soon they become nothing more than a memory. Years ago the seal rocks were scarcely ever deserted. Even in the breeding season a few seals were to be found basking in the sun almost every day. Now there are times when for weeks no seals are to be seen. The most plausible explanation of their disappearance is that they are frightened away by the target practice of the coast artillery. When the big guns are brought into practice the herd vanishes. As it would probably be just as convenient to have target practice during the breeding season as any other, it might not be considered unreasonable to suggest to the War Department that some consideration be shown the nerves of the timid amphibians. This is a matter that certainly involves a question of public policy. To the seals we are indebted for a wonderful acquatic spectacle, and it is certainly to our interest to preserve that great natural aquarium at our doors. As I have said, it is in danger of extinction, and the chief reason is the fish trust. Every little while in the early hours of the morning the herd is attacked by fishermen with rifles. There are men at the beach who will gladly give their service to the State and guarantee to protect the seals from the fishermen. All they desire is the authority to do so.

A Critic on Criticasters

The editor of the San Jose Times is a most irreverent personage. Not only does he fail to take our daily newspaper critics of the drama seriously, he turns from them with impatience and writes about them with a pen dripping with a mixture of vinegar and gall. He tells us they are "dull and witless, and what is worse, are wholly unacquainted with the principles of criticism or with stage history and tradition." He goes further and says that Mr. Anthony of the Call "is the one critic who not only knows how to write English, but actually writes it." It is evident that the San Jose critic is a captious individual. His idea of criticism is that in addition to possessing the quality of soundness it should bear the brand of the well of English undefiled. He has a horror of linguistic outrages, and takes no stock in the theory that if purists had always prevailed language would never have progressed. With him doubtless it is a matter of conscience not to misuse words. It should be explained to him that our critics cultivate a proneness to singularity, a love of what's odd and out of the way, desiring to startle the reader with a succession of smart intellectual shocks.

A "Critic-ess"

The worst offender among the daily newspaper critics, according to the San Jose editor is a certain "dramatic critic-ess" who, he says, "walked the boards for fully four nights in a real theater." He tells us that her ideas are "charmingly puerile," her criticisms "beautifully worthless" and her information about the stage "gracefully immaterial, incompetent and irrelevant." As a specimen of her ignorance he points out her assertion that the trial scene in "The Merchant of Venice" is "almost as well done as it would have been by Henry Arthur Jones." The smartness of this assertion is wholly beyond his power of apprehension, the reason being, perhaps, that he is not acquainted with the current hero of all the culturines, Mr. George Bernard Shaw. George himself is a shocker who playfully intimates occasionally that in some respects he is superior to Shakespeare. He has taught the culturines the extreme modishness of speaking disrespectfully of Shakespeare and the equator. Hence the brave suggestion that occasionally the technique of the author of "The Merchant of Venice" is at times equal to that of the author of "Rebellious Susan." This suggestion, I submit, has the merit of delightful pose, and should not be taken so seriously as the attitude of some of the other critics toward Shakespeare. During the Sothern-Marlowe engagement they were astonished to find that the immortal playwright was not dead. They marveled at tributes of appreciation, they were astonished at the laughs provoked by his comedy, at the thrills caused by his tragedy. From all that was implied in the criticisms which I read one might conclude that the survival of Shakespeare as demonstrated at the Savoy was a phenomenon beyond human comprehension. But why rail at our critics? They are an inexhaustible fountain of amusement. Consider their appreciations of Mary Garden.

The Truth from Santa Cruz

From the raging editor of the San Jose Times I turn to the oracle of the Santa Cruz News. He, too, knows dramatic criticism when he sees it, and he's onto our critics, but he doesn't throw any conniption fits. "It is amusing to an old-time theatergoer," says he, "to read the dramatic reviews of some of the younger of the San Francisco critics." There we have the amiable, indulgent tone of empiric wisdom. The News man gently reproves one of our critics for comparing Sothern, Warde, Mantell and Mansfield and making no mention of Booth and Irving. Without bitterness he chides all our critics for not telling the truth, which is "that outside of a few love-sick roles E. H. Sothern cannot act at all." This dictum will probably be more painful to Mr. Sothern than to the critics. But he may console himself with the reflection that to him from a monetary, if not from an artistic, standpoint the judgment of Broadway is worth more than that of the Pacific avenue that leads to the beach and the Casino at dear old Santa Cruz. But the News man has not ended his discourse. Thus does he perorate: "With one or two exceptions the critics of the daily papers of San Francisco are better at describing the kisses of a Mary Garden or the sinuosities of the latest nature dance than at treating seriously the relative merits of the Shakespearean actors who have graced the California stage." In other words inspiration comes from what's worth while, and talent is not lacking to picture the true and the beautiful.

Criticism In Pasadena

Perhaps it would be well for our critics to go to Pasadena there to acquire the rudiments of the Aristotelian trade. Pasadena is the school of critics of true taste and feeling. Frank Patterson writing to the New York Sun from Pasadena says: "Accustomed as we poor health exiles are to the flowers of wild Western journalism, we are more than tickled by the following which appeared the other day in a local newspaper." This is what he quotes: "Miss Coleman who plays with the life-feeling and expression of any composer's art, played Chopin this morning as Chopin would have played his own music if he had not had a tubercular chest."

A Lesson in Criminal Law

From the experience of John Walter Wilson, acquitted of murder last week, our innovators of the Bar Association and the Commonwealth Club who think it important that we should make it more difficult for guilty men to escape, may be able to derive food for wholesome reflection. These innovators suffer from a defect peculiar to the average citizen. Unable to embrace a complicated whole unless the component parts are first separately surveyed and catalogued, they neglect to do what is essential to their understanding. Thus they have failed to see that if it be made easier to convict the guilty it will also be made more difficult to acquit the innocent. As justice is administered in some of our courts the possibility of sending an innocent man to the penitentiary or the gallows is by no means exiguous. But a few years ago an innocent man was released from the penitentiary, not because he was able to prove his innocence but because the man who committed the crime confessed his guilt. How many there are unjustly wearing stripes, who can say? Of the guilt of no small number there is doubt in the minds of men. Now of the guilt of John Walter Wilson there was doubt in the minds of the jury by which he was convicted when tried by Judge Frank H Dunne. Else why should they have spared him from the gallows? For a poisoner there is no mercy. The jury was not merciful. It was cautious being in fear of its own conscience. Tried before Judge Dunne the presumption was that Wilson did not get a fair trial, and that the presumption was justly indulged may be inferred from the quick acquittal by the second jury without detracting from the achievement that has gone to the credit of an able and generous attorney—Mr. Samuel M. Shortridge.

"Discretion" on the Bench

Most of our criminal law innovators are in favor of enlarging the "discretion" of the trial judge. If the trial judge had as much "discretion" as they would give him John Walter Wilson might not have obtained a new trial. For Judge Dunne did nothing more than exercise a little more "discretion" than the law allows. For example, he would not permit the defendant to show that the deceased was afflicted with the suicidal mania, a circumstance which, considered in connection with certain other circumstances, gave rise to the question whether the deceased had not taken his own life. It should perhaps be explained that when lawyers speak of the "discretion" of a judge they do not mean that he is discreet. In the case of Judge Dunne it means his power of cinching the man on trial.

He—If you weren't in love with Jack, why did you accept him?

She—Because all the other girls were.

Hearst's Political Plans

Before leaving for Europe William Randolph Hearst was interviewed about politics and expressed the bielef that the Hon. Beauchamp Clark was "very conspicuous for 1912," a form of speech which may be interpreted two ways. It may mean that Clark is a presidential possibility; then again it may convey the idea that he will be a shining mark for the missiles of an eccentric Democracy. Like the Delphic oracle and the weird sisters Mr. Hearst speaks in riddles. Asked point blank, "Would you run yourself?" Mr. Hearst answered "No"; but added, "Well, you never can tell, but I don't think that is a legitimate question." Of course you never can tell what Mr. Hearst has in his mind or up his sleeve. Meanwhile the New York Sun predicts that Mr. Hearst will try to be a delegate to the national convention next year. Just how he is to accomplish this the Sun does not pretend to know. It hints faint-heartedly that he may patch up his differences of four years' standing with Boss Murphy of Tammany. Again, you never can tell, for Mr. Hearst is no leopard with unchangeable spots but a very chameleon of politics.

The Amateur Doctor in Berkeley

Having elected its Socialist mayor, Berkeley was about to settle down to its wonted calm of scholastic drowsiness when Editor Friend Richardson of the Berkeley Gazette suddenly decided to hold a personally conducted celebration of the triumph of the anti-vaccinationists. Acting immediately on this decision Editor Richardson has been indulging in an orgy of self-gratulation. He has been trumpeting the fact that the recent Legislature abolished the law making vaccination of school children compulsory and calling attention to his own mighty efforts to facilitate the spread of small pox. "According to the believers in vaccination," says Editor Richardson, "that practice makes them immune from small pox and being immune they need have no fear

PÈRES CHARTREUX

—Green and Yellow—

The original and genuine Chartreuse has always been and still is made by the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux), who, since their expulsion from France, have been located at Tarragona, Spain; and, although the old labels and insignia originated by the Monks have been adjudged by the Federal Courts of this country to be still the exclusive property of the Monks, their world-renowned products is nowadays known as "Liqueur Pères Chartreux."

of those who are vaccinated." An argument worthy of the cause, this; an argument which assumes that health and disease are matters of individual concern, in no wise related to public policy. In order to impress upon his readers the tremendous importance of the victory won at the Legislature Editor Richardson quotes from a letter of congratulation addressed to him by Harry B. Bradford, president of the Anti-Compulsory Vaccination Society of the District of Columbia. One excerpt will suffice to convey its general tone: "Then, mind you, after all this advice, these same grafters seek to compel their wholesome, healthy children, to have the disgusting discharge from an artificially produced ulcer of a diseased calf, injected directly into their very vital blood! I am very glad such criminality and rank inconsistency does not appeal to the adult brains grown in the Golden States! If the disfranchized slaves of the national capitol had as much, we might get better laws for the District of Columbia." Is a man who refers to the citizens of the District of Columbia as "disfranchized slaves" worthy to head any public movement?

A Dog Bit Him

Not content with his amateur excursions into the dangerous field of vaccine, Editor Richardson has also been waging war on those who would warn us against hydrophobia. "The madness if there is any is the madness of auto-suggestion," says the Berkeley medical volunteer, "the madness that the person brings on to himself by fear." And he goes on to prove his case: "The editor of the Gazette was bitten recently by a dog. The dog was not mad, neither was the editor, at least no madder than he is normally. Nature healed the wound and the dog still enjoys good health. Having gone through the ordeal of biting an editor that dog is good for a long and useful career. We have not even ill-will against the dog but we do have the most intense feeling against men who will inflame the public with mad dog scares for mercenary reasons." Now here may be a solution of the whole difficulty. Is it possible that the explanation of Editor Richardson's hysterico-medical editorial cavortings lies in the fact that he is suffering from hydrophobia and doesn't know it? We would remind Editor Richardson that a distinguished Irish poet who was also a physician was the author of the following sinister lines:

But soon a wonder came to light
That showed the rogues they lied;
The dog recovered of the bite,
The man it was that died.

Bachelors Eager for Quarters

The members of the Olympic Club will not be in their new home before the end of the year, but already the applications for rooms from bachelors who wish to live at the club are greatly in excess of the number of rooms that are to be provided. The club will be able to accommodate seventy of its members, and there are over a hundred looking forward to the pleasure of making their home in what will unquestionably be the most luxurious athletic club in the world. The prospect is one that is giving the directors some uneasiness. It has been suggested that premiums be called for, and one member has offered $2,500 for first choice. I am told that the majority of the directors are against the premium proposal, and in favor of having the rooms chosen by lot.

First Cannibal—How did the actor taste?

Travelers Who Disagree

If beauty be in the eye of the beholder, it is not strange to find observers differing as to the charms of the countries through which they travel. Of this I am reminded by the diverse views of Ireland expressed by two California travelers. According to Editor McClatchy of the Sacramento Bee, "The beauties of Ireland could scarcely be compared with those of England. They are of an entirely different nature. England's beauty is joyous, roseate, sunshiny. It makes you feel lighter, more cheerful. It invigorates and puts ginger into you. It is the beauty of happiness, of content, of peace. The beauty of Erin is that of a stricken widow—'like Niobe, all tears.' It is the beauty of grief, not of joy. It is a beauty which depresses, and anon makes the gorge rise. In England the cottages adorn the landscape; in Ireland the hovels shame it." Contrast with this the exclamatory admiration of Dr. Morrison of Berkeley who has been doing Ireland with Monsignor Fisher of Santa Cruz and whose glowing words Dr. Fisher thus preserves for the Santa Cruz Sentinel: "This is wonderful. Surely Ireland is coming to her own. What magnificent scenery! Dublin's suburbs are incomparable. When I see such wealth of beauty, natural and otherwise—for the beauty of Irish scenery is rivalled only by the beauty of Erin's daughters—when I see such courtliness in her people, I am sorry that Irish blood does not flow in my veins." Every man to his taste. If you don't approve one view, try the other.

Charley is a Booster

Let it be said to the credit of Editor McClatchy, however, that he is a booster for his native State. In the cities of the old world he does not forget the peculiar attractions of the Paris of America. Hearken once more to Charley: "A visit to Phoenix Park, Dublin, showed a very, very beautiful park. The ground is rolling, the grass is ever green, the trees are stately, the views are magnificent. It will compare favorably with the park on the Pincian Hill at Rome, Hyde Park in London, or the great parks in Paris—all beautiful in themselves and beautiful in their surroundings. But I have yet to see any park anywhere—whether in the United

Chivalry a la Rowell

Under the brief title of "Chivalry" I found the following editorial in Chester H. Rowell's Fresno Republican a few days ago:

A woman publicly horsewhipped a man in Kansas yesterday, and as usual he merely had her arrested. Why not thrash her, like a man? The rules of chivalry do not apply to such cases. The woman has herself abrogated them. By appealing to the arbitrament of brute force she has invited response in kind. Of course, only too often, the man knows himself to be a contemptible cur, and appropriately acts as one. But otherwise, if a man were to met a woman assailant by smashing her between the eyes with his fist, kicking her down stairs, and expressing his opinion of her in language which gentlemen do not use to ladies, he would be acting in exact accord with the proprieties of the situation which she has herself created.

Editor Rowell is nothing if not logical. Having helped to introduce the progressive principle into California politics, he now applies it to the relations of the sexes.

"How is the filing system? Do you like it?" asked the agent of the merchant to whom he had sold a "system" a few days before.

"Great!" said the merchant.

"Good!" said the agent, rubbing his hands. "And how is business?"

"Business: echoed the merchant. "Oh, we have stopped business to attend to the filing system."

Workmen's Pensions in France

No more tangled question of internal policy is now before the French Government than that of the workmen's pensions. The law is to go into operation for future beneficiaries on July 3 this year. Two months before that date all the workmen and workwomen were to make a formal application. The local authorities in each town, village and commune supplied prospective beneficiaries with blank slips of paper, which were to be filled up and handed in. According to the data furnished, each person was to be ranked in a certain class of future pensioners. Contrary to what seems to have been the expectation of those who voted the law, the workmen all over the country failed to show any enthusiasm. The authorities have been obliged to inaugurate a veritable campaign to bring home to the minds of the workmen the advantages which they might derive from the law, and to persuade them to fill up the forms of application. In Paris the last few days up to April 30 brought in a certain number of applications, which rose from 10,000 to something above 20,000; but there should have been 200,000, according to certain statistics. In the provinces workmen seem to have been equally indifferent. Political capital, of course, is being made out of the refusal of the workmen by the Opposition; yet, as the reluctance of the workmen is so general it seems that something must be seriously, if not radically, wrong with the mechanism of the law. As far as can be judged the workmen object to contributing any share whatever to the general fund. They want the State to insure them a gratuitous pension or none at all. As the law now stands, it seems that a man must contribute eight francs a year, his employer contributes an equal sum, and the State adds a third. The workmen argue, or have at least been made to believe, that not only will they have to contribute their share, but that their employers will deduct the same amount from their wages. In consequence, trade unions nearly all over the country have started an agitation against the law. The workmen have been persuaded that it is only a trap for them, and that they will never see their pensions. This accounts for the bad reception of the law.

Something Wrong

She had just returned from a shopping tour, tired, but radiant.

He had just returned from the office, tired, but —well, tired.

Quivering with delight at the array of samples snipped from rolls of dress goods, she emptied the contents of her purse into her lap. There was a metallic sound. A look of dismay crossed her face.

"There!" she exclaimed. "I just knew there was something I had forgotten to buy."

"What was it, dear?" he asked with an assumption of interest.

"I'm sure I don't know," she replied petulantly, "but I find I have a half dollar left!"

This incident will explain why the big department stores pay such small dividends.

Last Hours

By Bernardo Couto Castillo (From the Spanish)

The yellow rays of the little night lamp and the whiteness of the bed clothes were all that could be seen, at first, in the huge room.

When the eyes had accustomed themselves to the semi-obscurity, one could see on the bed a hollow face of a livid yellow color, anguished and moist eyes, which were fixed anxiously, with all the life that remained in them, on the door of the room, and long, bony hands which plucked the sheets, moving about tremulously like wounded tarantulas, and constantly drawing the sheets towards his face, with a mechanical and instinctive movement, as if wishing, according to the phrase of a celebrated psychologist, to clothe himself beforehand with his shroud.

In the doorway appeared the silhouette of the doctor, a tall figure enveloped in a long coat. The eyes of the sick man glittered; with slow steps the black clad figure approached a swinging chair, where a youth, still beardless, was yawning with an air of ennui. A few words were exchanged, and the steps were directed towards the bed. The sick man's eyes were dilated, and a voice barely perceptible stammered:

"I will live a year—two years—that's all —doctor!"

The physician answered nothing, but the absolute impassiveness of his face was broken by an involuntary twitch of pity, at which the restless hands were raised,and the emaciated body of the sick man trembled.

The physician stood motionless, looking at the doomed man with an air compounded of pity and curiosity, such as even those most accustomed to see the fatal line crossed have in the presence of the forced travelers. The unfortunate creature read his sentence in that attitude, and with an effort he endeavored to command himself, to hearten himself, while he continued his monologue:

"Yes—all was finished—it had to happen—but what? What is life? Whom do I leave? How strange—what shall I miss after death?"

In vain he convinced himself that he was old, that he had neither son nor brother nor wife; in his heart there was nothing, absolutely nothing, not even memories. Had he loved anything in the world outside his egotistical tranquillity? No, in truth. Others, though they journey through life bearing ruin, in the moment of death come to picture to themselves faces that smile or weep, figures of friends who have passed, memories of good times that outline themselves; but for him, nothing, nothing, nothing—the most complete emptiness. And yet——?

Yet he was holding tight to life, holding to it with anxiety, with all his will and all his forces. If the forces were able to overcome death—! And he was going over all that his life had been, the most common, the most barren events, the most monotonous of existences—a life that would be the despair of the most easy-going novelist.

His infancy? Some years of timidity. He had no echoes of laughter, of games, of blows; he could not recall at that moment infantile cries—not even the chattering of wicked birds that called him or picked at him. In his youth, two events; the death of his father, and, almost immediately afterwards, the death of his mother. All that these two events represented for him were two nights passed by the side of the corpses, taking care of the wax tapers that burned and sputtered. From then on, solitary meals, two places less at the common table. Beyond this, nothing was changed; the same servants, the same house, the same actions, and the same words.

He used to see crowds of young men laughing, going to their ruin perhaps, but a ruin preceded by the clink of glasses and the resounding of mirth. He used to see splendid women and smiling women, the outspoken proclamations of twenty; and he would flee, fearful of the expense, of the deeds, of leaving his musty old tortoise's shell.

He had never wished to make a home, for horror again of the expense and the discussions. The fair little heads and white dresses that cluster around the table and the bed, and animate the house like chattering bunches of flowers, were for him nothing but so many mouths, so many dresses, so many professors—endless numbers of dollars disappearing with frightful rapidity.

To expend a certain amount of money, to change his housekeeper, were the pains of his life. His pleasures were to go to a public garden on a certain day each week, to take the same turns, to hear the same strident noises of the same crowd, to find the same faces, and look on at the same idyls of the people.

Once in a while, to ease his conscience, or better, with the hope of being amply repaid in another life, he had placed some coins in one of the trembling dirty hands held out imploringly to the passeby. Now as he recalled the deeds of his every moment, he congratulated himself, and if he had been able to tell it to God himself, to repeat it, to have it set down in a book, even to require a receipt, he would gladly have done it.

In his later years he somewhat repented of not having married, but only because he might have found in the woman a solicitous nurse, one whose care might have prolonged his days. In order that the doctor might stay longer, he said to him:

"Give me three years, doctor, no more. I will marry, and my wife will take good care of me. Is it not true that——"

He made a frightened gesture, the hands moved nervously, the sheets were drawn up still further. Another gesture, and his eyes assumed the immobility of agate—the eyes of the dead.

"All over!" said the physician, feeling the pulse.

"At last!" exclaimed the beardless nephew, the heir of his uncle's wealth, unable to contain his inconsiderate joy.

And this was the funeral oration, the only words ever elicited by the death of the good old gentleman.

Disqualified

One west side woman who thought herself an ardent suffragist was surprised to learn that other members of the sisterhood did not share her opinion.

"Why do you doubt my devotion to the cause?" she asked. "What have I done to make you think me less earnest than the rest of you women?"

Their answer was a letter which she had written to headquarters the day before.

"You wrote on your husband's stationery," they said. "No suffragist who is worth her salt will write a personal letter under her husband's letterheads."

The Prudishness of Mary

That Mary Garden of "Salome" fame should find our "turkey trot" and our "Texas Tommy" distasteful only goes to prove that in matters of taste one must always expect the unexpected. That Mr. Joe Redding who was her host on the occasion when she manifested her disapproval of these terpsichorean eccentricities was unfeignedly surprised by her prudishness only heightens the piquancy of the incident. Miss Garden, it seems, does not believe in doing in San Francisco as the San Franciscans do. She does not even believe in encouraging San Franciscan ways by quietly tolerating them. She holds that when the ways of San Francisco do not appeal the unsympathetic visitor should lodge a protest and she protested by running away. It was her privilege,

MISS MADGE CUNNINGHAM

I suppose. But still, I do not think that Miss Garden would have suffered any moral hurt by continuing as a spectator of the "turkey trot" or the "Texas Tommy." These dances are not really as bad as their names. When they are danced in a restaurant of general patronage like that very popular place to which Mr. Redding took Miss Garden, they do not transcend the bounds of discretion. Some soothsayers freely assert that within a year or so they will be introduced into our most exclusive ball rooms. In that event even Miss Garden would not have the hardihood to object. When the waltz was still a novelty terrific philippics were launched against it. Readers will remember Byron's scathing poem. And yet Miss Garden waltzes.

A Slam at Society

There are more ways than one of looking at Mary's surprising behavior. For instance, one may inspect it from the angle of its social significance. Did Mary intend to slam San Francisco society? Did she carefully enact her protest for the purpose of showing that she has small regard for our local aristocrats, devotees of the dance who thronged to her concerts and delighted in doing her honor? These are natural questions. If Mary liked our social leaders would she not smilingly acquiesce in their favorite diversions rather than imply that they are addicted to indecent behaviour? It would seem so. Well, the "turkey trot" and the "Texas Tommy," dances that shock the unconventional prima donna, are enthusiastically acclaimed in society. It is not long since the veracious newspapers told us about a coterie of exclusives who hied them to the beach for the purpose of indulging in these dances. That was not an unique instance. Mr. Jimmy Phelan chaperoned another beach party for the same purpose. When Pavlowa went to the Barbary Coast to dance the "turkey trot" with Tartar zeal a number of our haughtiest men and matrons accompanied her and were proud to dance in her company. Maxine Elliott was taken to another Barbary Coast resort to see these dances and did not find it necessary to save her morals by hasty flight. And only a few nights after Mr. Redding's interrupted party I was in the same restaurant and saw Mr. Ernest Wiltsee with a party of ladies and gentlemen, all of whom did not scruple to dance the dances which so shocked contrary Mary. Surely if Ernest Wiltsee approves these dances they cannot be beyond the pale. Mr. Wiltsee is the close friend of Mr. John Hays Hammond, our embassador to the coronation, and should know what's what.

Let Us Have an Investigation

However, there should be some definite settlement of the propriety of these dances. They have taken a strong hold on this community. San Francisco has become used to them. It may be that we have grown so used to them that we are blind to their evil tendencies. Why not have an investigation? Let us ascertain, once and for all, whether they are dances of seduction like the dance of the Seven Veils which Miss Garden has danced in "Salome" for the enravishment of a stage Herod. If they are as bad as they appeared to Miss Garden let them be anathema. On the other hand, if—and here we could obtain interesting testimony from society men and women—if they are not as bad as they look to the unaccustomed eye, let us extend to them our approval, or at least our toleration. I hereby place in nomination the man who is best qualified to make this investigation on behalf of San Francisco. I refer to the Rev. Dr. Aked. Let him visit the interesting places where these dances flourish. Let him observe them closely. Let him study the men and women who dance them. Let him dance them himself and thereby discover whether the effect they produce is subjective or objective. Will Dr. Aked kindly receive this suggestion in the spirit which prompts it and get busy?

Apparently Mary Doesn't Care

If Mary Garden suffered from heart qualms during her visit in this city she heroically concealed them from all those who were privileged to enjoy her society. There was no evidence in the Garden demeanor to prove that the Garden soul was wrenched by the perfidy of an accepted suitor. And yet, there are those who say that a bit of news which flashed over the wires from Philadelphia a few days ago played havoc with the peace of mind of the spectacular songbird. This bit of news was to the effect that T. T. Stotesbury was to marry Mrs. Oliver Cromwell of New York. An innocent bit of news apparently, and of no interest except to the persons immediately concerned and their intimate friends. Not so, however. In the eyes of many T. T. Stotesbury was the accepted suitor of Mary Garden. When Mary was last in Philadelphia it was freely stated that she and Stotesbury were engaged. To an interviewer who asked her about the rumor she smilingly replied: "Really, if you wish to know anything about that, you will have to see Mr. Stotesbury, but I assure you we are not quite ready to announce our engagement." It was a baffling answer, but it was not calculated to put the rumor to death. Unfortunately, no body had the hardihood to act on Mary's suggestion and quiz Mr. Stotesbury, for it was known that that gentleman was surrounded by a large bodyguard of husky bouncers who had on previous occasions demonstrated their ability to protect him from prying newspapermen. When Mary Garden sang in Philadelphia Mr. Stotesbury paid the $50,000 deficit of the preceding season and guaranteed $100,000 for the same purpose during the diva's engagement. He can well afford to do this because he is head of the banking house of Drexel and Company. But his friends considered that his generosity was not entirely prompted by his well known love of music. So there you are. But as I said in the beginning, if Mary is unhappy over the romance of Mr. Stotesbury and Mrs. Oliver Cromwell, she has taken care not to wear her torn heart upon her sleeve.

An Interesting Engagement

An engagement that will come as a pleasant surprise to their many friends is that of Miss Madge Cunningham, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Loring Cunningham, and Clarence Edgar Todd. Miss Cunningham is a brilliant and attractive girl who graduated with high honors in the class of '07 from the University of California. Having little taste for society she turned her attention to the more serious side of life and although very young took a position as school teacher in Oakland which she filled with great credit to herself and to the admiration of the school board. Mr. Todd is a rising young lawyer associated with Albert H. Elliott. Mrs. Cunningham was formerly Miss Carrie Wheaton. She and her sister, Mrs. Lloyd Baldwin, Sr. (Belle Wheaton) were well known in their girlhood days with the young set prominent at that time. Mrs. Lloyd Baldwin, Sr., is today one of the leaders of the Suffrage League of this city. The wedding will take place at noon on Wednesday, June 7, at the First Unitarian Church, Rev. Bradford Leavitt officiating. Both bride and groom will be unattended and only immediate relatives will be present. Among these will be Mrs. Lloyd Baldwin, Sr., Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Baldwin, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Russell Selfridge (Grace Baldwin), Mr. and Mrs. Adelbert Adams Blackmer (Enid Cunningham), and Ralph Cunningham, the brother of the bride. After a wedding tour the bride and groom will reside in this city.

A Wife's Revenge

This is not an anecdote of our most exclusive society, but it concerns a young married couple who are pretty well known and it is a tale with a moral, so I take pleasure in placing it before my readers. The hubby in the case has shown a disposition to chafe at the restraints of married life and has expressed his growing restlessness by remaining away from home for lengthy intervals with increasing frequency. Quite recently he stayed away for three days and the better part of three nights, thereby exceeding the bounds of the most charitable wifely consideration. On the third night wifey made up her mind that if hubby returned before morning it would be fitting to receive him with emphatic demonstrations of her state of mind. So at ten o'clock she attired herself in a dressing robe, armed herself with a rolling pin and took up her station in a comfortable arm chair just within the entrance of the flat. It was a long and uninspiring vigil and when the cuckoo had chirped the morning hour of three she gave up watch and retired to her bedroom. What was her surprise to find hubby tucked beneath the covers and sleeping the sleep of innocence. He had somehow or other anticipated wifey's strategy and had sneaked in by the back way shortly after midnight. Wifey vindicated her superior generalship by falling upon his unresisting form and thrashing him soundly with the plebeian rolling pin. The moral of this story is, Never execute a flank movement when the enemy controls the heavy artillery.

Another Local Girl Makes Good

From New York comes intelligence which enables me to add another name to the long list of San Francisco girls who have achieved marked success. I refer to Miss Grace Ewing who has made a name for herself in the musical milieu of the metropolis. Miss Ewing is the daughter of Charles G. Ewing who was a prominent business man here in early days and later a vice-consul in Australia. Miss Florence and Miss Jessie Ewing are her sisters and occupy the old family home at Washington and Scott streets. Grace Ewing went abroad to study music and made her debut in London two years ago under the patronage of Princess Christian and Princess Louise. She has an exceptional contralto voice and besides giving concerts, lectures on the evolution of ballad poetry with vocal illustrations. These lectures have made a special appeal to the women's clubs and have also been given under the auspices of the Board of Education of New York.

Miss Dean's Local Relatives

It may not be generally known that Miss Julia Dean, who was here recently as leading woman in Nance O'Neil's company, has relatives in San Francisco society. She is a cousin of Miss Julia Langhorne. Mrs. Langhorne, the mother of this society girl, was a Miss Hayne and a relative of Julia Dean Hayne who was a famous actress. On previous visits to this city Miss Dean was honored with many teas, luncheons and dinners, but during here recent visit she did not evince an enthusiasm for society. No doubt she has found that the exacting demands of the stage leave little time for frivolous pursuits.

The End of a Romance

The domestic difficulties of the Douglas Frys have occupied society for two weeks and friends of the young couple are awaiting the outcome. Sympathy of many people is for young Mrs. Fry, who is prostrated over the sad ending of her romance. Since the sensational double marriage of Dolly McGavin and Fry last year the young bride has devoted herself to her home. They lived in an apartment in Van Ness avenue and practised a rigid economy, which she very cheerfully met. Mrs. R. D. Fry, the young husband's grandmother, had previously given him a liberal allowance but her disapproval of the runaway match was shown in her discontinuance of it. A few weeks ago the McGavins secured a good position for their son-in-law and it was believed there would be smooth sailing for the pair. The break was unexpected, and none was more stunned by it than the young wife herself when her husband without warning one night announced his intention of leaving the house never to return. He waited long enough to call a taxicab for his wife and send her in hysterics to her parents.

The Oxnards at Redwood

Latest to join the millionaire colony down the peninsula are the Robert Oxnards, who have purchased a tract of ninety acres in the foothills back of Redwood City, where they propose to erect a mansion in keeping with the millions Oxnard has amassed in the beet sugar industry. Their home will command a sweeping view of the valley from its eminence at the top of the tallest hill in the tract, which includes the old Horace Hawes site which was one of the show places of the country forty years ago. This is Mrs. Nellie Oxnard's first venture down Burlingame-Hillsborough-San Mateo way. Mrs. Oxnard belongs to the Stetson family, being a daughter of the late James B. Stetson, street railway millionaire, who married the wealthy Mrs. Doe. Mrs. Oxnard's first husband was a foreigner.

Sarah in Sacramento

Who were the Sacramento society women who attempted to storm Sarah Bernhardt in the sacred seclusion of her special train and met with a rebuff which sent them packing in red-cheeked indignation? There is a writer on the Sacramento Bee who knows but refuses to tell. However the story is so good that it brooks anonymity. The divine Sarah played a one-night stand at the Clunie Theater and during her brief stay in the capital spent her time between the theater and her private car in the railroad yards. A certain coterie of society women resolved to ignore the usual formalities and visit her there without waiting to be bidden. The Bee writer tells what happened, as follows: What they expected to do if she admitted them to her regal presence is not in the record. They might have contemplated trying out their French on her, or they might have regarded themselves only as mere pilgrims, heroine worshippers, who would kow-tow before the actress just because she happened to be Sarah. Anyway, they hiked down to the freight yards, all dressed to kill and ready to practice any arts of bluff or persuasion on Sarah's bodyguard in order to get admitted to her society. But there was no admittance. There was no outward sign of life. Perhaps Sarah had seen them coming! This looked like a rebuke. What would they do? They got their heads together and held a little council of war. One of them should knock at the door to see if milady was home—or aboard. Mrs. G———, who is known for her temerity in bearding lions in their dens, said she'd dare. She dared, all right. But simultaneously with her knock up went a curtain at one of Sarah's windows—shoved up by no other hand than her own, revealing her in all her—what? Beauty, divinity, graciousness—no. No—in all her leonine, fishwifely meanness. She made faces at the pilgrims, stuck out her tongue at them—and it's a long one, too—and all but put the thumb of her spread hand against the tip of her patrician nose as a means of emphasizing by that most expressive gesture in the language of signs her supremest contempt. She had suddenly become the fiend incarnate, a very viper in human form, who shoots out her fangs to frighten intruders upon her nest. To say the pilgrims were astonished is only stating it. They were all but knocked out by this single Witch of Endor, struck speechless, flabbergasted! Slowly their wits came back to them and then they fled, saying to themselves, "Never again, never again." But they didn't need to say anything. They'll never get another chance.

The Pedler Duchess

For a titled woman to become a pedler from choice is rather unusual, but Paris is prepared for everything, and an archduchess selling lace there created very little sensation, though she did a land office business for the few hours she was in trade. Archduchess Isabella of Austria, wife of the Archduke Frederick and mother of six girls and a boy who is heir to the greatest fortune in Austria, had tried in vain to dispose of the lace made by Hungarian peasants under her patronage, and failing to sell as much as she wished through others she decided to undertake the task herself. On her way back from Spain, where she had been visiting the Queen Mother, she stopped for a few days in Paris. Driving in her motor car to one after another of the best shops for feminine finery she sent her card to the head of the firm, like any commercial traveler. Then without waiting for consent to invade the premises with her goods she swept by astonished attendants and followed by two lackeys bearing baskets filled to the brim with the lace made her way to the most crowded part of the stores, seated herself before a counter and displayed the lace she wished to sell, explaining its merits to the women gathered about her. Of course many women gave orders for lace, which the archduchess recorded in a notebook bearing the imperial insignia on its cover. In the background lingered proprietors and floorwalkers, who knew better than to disturb an archduchess, no matter how troublesome her eccentricities. When the lady had done all the business she could she signaled the lackeys to remove the lace, and with gracious bows of thanks she went on her way to the next shop.

STEEL DIE EMBOSSING, STEEL NAME PLATES

The Master

By Pierre Audibert (From the French)

When the symptoms of appendicitis had declared themselves for the third time, Dr. Quercy, the celebrated surgeon, decided to perform the operation upon his wife himself. To assist him and administer the chloroform, he called in his favorite pupil and friend, Paul Grondel.

She lay there, stretched out on the long nickel table, a white cloth drawn over her, exquisite under the strong light that came from above. She was sleeping, very quiet and very pale, on those sheets that might yet be wound like a shroud about her fair body, which seemed to shrink from the cold, cruel searching of the steel knives. Without a tremor the surgeon examined his instruments, each in its place, dumb servants awaiting the call of the master.

Grondel had his finger on the patients's pulse, but his eyes were turned to the place where, invisible, death was knocking at the door of life. He closed his eyes and turned deathly pale.

Suddenly, from that still face which looked as if it were carved in Carrara marble, there came a voice, as if from afar.

"Paul, I am not suffering . . . . it seems to me that I am wandering about immense blue plains. . . . I hear bells ringing. . . I am so happy . . . Yet how can I be happy without you? . . . . Why are you not here with me? . . . . This is the happiness you promised me . . . . that we both yearned for. You know . . . how I love you. . . . I knew nothing of love until I met you. He, he was so cold, so serious . . . frozen, you called it. I did not know that I had any feeling. . . . . I was just like . . . a good little girl. Now, I hate him, I hate him . . . and I belong to you, you know . . . only to you. I did not want to be in the same room with him . . . I told him so. . . . He did not seem to mind. I don't know that it made him suffer . . . . I would have been so . so . . happy."

The words were lost in a sob. Grondel saw a hand upon the smooth, white skin, moving swiftly; there was a gleam of steel and then a long red line. The surgeon had made the first incision. His face was an intellectual mask, cold, impenetrable, intent only upon the work at hand.

Without looking up, he said quietly: "Is the pulse normal, Paul?"

"Yes, master," Grondel answered firmly.

The surgeon continued his work with the mechanical precision of a machine. The forceps clinked as he laid it down upon the metal table. He rolled plugs of antiseptic cotton slowly, methodically.

Grondel's eyes followed the nervous rise and fall of the breast, and not another drop of the anesthetic fell upon that death-like mask from which now issued only inarticulate sounds. He was thinking of his ruined happiness, of his professional career which had now probably come to an end, of this fair body now spotted with blood, which but a few days before he had held in his arms, breathing, glowing with life.

Would not this man, whom he saw before him moving slowly, methodically, scientifically, push the lance but the fraction of an inch beyond the danger line, angered thereto beyond the endurance of man? Was he not the master of both destinies, was not death his servant, quickly obedient to his mandate? What would Grondel do, alone in life, without her? Oh, God!

The muscles of the patient contracted and the surgeon remarked very calmly: "Give some more chloroform, Grondel."

Then the drops fell like rain, and little by little the heaving of the breast subsided. The operation was finished. Quercy brought together the edges of the wound, and from right to left the needle went in and out along the red seam.

Now there came a sound as of some one strangling. Grondel continued pouring the poison and the sound became sharper.

"Careful!" the surgeon said. "Her tongue is affected."

But Grondel, gray-white, continued pouring the liquid, the lurid light of madness in his eyes. He gripped the frail wrist of the woman as if he would crush it.

The surgeon drew the sheet back over the body of his wife. Then he came toward Grondel, and firmly, but always quietly, he unclasped the student's hand and put aside the poison. Then, with a bitter, cynical smile upon his lips, he took up the forceps and seizing the patient's tongue, began the slow, rhythmatic movement to restore the action of the lungs.

Grondel had fallen into a scare and his tightly compressed lips showed his struggle to control himself.

There was silence in the room for a few moments and then the master turned, and looking his pupil full in the face, said:

"Courage, Grondel; I will give her back to you."

Gossip of the Theatre

An Orpheum Bill

Bower, Walter and Crooker were my choice for Orpheum headliners this week. Their names may be in the comparative degree but their act is superlative. They call themselves the Three Rubes and divide their time between acrobatic stunts, slapstick and music. As acrobats they are in the first class and as slapstick performers they are not far behind. It may argue a low taste to confess a liking for an artistically executed kick in the face, but just the same I should hate to have the Three Rubes leave the kicks out of their act. Picking a trio of low comedy acrobats as headliners in a bill of refined vaudeville probably argues a low taste any way. Perhaps it proves that one hasn't progressed since the days when they used to hawk beer up and down the aisles of the Orpheum and we hadn't learned to call a variety show "vodeville." No doubt it would argue a better grip on "refinement" to elevate the Musikal Girls to the rank of billtoppers, (another word we didn't use in the ancient times). But although it must be admitted that the Musikal Girls provide a pretty bit of entertainment I confess that I was much more interested in the beauty of one of them than in any of their musical selections. I refer to Miss Eleanor Piper who manipulated the cornet. She has such an attractive smile on her sweet face that I forgot all about the music. Or perhaps I should enthuse over the Five Armanis who are Neapolitan street singers of a very good sort. But no, I prefer the Three Rubes to either of these acts and I am going back to see if I can discover how one of them assimilates that terrific kick in the face. Not that I didn't enjoy Ed Wynn and P. O'Malley Jennings. Ed Wynn and his hat we have had before and it is a satisfaction to reflect that we shall probably have him again. He and his hat wear well. Every time he hangs his hat on his head he hangs a laugh on the audience which shows a healthy appetite for his superior brand of silliness. P. O'Malley Jennings is not in Ed Wynn's class, however. If Wynn would part the team where Jennings parts his name there would be no mourning from one Orpheumite. Jennings is billed as an English comedian. Hal Forde is billed as England's swagger comedian, but the adjective is strained. Forde is a hardworking comedian and not much more. Still, any hard worker is entitled to respect. Henry Clive is with us once more with his little get-offs on Hermann and Dr. Pauline. They are really entertaining, in the way that old friends of limited capacity can be entertaining. In the slim silken underpinning of Miss Mai Sturgis Walker, (a typical "vodeville" name), Clive's act has two shapely legs to stand on. There are two skits in the bill, both commendable. "The Little Stranger" is a slice of race track sentiment. "A Legitimate Hold-up" frames a clever study in ebriety contributed by William H. MaCart. His is one of the best stage jags we have seen in some time. True to the ways of the man in his cups MaCart tells a lot of very old stories; but the acting of the souse is the thing. It is really worthy of resolutions from the W. C. T. U. As usual the daylight motion picture was not the most unworthy number of the bill.

MISS BILLIE BURKE

Miss Billie Burke in "Mrs. Dot"

Miss Billie Burke brings "Mrs. Dot" to the Columbia Theater next Monday night for a two weeks' engagement and society is preparing to give her a rousing welcome. Four years ago Miss Burke was unknown. Now she is a favorite all over the United States and, so the report goes, one of the biggest money-makers on Charles Frohman's long list of stars—a list, it must be remembered, that contains such names as Miss Maude Adams, Miss Ethel Barrymore, John Drew, William Gillette, Otis Skinner, Francis Wilson and Wm. H. Crane. "Mrs. Dot," the play Miss Burke is presenting this season, is a witty, clever, satirical comedy by W. Somerset Maugham, the author of "Smith," which John Drew is now appearing in at the Columbia; "Lady Frederick," "Jack Straw" and other successes. "Mrs. Dot" is said to be one of his very best. The dialogue of the piece is witty, the situations are ingenious and amusing and the characters are well-drawn. The title role gives Miss Burke the best opportunity she has had to exhibit her charming personality and at the same time to prove that she is a comedienne of real talent. In the supporting company are Fred Kerr, a London actor of note; Julian L'Estrange, Frank Hollins, G. Harrison Carter, Rosa Rand, Annie Esmond and Carroll McComas. There will be the usual matinees on Wednesday and Saturday.

The latest play to excite controversy in Paris is "L'Apotre" (The Apostle) by Paul Hyacinthe-Loyson. This playwright is the son of the well known Pere Hyacinthe who left the Catholic Church at about the same time as Dr. Dollinger, owing to dogmatic differences with the Vatican. When Pere Hyacinthe signalized his severance of the ties that bound him to the priesthood by taking a wife, Pope Pius Pius IX remarked: "The man has taken his punishment into his own hands."

The Florence Roberts Engagement

Florence Roberts, Thurlow Bergen and Theodore Roberts will open their tri-star engagement at the Alcazar next Monday evening in "Jim the Penman," a play that has lost no magnetism since it was the dramatic sensation of the English-speaking world a quarter of a century ago. Written by Sir Charles Young, an eminent English litterateur who never contributed any other work to the stage, it is rich in the elements that stand for all time, combining realism and romanticism. Miss Roberts will be seen as Mrs. Ralston, Mr. Bergen as her husband and Mr. Roberts as Baron Hartfield, his evil genius. These three talented people have some of the strongest scenes ever staged. Also in the cast is the complete strength of the Alcazar company augmented by a number of selected players. Each of the four acts takes place in the London home of the Ralstons and an elaborate and artistic scenic investiture is assured.

MASTER GABRIEL

her third successful engagement in San Francisco at the Savoy Theater this Sunday evening, presenting, with her capable little company, Anna Warner's homely comedy, "The Rejuvenation of Aunt Mary." Saturday evening, June 10, will mark the last appearance of Miss Robson and also the closing of the Savoy Theater, which has enjoyed a most prosperous season since last August. When the "independent" attractions which have been housed at the McAllister street playhouse during the year resume their trips to the Pacific Coast next September they will be seen at the new, commodious and elegantly appointed Cort Theater, now nearing completion in Ellis street near Market.

At the Folies Bergere last week, says a New York gossip, William Randolph Hearst, Mrs. Hearst and Mrs. Stanwood Menken sat in the front row. Will Rogers, the lasso thrower, was on the stage. In his dryly humorous way he said: "Some years ago Theodore Roosevelt praised my act." The Hearst party listened stonily. "Of course that doesn't mean much now," concluded Rogers. "Haw, haw!" roared Mr. Hearst, and "Tee hee!" chortled Mrs. Hearst and Mrs. Menken in an obligato duet.

Next Week at the Orpheum

Master Gabriel will offer the one-act farce "Little Tommy Tucker." Ashton Stevens said of him: "Here is a boy that almost ranks with Mark Twain's Tom Sawyer and James Barrie's Sentimental Tommy." George Austin Moore and Cordelia Haager will offer a new act. Moore is a monologist and dialect comedian and has a very good voice. Miss Haager is a striking little beauty with a sweet voice and an Italian dialect. She is also a graceful dancer. The Namba Japs will present their gymnastic and head-balancing act. Dainty and diminutive Isabelle D'Armond will introduce a sparkling conglomeration of mirth, melody, dancing and pretty costumes entitled "Jolly Junk." Next week will be the last of The Musikal Girls; Ed Wynn and P. O'Malley Jennings, Henry Clive, and William H. Macart and Ethlynne Bradford in a "Legitimate Hold-up."

Gabriele D'Annunzio is having the time of his life. His creditors have driven him from Italy to France; one of his villas has been sold for debt; his latest flame has jilted him for a gilded Russian; and his books have been put on the Index Expurgatorius. His "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" will be produced soon in Paris, but the Archbishop of Paris has called upon all good Christians to stay away from the performances.

The Chorus Girl's Lament

"Yes, I used to be a switchboard operator. My, yes! It was much nicer," said the chorus girl, perched on the table and dangling her foot.

"But I got pretty tired of it, though. Sometimes, when everybody would be ringing at the same time, I thought I would go crazy. But, then I got my eight dollars regular, and no expenses. Oh, it was pretty good." She sighed and ran her fingers through her hair, lifted her eyebrows and arranged her puffs.

"What made me change? Well, you know Mabel—that tall girl with the stunning figure? She had a friend who was a show girl. And she just liked the job and said we were that foolish not to do the same thing. I never thought much about it until one Christmas, one of the subscribers sent me a fur coat. Yes, and a great big dandy one. Well, my dear, when I got that coat on I looked just too swell for words! Did I know the man? Of course not! And I never even set eyes on him. I just tore his card up, and kept the coat.

"Well, when I got that coat on I looked so swell that I said to myself, 'Here's your chance if any's coming your way;' so up I went for a chorus job. When the manager saw me he was so struck he engaged me on the spot. Clothes certainly do make a difference.

"But I never was made for this romping business, I guess. And sometimes I get homesick for my switchboard. Honest, I do. Well, it was noisy, but you could sit still. Here you've got to march and run and kneel and climb till your bones just ache. And, my dear, I'm getting so thin! Why, I met one of my old friends the other day, and the first thing she said was: 'My goodness, Irene, how thin you are! Why, you might be of paper, by the looks of you!'

"What do you think of that? Ain't it sad?

"No, I don't know what to do about it. It's so hard to get to the telephone again. I suppose I'll have to stand it a little longer, anyway."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Under the impetus of the Standard Oil decision, price advances in stocks ran to the opening of this week. Profit taking by the trading element caused a setback of small proportion, and this was followed by the cutting of finished steel prices. The so-called Independent plants, those outside the United States Steel Corporation, led off in this respect. The trade has been expecting such a movement for some time on account of the reduced capacity of the plants and declining business. The effect will be to stimulate orders. The last competition of this kind was in February, 1909, and it caused a setback in market prices of a moderate amount, an average of two points over the active list, but within a few days the market gathered headway and prices were lifted an average of twelve points in a campaign of ten weeks' duration. Steel common which sold to 41 1-4 two days after the rate war was lifted to 63 1-2 in the subsequent market—and it was then receiving an annual dividend of 2 per cent. The rate is now 5 per cent and the present price is relatively lower than two years ago. With money plentiful and the crop prospects indicating a fair yield we regard the market as in a good position for the investor or the speculator who has the patience to wait for long profits.

Wheat—Wheat had another advance. There were also general rains over the winter and spring belts. The crop promise was not raised by the rains, only continued, hence the failure of the market to break. The only section that was suffering from dry weather has had no relief. It is now harvest time in the extreme southwest and the plant is too far advanced in Oklahoma to be benefitted by any change in weather. Kansas' dry area may be regarded as almost beyond substantial help. Spring wheat conditions are at the moment ideal, and the initial acreage will show the usual high condition that prevails so soon after seeding. The rains have been quite general over the spring region, but there is still a lack of deep moisture, and the plant will need frequent showers to keep it going forward. In northwestern Minnesota and northern Dakota there is much complaint of grasshoppers, which became quite a pest last year when the dry weather caused a great multiplication in their numbers. Canadian conditions are equal to those on this side of the border. Montana is putting in a very large acreage. Washington and adjacent States have been helped by the rains and the prospects are fine. The market for July and September wheat is now slightly over the Liverpool parity for those months, and the trade is in fear of crop scares which may develop quickly in the northwest, and reduced promise of winted wheat through high temperatures and lack of rain, for east of the Missouri there is insufficient moisture to date.

Corn—Receipts have been heavier than usual the past week, the lull in plowing and planting permitting the producer to take advantage of the higher prices prevailing. The shipping demand has shown some slackening this week as buyers have held off to await a decline in receipts. However, the heaviest operations in the market have been by cash houses which would be presumed to be weighing down the market with hedges. The cleaning up in the corn market has been impressive, and the continued large run of hogs is revealing a larger farm consumption than ever the optimists believed.

Cotton—The market has continued its advance in the past week, the net gain in all months being slight. The new months have held firmly after the decline from the advance last week. No doubt the old crop will maintain comparatively high prices, as the shortage in supplies develops. The European demand is less consistent, but nevertheless strong enough to show a disposition abroad to manufacture to the limit of demand—should the demand at increasing price of material continue. There has been just enough caution shown by the foreign spinners since the publication of Mr. Ellison's mill stocks last week to suggest that mill stocks will be invaded sharply if there is any good crop promise in this country during the coming month. It is not likely that there will be a famine in the country market during the remainder of the old crop year, or a price flurry of any extent except that which would come through the operations of venturesome people on the short side of the market. The new crop influence will begin to operate over the market from now on, and prices will respond to the outlook from time to time in the fields. With practically a ten per cent advantage over conditions a year ago, with dry weather rather than wet the prevailing injurious influence, the present acreage can produce a very large crop. We have yet to reckon with the boll weevil whose advanced lines will go deeper into the old States and the liability of revival of destruction in the rainy section of Texas. We see no reason to abandon selling the new crop options until crop conditions change.

Little Drummer of the Blues

By Charles Foley (From the French)

The flames crackled in the stubble; stray balls whistled and flattened out against the besieged walls. The drum of the Blues, the Republicans, was rolling. Through the Vendean charges, stupid women and groaning beasts, beaten with gun-stocks, plunged into a panic-stricken galop. It was a victory.

Pere Tobin, quite tuckered out by the six-hour assault, leaned against the cemetery wall for a breath or two. Jeffredo trotted up to him, a can of wine in his hand, bawling:

"They're chopping open the casks. Here's our share. Have a drink, captain. This'll fix you up. Besides, the village is taken. The Blues have skipped without that devil of a drummer of theirs, who keeps beating the charge. Because of him there's still a few of the dogs holding out at the end of that alley, in the damn smoke."

"Got to let my boy at 'em, then," said Tobin. "Put the wine down; I'll drink it afterwards."

Tobin whistled. A handsome lad sprang from the crowd, smiling, his hair ruffled, his rakish, half open shirt showing the scapulary on his broad chest. His father pointed out to him the smoke filled alley.

"Still hot over here, Joel. Take your lads and clean 'em out."

Proud, confident, Joel called his comrades, and the group hurled itself into this furnace, with the same gay, alert impulse. The drum of the Blues was stilled. Jeffredo shook his head:

"If I had a fine lad like you've got there, Tobin, I wouldn't be offering him to death with such a swagger. A white young breast like that draws the bullets!"

The father replied proudly:

"Oh, there's too much life in the heart of that young Tobin for that. He'd scare death away."

Jeffredo had climbed on the cemetery wall, and he was looking toward the alley.

"As for me," said Tobin, "I'm not afraid to look, but I'm the captain. Have to hang around, in case of a rally. But you tell me what's going on, at least."

"He's hammering 'em in great shape, that son of yours."

Tobin began to laugh: "I know how he goes at it. I brought him up myself!"

In spite of his confidence he was trying to look over the wall, when one of his men, a bocager, touched his sleeve. He was dragging a tattered boy, whose hands were tied. Besotted with powder and wine, the man yelled:

"It's the drummer, captain, the little drummer of the Blues! I caught him behind a hedge, while he was beating a charge to make us think there was a bunch of the Blues. I dragged him here, because I didn't know what to do with him."

"Oh, it's you, you mad little devil," growled Tobin, his forehead suddenly furrowed with anger and his look bitter. "I know that rattle of yours that makes men drunk and see red. You little fiends do more harm with your sneaking drumsticks than all the big rascals with their lead. We'll know what to do with you, my boy; we're going to treat you like a man. As soon as I have four muskets free, they'll stick you on the cemetery mound and shoot you. That'll put the sign of the cross on your head!"

The child, looking at the pot of wine on the ground, asked:

"Say, before that I'd like to have a good drink!"

But Jeffredo was crying from the top of the wall: "Those hellions of Blues! They're holding out! It's that damned beating of the charge that's made them come back!"

Tobin growled to the boy: "You don't need to drink. You're going to die, and the wine would be wasted."

Jeffredo began to groan: "Those dogs of Blues! Gudic has fallen."

Gloomily Tobin said: "You'll pay for Gudic, drummer."

Then Jeffredo groaned with a more smothered voice, "They've made a sally on us. Jambu's down."

Still more gloomily Tobin said: "You'll pay for Jambu, drummer."

As Jeffredo said nothing more, pointing to the prisoner, the captain commanded the bocager: "Take off his shirt. Before shooting him, we'll have the charge beaten on his shoulders, till they bleed."

But Jeffredo, very pale, suddenly leaped down from the cemetery wall.

"Well, what is it?" asked the captain. "What's keeping you so silent? Are the Blues coming back?"

"No, no," said Jeffredo, without looking at the old captain. "The lads have cleaned out the alley, all right, only—"

"Only yes, I know; Gudic and Jambu have fallen."

"That's not all. There's still another."

"Another? Who's that? Prebois?"

"No, it isn't Prebois. If it was Prebois it'd be bad enough, but it's worse than Prebois."

"Oh, then is it Prieur?"

"No, it's going to hurt you worse than as if it was Prieur."

"Then tell me who it is, you hangman! Can't you see this is killing me?"

"I don't dare—it's choking me!"

"Those Lustrous Eyes are Murine Eyes"

Beauty's Eyes

When Beauty's Eyes upon me rest,
A strange sweet thrill darts thro' my breast,
As though a perfumed, winged dart
Had pierced the region of my heart.

But oh, what anguish, what dismay,
When Beauty frowns or turns away,
When Beauty laughs, I know not why
My hopes fall earthward from the sky.

Alas, I feel how far above
My wild ambition is her love.
But when those Eyes are Bathed in tears
The crystal drops dispel my fears.

When Beauty's Eyes are closed in sleep,
Earth's lonliness o'er me creep.
Without those Eyes to shape my mood,
The world is filled with solitude.

And when they open fair again,
Life, joy and music fill my brain.
'Tis strange indeed what power lies
Within the depth of Beauty's Eyes.

My acts, my thoughts, my life control,
Those Witching Orbs command my soul.
And yet, again, their glances mild
Would soothe to sleep a fretful child.

I plucked one day a pretty flower,
And stole away to Beauty's bower,
To leave it, as an act of grace,
On Beauty's plate glass dressing case.

There Beauty sat, to my surprise,
A'dropping Murine in her eyes.
And now I know the secret art
That to her Eyes such "Glows" impart.

And whence the power and grace that lies
Within the depths of Beauty's Eyes.
And many a comely lass, I ween,
Has played the same trick—with Murine.

Tobin blanched, and groaned. "You're right—oh, don't tell me that—I won't believe it! It isn't true! My God, if it's true. I wouldn't believe in God again!"

"Then—you can't believe any more."

The old captain tottered. Jeffredo held him up: "Hold on to yourself. Here's the lads who are bringing your son."

The men stood aside to give passage for the four men who were carrying Joel on a litter. They set it on the ground before Tobin. The lad seemed to be sleeping, still with his smile of proud confidence. Some life hovered in the light of his bright hair and in the rose-tint of his lips. But full in his chest was a tiny hole, which was not even bleeding.

The old captain uncovered his head, then his arms fell to his sides. The great tears in the deep wrinkles of his cheeks were like rivers.

"My boy! So quick and hot then, and now so slow and cold! And all this life has gone! This Death—stronger than all the kings and the gods!"

He shook his hands as the tears fell on them.

"So it's only water that's falling from my eyes, when I could weep blood!"

He fell over upon the stretcher, Jeffredo helped him up and turned him from the body, whispering:

"Enough, captain; that'll discourage the lads."

At his motion of command, the litter was lifted and carried toward the church.

Tobin crushed, his head bowed, was mechanically following, when the bocager, still holding the little drummer at the end of a rope,, touched his arm.

"And me, Tobin? I don't want to hang on to this pagan all night. I'm hungry. I want to go and eat with the others. Say, can't you shoot him right away?"

Waking with a start, Tobin turned fiercely toward the man and his prisoner:

"That's true, I'd forgotten. Here's the little drummer. He won't take long. Come here, you little rat."

The child came forward. The old Vendean looked at him for a time. Then, pointing to the can of wine on the ground, he said to the bocager:

"I remember that he asked for some wine. First, put on his shirt, and untie the cord. There now, drink."

The boy drank greedily. Then Tobin asked: "Goes better, eh?"

"Yes, sure it goes better. That gives me back my legs.

"Well, if it gives you your legs, why don't you use 'em?"

As the boy looked at him timidly, trembling, not daring to understand, Tobin growled heavily:

"There's enough of death as it is. You're free; get out!"

A Reward of Charity

Upon a Spanish highway, where all the pretty girls and handsome youths were returning arm in arm from the bull-fight, a youthful mendicant with a ragged cloak thrown round him, was praying for alms, vowing that no food had passed his lips for two whole days.

Notwithstanding the firmness of his tanned skin, which could be seen peeping out through the rents and tears of his ragged clothes, one felt at a glance that he was no impostor. The half starved look in his eyes and his sunken cheeks betokened the want of nourishment.

The crowd, however, paid but little attention to him and passed him by, singing Spanish love-songs amidst hearty plaudits and peals of laughter. Would they all leave the poor boy to die of starvation on the road?

From out all the throng only three young girls stopped and gazed upon him. They were fresh to look upon, plump, rosy-cheeked and not more than twenty years of age. They paused, and gradually their laughter gave place to looks of pity. The eldest girl gave him one real. "Thank you," he said. The next girl gave him a picette; "God will reward you," said he.

The third, the youngest, who was also the prettiest of the three, had neither real or picette. For a moment she stood undecided, then, standing on tiptoe, she gave him a soft little kiss on his lips. The poor famished lad said nothing, but, seeing a flower-vendor passing, he gave to him all the money he had just begged for a large bunch of tea-roses and, with tears in his eyes, silently handed them to the youngest girl.

—Catulle Mendes.

Auto Notes

The Diamond Rubber Co. are in receipt of a letter from W. H. Wilbur which states that he bought an E. M. F. 30 just a year ago equipped with Diamond Tires, size 33x4. This car has been driven 6,000 miles and the original air is still in every tire, notwithstanding the 6,000 miles of service.

C. C. Hildebrand, assistant general manager of the Chalmers Motor Co. who is now visiting here, declares that San Francisco's securing the Panama-Pacific Fair for 1915 has already won additional consideration for this territory from the automobile manufacturers in the East. "The largely increased allotment of Chalmers cars required this year by the Pioneer Automobile Company," he also remarks, "is, Mr. Brinegar tells me, undoubtedly in a measure due to advance effects which the coming exhibition has already created. This being true a consistent increase can be depended upon to continue right up to 1915."

According to advices received from Los Angeles concerning the twenty-four race held there on the Los Angeles Motordrome, one of the most sensational performances of the meet was that of the Cole "30" entry. This car took third place from a field of ten entries and came within a few miles of the previous world's record, in spite of the fact that it was more than three hours out of the running because of an accident occasioned by the interference of another entry.

John Jenkins, the well known Cole racing driver, arrived in San Francisco recently bringing with him the Cole machine with which he starred at this season's Pablo Beach races in Florida and later took third place, and all but broke the former world's record, in the twenty-four race on the Los Angeles Motordrome. This Cole car has been a notable performer in the majority of the big racing events this year and still has an active campaign cut out for the next few months to come. It is a strictly stock car.

C. C. Kratzer of Coalinga and his 1911 Winton won the heavy car event at the Toll Hill climb at Fresno on May 1. An interesting point is that the Diamond tires with which the car was equipped already had a mileage to their credit of 6,000 miles for the front tires, and 1,200 miles for the rears. Notwithstanding this fact the severe strain of taking the sharp curves at high speed showed no effect on the tires, as Mr. Kratzer writes that he is still riding on the same air that was in the tires before their strenuous trip.

Walter C. Morris, local Autocar distributor, reports a number of sales for the latter part of last week. Among deliveries made are touring cars to J. Newbauer of San Francisco and G. A. Flemming of Visalia and a Roadster to Griffin and Skelley Co. of San Mateo.

Among the recent deliveries reported by the Haynes Auto Sales Company are a fore-door roadster to Edw. E. Engs of the Realty Syndicate in Oakland and a fore-door suburban to C. F. Thomas, the prominent grain dealer of San Francisco.

What Started It

Politely the serpent offered Eve an apple.

"Try that, madam," he said. "You can raise 400 barrels of them to the acre on one of our irrigated orchard farms in the Bezingo valley. Your husband can purchase a forty-acre tract on easy payments."

Shortly afterward the family moved from Eden to seek the new home.

Nicker—Does he play by note?

Bocker—Yes; he bought his piano on the instalment plan.

Another Good Book by Mary Watts

When an author has given us one really good book, good in every sense of the word, discriminating readers are apt to hold their breaths at the announcement of a new volume and to wonder whether the trick can be turned a second time. In the case of Mary S. Watts, emphatically it has been and those who have reached that certain period after which, as Dr. Holmes reminded us, it is with an effort that we make new literary friendships, need have no hesitation in opening wide their doors. "The Legacy," like its predecessor, "Nathan Burke," deals with life in central Ohio about the middle of the last century. Nathan Burke is mentioned casually in its pages more than once, and the reference helps to preserve the illusion that the general was more than a fiction of the pen. "The Legacy" is the story of one woman's life, incidentally that of two generations of her family, and her legacies, apart from the specific one which names the novel, were numerous and conflicting. Our introduction to Letty Breen takes place when she was about ten years old and lived with her mother and grandfather in a dilapidated mansion furnished with relics of decayed splendors. Her grandfather was an elegant old gentleman of leisure who lived she knew not how, and her mother was always busy. Letty had no playmates and her education was acquired from her mother and from much promiscuous reading, largely of novels, from her grandfather's library. Whether she had or ever had had a father the little girl did not know or care, for though she was abnormally precocious in some respects, her solitary life left her innocently unconscious in others. If her grandfather had condescended to answer, he would have said that to be a Breen was a sufficient inheritance. The black spot on the family "honor" was Letty's great grandmother, who was assumed to have been a wicked woman though nobody seems to have really known. At any rate, her hard-living, hard-drinking, political and religious turncoat husband divorced her and took her children away from her. That his own habits made it at least judicious for him to leave the church does not seem to have mattered, any more than did the idleness of his son Edward, the career of his daughter Helen, the dishonesty of his grandson Harry or the worthlessness of George. They were all Breens in name and in their own estimation at least, above criticism. It was the untimely visit of that disreputable harridan, great aunt Helen, which called attention to Letty, found surreptitiously holding converse with a BOY, which directed her grandfather's attention to the child and her resemblance to his mother, and led him to speak of a portrait which his father had ordered destroyed. The order, it seemed in the sequel had not been carried out, and the picture still existed though its identity was unguessed. It passed from one owner to another in the breaking up of estates and was known as "the Lady with the Sampler" until accident revealed the identity of the portrait. By that time Letty had grown up and married, and a good many other family mysteries had been solved, but the unanswered problem to her was whether she had received a legacy of predisposition from the shadowy relative as, in course of time, she became the heiress of the picture itself. Was she better or worse than her ancestress, or was great-grandmother Elinor wronged by unjust suspicion? In any case, if Letty received something from her great-grandmother, she likewise received much from her mother which would have had a tendency to counteract any Breen inheritance. Industry, an equable and patient disposition, a cheerful tendency to make the best of every situation ought to stand over against some of the sterner conventions and there is something to be said for any woman who can live in peace with a grandmother-in-law and keep a balance with all the factions of one's own blood. "The Legacy" has an old fashioned flavor of the days when the whole family connection was presumed to suffer from the misdeeds of one member—when bills of attainder were not so very far in the past. Today, with our easy-going doctrine of can't help it, and the responsibility shifted to our dead and gone ancestors, people are not held accountable for their own sins, much less those of great grand parents, especially if misdeeds pay. While so many of the products of the modern press are little better than bricks of paper smudged with printers' ink, "The Legacy" stands boldly forth as a real book. From the Macmillan Company.

Book Notes

Henry Clay Barnabee, for so many years identified with The Bostonians, is preparing a volume of memories and reminiscences which will be published some time during this year.

Thomas Wentworth Higginson who died recently at the age of eighty-seven, was the last of the old guard of New England writers, and they were a long-lived race, most of them surviving the scriptural three score and ten. Marion Harland who is a Virginian, is past her eighthieth year, Dr. S. Weir Mitchell of Philadelphia is also an octogenarian, and Fanny Crosby Van Alstyne, the blind writer of hymns, has just celebrated her ninety-second birthday.

Maria Thompson Daviess, the author of two unusually successful books, "Miss Selina Lou" and "The Road to Providence," is an agreeable variant from the "literary" lady best known to us all. She has a farm in Tennessee where she raises cattle and chickens, and says she neither could nor would abandon it for a purely literary life. She makes arts and crafts jewelry for herself and her friends and exhibited miniatures for two years in Paris. Her head has not been turned by any of her successes, and like most busy folks with plenty of time for work of any kind, she has no time for grumbling.

This Illustration Indicates the Location of the Oiling Points of a Motor Car (the Number and Location of These Points Vary in Different Types of Cars). Unless Properly Lubricated with Suitable Oil and Grease, an Automobile Will Give Trouble and Soon Wear Out.

The Importance of Lubrication

PROPER lubrication is of vital importance to the successful operation of a motor car. Manufacturers and dealers realize this. A large number of those owning or operating automobiles do not, and as a result, over 65 per cent of automobile troubles are due to insufficient lubrication or to the use of unsuitable lubricants.

Every automobile owner or driver should bear in mind that each separate mechanism of the car requires its own type of lubricant. Further, that the use of cheap or unsuitable lubricants will, sooner or later, land the car in the repair shop.

Automobile lubrication has been studied exhaustively by the experts of this Company. As the result of these studies and the experience gained during years of extensive manufacturing of oils for every use, the Standard Oil Company has put on the market the most efficient automobile lubricants yet produced. These are sold under the name

Polarine

The Polarine Brand covers Oil, Transmission Lubricants and Greases. These Polarine Lubricants have been produced by our experts after thousands of laboratory and practical tests. We believe that they are the best automobile lubricants on the market.

Polarine Oil is an oil rich in lubricating quality. Feeds perfectly at any temperature down to zero. Gives freedom from destructive carbon deposits. Lengthens the life of cylinders, piston rings and bearings.

Polarine Transmission Lubricants and Polarine Greases have been specially manufactured for the parts of the car requiring lubricants of a heavy consistency. These products are unequalled for the lubrication of the special parts for which they are recommended.

Use Polarine Lubricants this season. They will add to the pleasure of motoring. They will enable you to save repair bills, increase your speed, climb hills easier and do away with the many petty mishaps due to the use of unsuitable lubricants.

All dealers sell Polarine Lubricants or can get them for you.

Our Booklet, Polarine Pointers contains facts about the care of motor cars, including hints on lubrication and the causes of engine troubles.

If you own a motor car or motor boat send for this booklet. Write our nearest agency.

Standard Oil Company

(Incorporated)

Polarine Oil (frost and carbon proof) furnishes perfect lubrication for all types of gasoline engines and for all wearing parts. It is delivered in sealed cans gallon and five-gallon sizes or in barrels and half-barrels.

Polarine Transmission Lubricants are prepared in three consistencies. "A," for Summer and Winter use on transmission where conditions permit a semi-fluid oil. "B," for Summer and Winter use, on transmissions and differentials where a semi-solid lubricant is required. "BB," especially recommended for Summer use on transmissions and differentials. The cans are of convenient size.

Polarine Cup Grease is a solid lubricant for use in cups and where a heavier grade than "BB" is desired.

Polarine Fibre Grease is a solid lubricant of high melting point, particularly adapted for use on universal joints. Delivered in round cans.

Statesmen in a Dilemma

Some of our insurgent statesmen in the Senate are in that most embarrassing of all positions—betwixt the devil and the deep sea. If they vote for reciprocity they will incur the disfavor of their constituents at home; if they vote against reciprocity they will stultify themselves before the whole country. In the circumstances it is natural that the palladiums of our liberties should have misgivings. Knowing that the virtues are lost in self-interest as rivers in the sea they perceive that the course which several eminent statesmen are likely to take is not the one which President Taft recommends. Self-interest is usually a more powerful motive than pride of consistency. It is not to be said, however, that every insurgent who intends to vote for reciprocity is influenced by self-interest. An insurgent may become a reactionary on the most cherished of all the principles in the philosophy of political reformers, the principle of the "greater good," which in this instance is to be advanced by insuring the continuance of the service of every good and true representative of progressive statesmanship. For example, suppose that La Follette should vote for reciprocity and thus forfeit the esteem of the farmers of Wisconsin. What might the consequence be? The farmers of Wisconsin might decide to deprive the nation of the services of Battle Bob. Now Battle Bob knows that his country needs him, and what more natural than that his patriotism should persuade him for the "greater good" to conciliate his constituents? Of course we don't pretend to know what Battle Bob's sentiments are with reference to reciprocity. He may be of the opinion that he has become so colossal a figure in national politics that he can afford to be indifferent to the wishes of the farmers of Wisconsin and rely on the dear people of the whole country to advance the greater good by promoting him to a more exalted position than the one he now occupies. One thing we may be sure of is that Battle Bob is not taking seriously the minatory shrieks of the Hearst papers and of the other journals that are telling us that this is "the critical hour when the high cost of living may be forced down through one mighty blow at the privileges of the corporations." He knows that the high cost which the newspapers are mostly concerned about is the high cost of white paper and that their solicitude for reciprocity is inspired by the fear that the tariff might not be taken off wood pulp, a substance most essential to them in their business and of which there is a great abundance in Canada.

Great is "Battle Bob"

That "Battle Bob" La Follette is indeed a national figure to be reckoned with by the politicians who shape the destinies of our country is a fact vouched for by so distinguished authority as the Hon. Chester H. Rowell, editor of the Fresno Republican. Mr. Rowell returned from the East the other day, and submitted gracefully to the exquisite torture of an interview for the benefit of the readers of his own journal. With that innate modesty and candor peculiar to progressive publicists he told the readers of his own paper of the tributes that had been paid to his renown during his travels; of the distinguished men who met the distinguished editor; of the political situation as he found it, and of the conclusions to which he had come touching the politics of the nation. Speaking of the Wisconsin Senator he said that La Follette's boom was spreading and that as a statesman he was growing. He added: "Speaking of him in the Outlook office one day Sydney Brooke gave him the highest compliment I ever heard a pessimistic Englishman give any American. He said: 'I regard La Follette as the author of the only real contribution which the American republic has made to the science of government in the world—his method of State regulation of corporations.'" Sydney Brooke is doubtless some very exalted authority on the science of government, else Mr. Chester Rowell would not have taken the trouble to quote him. Of course it argues oneself unknown to confess unacquaintance with Mr. Sydney Brooke, but so great is our curiosity that we are constrained to ask, Who is this "pessimistic Englishman" whose dogmatic dictum regarding the efficacy of something that has yet to stand the test of time made a most profund impression on our learned contemporary of Fresno? He talks for all the world like one of the contributing editors of the oracle of the New Nationalism, and as it was in the Outlook office that he delivered himself of his high compliment we suspect that he is indeed an associate of the Infallible One. If so his opinion on anything pertaining to the science of government is unquestionably entitled to a certain degree of respect, and therefore it is with due deference that we ask, If "Battle Bob" is the author of the only real contribution which our republic has made to the science of government then how shall we class that devenerated instrument which in the opinion of Gladstone and others is the most remarkable document, the greatest single political achievement and the most potent influence on mankind that history gives any account of?

Court Calumniators

"Give a dog a bad name and hang him" is a proverb the principle of which is now being applied to the judiciary of this State by certain powerful and unscrupulous interests intent upon making the bench subservient to their will, complaisant to their selfish designs. The recall is the instrument by which they hope to accomplish their purpose, and they are now giving us a foretaste of the general temper and tone which that device is calculated to produce. No slander do they neglect if it but serve to injure the reputation of the court which they desire to control. Everything is taken for granted that serves for nourishment for the spleen. The most insidious appeals are made to lurking spite and prejudice wherever they lay rankling. We are told that silence is the best answer to calumny. It is the only answer that judges as a rule can afford to make. Rare are the occasions when a court can take judicial cognizance of a spiteful slander. And so it is that accusations are made with impunity the very malignity or extravagance of which may pass for proof of wrongdoing. Accusations of this character have been flying thick and fast ever since the agitation for the recall was started, and it was not till last week that the justices of the Supreme Court were given an opportunity to call a halt. A letter purporting to have been written by William F. Herrin of the Southern Pacific Company, containing matter which seemed to justify suspicion of the integrity of the whole court, came to light during the course of litigation in Los Angeles. It was seized upon with avidity by the recall agitators, and by them pointed to as conclusive proof of an unholy alliance between the bench and the Octopus. The possibility that the author of the letter was inaccurate in his statements or guilty of misrepresentation, or that the signature to which was appended the letter "M." was not the signature of William F. Herrin, was never considered by the enemies of the court. It was sufficient for them that the letter would lend itself to their purposes. They wanted no explanation. So strong was their desire to excite virtuous indignation in the public mind that they convicted the whole court without a hearing. Now it appears that at the time of the conversation mentioned in the letter the Chief Justice was out of town, only two justices were present, and the attorney who figured in the occurrence was not William F. Herrin (that gentleman being in New York) but an humble subordinate with an unhappy gift of language. It is bad enough to think ill of any one without adequate proof to justify judgment, and it is a mean nature that lends an easy, credulous ear to whatever reflects discredit on another, but to progagate calumny with enthusiasm in a spirit of malice is the most destestable of all the performances induced by the passions of man.

The Conversion of Gary

The American plutocrat, as may be learned by cultivating an acquaintance with such types as Andrew Carnegie and Elbert H. Gary, is a variable being and susceptible of many different opinions, principles and rules of conduct. What may be true while it is to his interest to adhere to one way of thinking will be found false when he finds that his situation has been altered. Mr.

Carnegie, when he was making steel and laying the foundation of his preposterous fortune, had theories of government vastly different from those which he now holds. As a Captain of Industry he was for established forms of government and against experiments. His fortune made, his one pastime throwing money to the birds, he has ceased to approve the practices of his ignoble past and he would curb the lust of gold and make it more difficult for men to accumulate wealth. Elbert Gary, rich beyond the dreams of avarice, grown weary of the struggle in the industrial arena, and perhaps convinced that the people are not to be denied, has overcome his prejudice against government control of great combinations of capital and declares it would be to the best interest of all concerned if a Federal bureau were established for the purpose of fixing the price of steel. Some sceptics there are disinclined to accept Mr. Gary's suggestion as sincere. Nay, they are disposed to suspect him of jocularity. But Mr. Gary is no humorist. He has never seen much fun in anything but selling steel. We may depend on it that his suggestion was made with the utmost sobriety. Stranger things than the conversion of Mr. Gary to New Nationalism are happening nowadays; so strange that it would not surprise us to learn that Wall Street had turned progressive and taken the wind out of sails that have had a monopoly of popular breezes. The magnates of Wall Street can better afford than the average business man or even the average farmer to give the people precisely what they are clamoring for.

Futile Insurgency

It is one of the peculiar characteristics of American insurgency that it makes a great deal of noise without accomplishing anything. Fresh illustration of this characteristic has been given in New York where the Democratic majority in the State Senate voted the other day for the confirmation of Daniel F. Cohalan as Justice of the Supreme Court. Cohalan was the choice of Boss Murphy. He is one of the leading lights of Tammamy. Apropos his appointment the Evening Post of New York remarked, "It would in the long run have been better to have had Sheehan at Washington than Cohalan on the bench." This is the unanimous sentiment of New York reformers. Yet as the New York Sun explains, "Precisely the fight that the Evening Post and its associates made against Mr. Sheehan insured the presence of Mr. Cohalan on the bench, assured that much more serious thing the unquestioned supremacy of the Hon. Charles F. Murphy in the councils of the Democratic party." In the fight against Sheehan the Democratic insurgents wasted their strength and brought about combinations that insured the appointment of Cohalan. And their fight against Sheehan was not a fight on principle. It was nothing more than stubborn opposition to majority rule. Sheehan was not Murphy's candidate, though he had the promise of Murphy's support, a promise exacted by influences that the Tammamy boss could not afford to ignore. The truth is that James A. O'Gorman, the man who was elected to succeed Chauncey M. Depew, is personally far more agreeable to Murphy than William F. Sheehan. No wonder that the insurgents of New York are engaged in mournful retrospect.

The Canal Idea

Now that the Panama canal is nearing completion it has occurred to lovers of historical research that it would be worth while for sentimental reasons to discover when the idea of this epoch-making waterway was given birth. This is a matter of peculiar interest to San Francisco. Here where the wedding of the oceans is to be celebrated tribute should be paid to the person who conceived the idea of the project. We are told that it was Vasco Nunez de Balboa, the first European to cast eyes on the Pacific from the East; that he must have thought of the desirability of a canal nearly four hundred years ago when he was dragging material across the isthmus wherewith to build ships on the Pacific. But unfortunately for the memory of Balboa there is no record of his thoughts. There is a record, however, of the fact that as long ago as 1550 the Portuguese navigator, Antonio Galvao, considered the feasibility of an isthmian canal. He wrote a monograph on the isthmus and suggested four different lines for cutting it by canal. One of these was through Lake Nicaragua and another was across Panama. But even before Galvao's time the germ of the idea was in existence. It is related that in 1520 Charles V of Spain ordered the Isthmus of Panama surveyed for the purpose of cutting a canal. It is also related that his son and successor, Philip II of Inquisition memory, was seriously considering the great project when he was advised that if the Almighty had intended to have the oceans united he would not have placed the isthmian barrier between them, a notion, by the way, which must have been the subject of discussion among wise men long after Philip's time, for we find Sir Thomas Browne dwelling upon it. He says: "Some isthmes have been cut through by the sea and others cut by the spade; and if policie would permit, that of Panama in America were most worthy the attempt: it being but a few miles over and would open a shorter cut into the East Indies and China." Yet Sir Thomas reminds us that when the Cnidians proposed to pierce the Isthmus of Corinth, they were "deterred by the peremptory disswasion of Apollo, plainly commanding them desist, for if God had thought it fit He would have made the country an island at first." From all of which it is evident that the canal project slumbered or simmered through the centuries; but by whom it was first broached is a question which nothing short of the most painstaking research can solve.

Adoration

White brow, as faultless pure
As the watch tower
Of some white city,
Reared by gods in dim eternal story
Above the sea of time:
Round you light tresses, delicate,
Wind-blown, wander and climb
Immortal, transitory.

Red lips whose curved pride
Is still belied
By soft eyes forest-wild and full of pity
For all sorrow.

White hands, foam-frail you seem:
A vanishing gleam
On the light breaking wave of beauty's tide:
You hold my destiny,
And the fate of all beside
Who follow
Eternally by ways apart
Over enchanted ground,
Lit with the radiance of no earthly day,
Where Angus' heart,
Burning through his stringed lute,
Lures with a music sweeter than all sound
Wild-hearted ones, blind wanderers,
To go, with foot-fall mute,
By his own way.

Correspondence

Buckle vs. Lecky

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: The letter you printed last week from a person signing herself "A Wife and Mother" suffused my face with blushes. It always makes me blush to encounter one of my sex who has not sense enough to appreciate the dignity of womanhood. Women of the type of your weak-minded correspondent are the kind that furnish material for the stock argument of the male anti-suffragists who are themselves so shallow that the obvious retort never occurs to them,—that as there are women too stupid to be worthy of the elective franchise, so too are there men equally incompetent. I am a suffragist and I'm proud of it. I want the franchise so that I may play a woman's part in the world, so that I may have my rights which I prefer to my so-called privileges. This country is in need of refinement which it will never have while it is dominated by the brutal sex. Women may be inferior to men in some of the respects mentioned by Lecky, in the paragraphs quoted by your correspondent, but there are other respects in which the male of the species is inferior to the female, and there are authorities quite as good as the author of the History of European Morals to bear out this assertion. One for whom I have great admiration is Henry Thomas Buckle, author of "A History of Civilization in England." Mr. Buckle delivered a lecture at the Royal Institution, March 19, 1858, on "The Influence of Women on the Progress of Knowledge" in which he proved that there is a natural and an indestructible element in the minds of women which enables them, not to make scientific discoveries, but to exercise the most momentous and salutary influence over the methods by which discoveries are made. He argued that the deductive method of thought is peculiar to women and that by encouraging in men deductive habits of thought they have rendered an immense service to the progress of knowledge. And Mr. Buckle said: "Women are more deductive than men because they think quicker than men. Nothing could prevent this being universally admitted except the fact that the remarkable rapidity with which women think is obscured by that miserable, that contemptible, that preposterous system, called their education, in which valuable things are carefully kept from them, and trifling things carefully taught them, until their fine and nimble minds are too often irretrievably injured." Perhaps, Mr. Editor, that's what happened to the mind of "A Wife and Mother." Mr. Buckle says there are many circumstances to prove that women are more deductive than men,—such, for instance, as the insight into character possessed by women. If I am not taking up too much of your valuable space I will add that according to Buckle women by "their turn of thought, their habits of mind, their conversation, their influence, insensibly extending over the whole surface of society, and frequently penetrating its intimate structure, have, more than all other things put together, tended to raise us into an ideal world, lift us from the dust into which we are too prone to grovel and develop in us the germs of imagination which even the most sluggish and apathetic understandings possess."

Yours truly,

—A Wife.

San Francisco, June 4.

Woman Knows How to Die

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: From one of your correspondents an anti-suffragette, I learn that according to Lecky women have never won the first position in anything. Lecky is wrong. I can quote you good authority to the contrary, and though I'm neither a wife nor a mother I'll do it because I'm for giving the ladies the ballot or anything they want. My authority is De Quincey. He says in his epic essay on Joan of Arc: "Yet, sister woman, though I cannot consent to find a Mozart or a Michael Angelo in your sex, cheerfully, and with the love that burns in depths of admiration, I acknowledge that you can do one thing as well as the best of us men—a greater thing than even Milton is known to have done, or Michael Angelo—you can die grandly, and as goddesses would die, were goddesses mortal. If any distant worlds (which may be the case) are so far ahead of us Tellurians in optical resources, as to see distinctly through their telescopes all that we do on earth, what is the grandest sight to which we ever treat them? St. Peter's at Rome, do you fancy, on Easter Sunday, or Luxor, or perhaps the Himalayas? Ah, no! my friend: suggest something better; these are baubles to them; they see in other worlds, in their own, far better toys of the same kind. These, take my word for it, are nothing. Do you give it up? The finest thing, then, we have to show them, is a scaffold on the morning of execution. I assure you there is a strong muster in those far telescopic worlds, on any morning, of those who happen to find themselves occupying the right hemisphere for a peep at us. How, then, if it be announced in some such telescopic world by those who make a livelihood of catching glimpses at our newspapers, whose language they have long since deciphered, that the poor victim in the morning's sacrifice is a woman? How, if it be published in that distant world, that the sufferer wears upon her head, in the eyes of many, the garlands of martyrdom? How, if it should be some Marie Antoinette, the widowed Queen, coming forward on the scaffold, and presenting to the morning air her head turned grey by sorrow, daughter of Caesars kneeling down humbly to kiss the guillotine, as one that worships death? How, if it were the noble Charlotte Corday, that in the bloom of youth, that with the loveliest of persons, that with homage waiting upon her smiles wherever she turned her face to scatter them—homage that followed those smiles as surely as the carols of birds, after showers in spring, follow the reappearing sun and the racing of sunbeams over the hills—yet thought all these things cheaper than the dust upon her sandals in comparison of deliverance from hell of her dear suffering France! Ah! these were spectacles indeed for those sympathizing people in distant worlds; and some perhaps would suffer a sort of martyrdom themselves, because they could not testify their wrath, could not bear witness to the strength of love and to the fury of hatred that burned within them at such scenes; could not gather into golden urns some of that glorious dust which rested in the catacombs of earth." Of course there follows the description of the sublime death of Joan of Arc who with her latest breath gave warning to the heedless absorbed monk at her side that he was in danger of the flames and should depart and "leave her to God." Yes, De Quincey was right, there is one thing that woman has done quite as well as man.

Sincerely yours,

—A Husband and Father.

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Too bad "A Wife and Mother" never heard of Madame Curie, the discoverer of radium whose career is a living refutation of Lecky's foolish attack on women.

Respectfully,

—A Suffragette.

XXV—JOHN P. BABCOCK

By Edward F. O'Day

"The Fish and Game Commission ought to be something more than a police force. It ought to have something more than a police court record to offer for its existence."

Of all the statements which may be made about the Fish and Game Commission that at least is incontrovertible. As every Californian who is interested in fish or game or politics knows, every sort of statement, complimentary and uncomplimentary, has been made about the Fish and Game Commission and about the men who from time to time have been chosen to administer it. There has been more bickering in and about the Fish and Game Commission than in and about any other commission in the State, not excepting the Board of Harbor Commissioners for San Francisco. But putting all this bickering behind us—and hoping that it will stay put until the next session of the Legislature when of course it will automatically revive—we can all get together and heartily agree that when Chief Deputy Fish and Game Commissioner John P. Babcock declares that the commission ought to be something more than a police force he is talking sound common sense.

For it was Chief Deputy Fish and Game Commissioner John P. Babcock who made that statement. He did not make it controversially. There was no challenge in his tone. He was not talking politics. He was discussing something much closer to his heart than politics. He was talking crab and salmon and meadowlark. Ordinarily I would rather talk politics than crab or salmon or meadowlark; but when John P. Babcock illuminates the subject of the toothsome crustacean or the silver horde or the pet aversion of Statesman Stuckenbruck of Acampo, the most benighted city dweller who looks upon the crab only when it is boiled, upon the salmon only when it is broiled or tinned and upon the meadowlark hardly at all, that benighted city dweller discovers with surprise that there is no necessity to simulate interest.

"Some time ago," said Babcock, "I asked Dr. Jordan and Dr. Gilbert who is head of the zoological department at Stanford, what they knew about the breeding habits of cancer magester, our common edible crab. Much to my surprise they answered that they didn't know anything about cancer magester's breeding habits and that as a matter of fact they didn't know anything at all about cancer magester."

"Do you regard Dr. Jordan as a great authority on fish?" I interrupted craftily.

"Dr. Jordan is the greatest authority on fish in the world" answered Babcock with conviction.

"Making further inquiries," he continued, taking up the thread of his story, "I found that nobody knew anything about our crab. San Franciscans have been bragging about it ever since San Francisco was settled; yet they know no more of its life history today than when Fremont was here. We don't know when or where it propagates or the length of the egg-bearing season. And yet this crab is peculiar to Pacific Coast waters and is the finest edible crab in the world. Four hundred and fifty boats are fishing out of this harbor for it

"I am trying to deal intelligently with this important food product. I am going to find out when it propagates, what its enemies are, the conditions surrounding the young crabs and what protection must be given it by the law. Is a law which prohibits the taking of the females and which allows only the taking of males of a certain size sufficient protection? I don't know, but I'm going to find out. On account of the increase in the price of this crab the preceding commission advised a closed season. But they didn't investigate. Before you put four hundred and fifty fishermen—hardy, venturesome men all of them—out of business, why not be sure? We are trying to make sure. Already I have made some progress. I am the first man to find the female crab carrying eggs on her finerettes. I shall continue this investigation along economic lines until we know all that is to be known about cancer magester."

And with such satisfaction did Babcock impart these matters that I glowed with sympathetic enthusiasm. It was just the same about salmon.

"In 1909," he told me, "ten and one-half million pounds of salmon were caught in the Sacramento River and its tributaries. And yet we know little of the life history of the young salmon; of the seaward migration of the young salmon practically nothing. But we are going to learn. We began experiments in February. We marked fifty thousand one-and-one-half inch salmon at the Sisson hatchery by removing the dorsal fin. When the wounds healed we liberated them. Then we marked fifty thousand more by cutting off both the dorsal and the adipose fin. Allowing two months for the first fifty thousand young fry to go from Sisson to tidewater at Benicia, we brought the second lot to Benicia and liberated them in the Carquinez Straits. We made experiments to test the effects on the young salmon of the change from fresh water in the straits to salt water out beyond the heads and we found that they suffered no distress by a change from fresh water to water eleven per cent salty within a space of thirty hours. We also traced the movements of the young salmon liberated at the hatchery. We found that the trout in the rivers fed freely on them for two months. After that there was a falling off and by May we found no trace of salmon in the stomachs of the trout. We found too that the whole Yolo overflow basin was filled with young salmon. Now we are watching to discover whether these are destroyed or whether they get out of the basin.

JOHN P. BABCOCK

"It will be two or three years before this experimental work bears fruit. By that time the salmon will return to spawn. If at that time we get more of the marked salmon liberated at Sisson than of the marked salmon liberated at Benicia, we will know that the river trip was an advantage. If we get more of the Benicia than of the Sisson salmon we will know that the river trip was bad for them. When our investigations are completed, in other words, we will know just when and where to liberate the salmon fry in order to obtain the best economic results."

Hearing Babcock tell it I felt impatient for the return of the salmon to the spawning beds. Will the salmon that come back be minus the dorsal fin only or will they lack both dorsal and adipose fin? Alas, it will be two or three years before my curiosity is satisfied. I can hardly wait. Meanwhile there is the meadowlark. Most precious or most pernicious of California songsters, which is it?

"There is only one way to find out," said Babcock; "and that is, not to ask the Audubon Society, but to put a bird man on the job and let him study the meadowlark all the year round. We have that bird man in Mr. H. C. Bryant of the University of California and he began work last November. In the first two weeks of every month since then a dozen meadowlarks have been killed for Bryant in every county where the bird is obtainable. Another dozen are killed during the last two weeks of every month. These birds are sent to the laboratory at Berkeley. To find out what the meadowlarks feed on their stomachs are examined and everything found therein is properly tabulated. It may be that the meadowlark plays havoc with the grain when it is coming up out of the ground. On the other hand it may be that the meadowlark destroys pestiferous insects when the grain is sprouting. If so he is entitled to his wage as much as the horse that draws the plough or the farm hand who walks in the furrow. Once and for all we are going to determine whether Mr. Stuckenbruck is right or wrong. For this investigation Mr. Bryant will have a greater number of birds than are at the disposal of the biological department of the federal government."

Not being a cold impartial scientist I breathed an aspiration that Stuckenbruck might be found in the wrong; that the meadowlark might be found worthy of his wage.

Babcock told me many other things of interest which space forbids my repeating. He explained the policy of publicity which he has inaugurated in the Fish and Game Commission. He thinks that the people have a right to know where the revenues of the commission come from and where the money goes and he intends to tell them by means of bulletins. He told me about that famous three years' contract which the commissioners gave him and which, as he informed Governor Johnson, was not worth the paper it was written on if the commissioners wished to

The Heart of Mimi

By Matilde Serao (From the Italian)

Jeanne did not lift her eyes from her work, her fingers flying over the delicate lace; Mimi moved restlessly through the room, shifting an ornament on the pier-table, opening a small box and clicking the lid, changing a vase of flowers from one place to another. It was plain that she wished to say or do something, but the serious expression on the face of her elder sister restrained her. Then Mimi, who was not a very patient creature, decided to face the danger and, planting herself directly in front of her sister, asked Jeanne, do you know what Antoinette has told me?"

"Nothing very interesting, surely."

"How dry and cold an answer! Where do you get your ice, little sister? From the North Pole?"

"Mimi, you are nothing but a child."

"There is where you are mistaken, great-grandmother of my heart; I am not a child, for I am going to be married."

"What?"

"Exactly; that is what Antoinette told me."

"You are crazy!"

"You shall know all, as they say in the drama. It will be a little long, but your sedate highness will have the goodness to listen to me."

"Yes, yes,; but hurry!"

"The day of the races at the Champs de Mars —that is the time and the place. You were not there because you preferred your eternal books."

"If you are jesting, I will not listen to you."

"You should listen; the secret is suffocating, killing me."

"So?"

"I pass over the symptoms. Well, at the races we were sitting in the front row of benches; Paul Lavato presented to us a handsome young man, Robert Montefranco. Salutes and compliments. They took their seats behind us and we exchanged a few vague words; then the bell rang for the start. You remember, my favorite was Gorgone—I didn't know how ungrateful she would prove to be. A cloud of dust enveloped the group of horses that started at a gallop. 'Gorgone wins!' I cried. 'No, Petit Lord wins," said Montefranco, smiling. I was angry at the contradiction; he continued to oppose me and laugh. We made a small bet, and after a few minutes of anxiety I learned that Gorgone was a traitress, that I had lost and Montefranco had won. I insisted on paying my bet then and there; he bowed and assured me there was no hurry. A few days later I met him on the driveway, and I sent him a glance that would justify him in thinking that my eyes were interrogation points. He bowed with the most mysterious air. The same at the theater, everywhere. Of course my curiosity was excited to the utmost. Robert is handsome, he is twenty-six years old, and this morning my future father-in-law had an interview with mamma that lasted two hours."

"Oh!"

"First sign of attention from my audience. Antoinette heard of the visit, therefore the marriage is a fact. Now there is a serious question to be discussed—at the mayor's office, shall I wear a blue or a gray dress?"

"How you go on! How you go on!"

"Certainly, there are no obstacles. Robert and I love each other; our parents are delighted."

"And you will marry like that?"

"What do you mean by 'Like that,' words that are so elastic?"

"Without knowing him, without loving him?"

"But I do know him. I have met him at the races, on the promenade, at the theater. I adore him, for, the day before yesterday, not having seen him, I refused breakfast and drank three cupfuls of coffee, wishing to commit suicide!"

"And he?"

"He marries me, therefore he loves me," replied Mimi triumphantly.

But on seeing Jeanne turn pale, she regretted her imprudent words, and, leaning over her sister, asked affectionately: "Have I said anything unkind?"

"No, dearest, you are right; he who loves, marries. It is difficult to win love, that is all."

"To win love?" repeated Mimi with vivacity. "On the contrary, it is very easy. But when, like you, one has a serious brow, and eyes and lips that never smile; when one remains in the corner to think while the others dance and amuse themselves; when, instead of laughing, one reads; and, instead of living, one dreams; when one is grave and thoughtful—then it is difficult to win love."

Jeanne bowed her head in silence. Her trembling lips crushed back a sob.

"I have hurt you again," said Mimi, grieved. "It is because I wish to see you courted, sought out, engaged. How great a joy it would be, if we both were married on the same day!"

"What madness! I shall be an old maid."

"No, miss; I forbid it. Robert is a gallant man; he must have somewhere a bachelor brother—he must!"

At that moment their mother entered.

"Where are you going, mamma?" asked Mimi.

"To my notary's office, dear."

"Oh, oh! To the notary's; that is serious!"

"You will soon see, little madcap. Come with me, Jeanne."

"Jeanne, too, is going to the notary's?"

"Mimi, when will you become serious?"

"Later on, mamma; there is plenty of time."

She opened the door and, bowing profoundly before her mother and her sister, she murmured: "Madame, Mademoiselle, I have the honor."

When they were outside she called after them, with a burst of laughter:

"Go, talk, tell your secrets! I shall pretend to know nothing about them!"

Robert Montefranco, according to his habit, did not pass the hours in reflection; he hadn't the time. The day fled with breakfast, riding and dinner; the evening passed pleasantly beside Mimi, his fiancee. When he had settled a few small affairs, conferred with his lawyers and fulfilled some necessary duties, there was nothing left but the arrangements for the wedding journey and the future home. There was scarcely a half hour for reading or a quarter hour for his club. He never gave himself up to deep thought or busied himself with social problems, for there was nothing of the romantic hero about Robert. He was the envied of all for his serenity of spirit.

He was stretched in his chair, legs crossed, cigarette between his lips, a book in his hand. The story was interesting, but the reader was absent-minded; more than that—he was nervous and uneasy. He did not turn the leaf, for, on coming to the second line, the letters jumped, danced, mingled into inextricable confusion before his eyes. Robert, in spite of himself, was lost in the land of reverie:

"Papa is satisfied, my aunts send me their blessing, my cousins are furious, my friends at the club congratulate me ironically, my other friends press my hand; therefore I do well to marry. Mimi is ravishing. When she looks at me with her malicious eyes and shows her white teeth in laughter, I feel like covering her fair head with kisses. She has a heart of gold; always in good humor, in high spirits, always contented, ever ready for amusement, witty, mocking, jesting. We agree very well; I cannot endure serious faces. They seem to hide some secret grief, some mysterious sorrow, a sorrow that I cannot console and of which I may be the involuntary cause. Jeanne, my future sister-in-law, with her cold, impassive features, irritates me. When she appears all my gaiety vanishes and I shrink as if the chill of autumn were in the atmosphere. I have not the courage even to jest with Mimi. Jeanne puts an end to my joy. She must have perceived my antipathy, for she salutes without looking at me, without speaking to me, without offering her hand.

"Mimi laughs incessantly. She is so young! She declares she adores me, then bursts into a fit of laughter and talks of something else. Yes, she loves me well, but she will never break her heart. The truth is, neither am I desperately in love, and it is better so. An engaged couple ought to have the same character and they need not start married life with extravagant passion on either side. That is the case with Mimi, and we shall be very happy. We shall go to Italy, traveling leisurely and stopping wherever fancy suggests. We shall remain away three months—no, four months, at least. I wish to withdraw Mimi from the sad company of her sister. But is it natural for a young girl to be serious?

"Jeanne will soon be twenty years old. Her eyes are admirable and she has the bearing of a queen. She could please, if she would. She will never marry. Perhaps that is the cause of her sadness; perhaps some secret love, perhaps a deception. I am curious to know the cause of her melancholy.

"Mimi adores sweet meats; she told me so the second time I called on her parents. Caramels melt on her rosy lips. And the impressive air with which she tells me there are no more! She is adorable. She whispered to me that she was afraid of thunder, that she wanted a black velvet dress with a long train, that she would be as jealous as a Spaniard and that she would buy a dagger inlaid with gold as the instrument of her vengeance! She is exquisite as she expresses all her childish thoughts; even Jeanne smiles, and how bright is her countenance when she does smile; Jeanne, who will penetrate to that hidden soul?"

The book fell on the floor with a crash. The noise aroused the young man from his reverie. He shivered like one taken in a fault. Was it he, Robert Montefranco, who had been lost in revery, indulging in day-dreams?

Twilight was gathering over the city like a fine ashen mist, and Jeanne, standing at the window, looked out as if seeking someone in the

English Census Figures

The provisional census returns for England and Wales were at first regarded as highly satisfactory from the sociological point of view, as they did not indicate any appreciable falling off in the birthrate. A closer examination, however, showed that it was the poorest and least fit portion of the population that was growing most rapidly, while the better part of the population, the most efficient and the most intelligent, was either growing very slowly, or stationary, or actually diminishing. The Irish returns are especially interesting. They show the decrease of population in the sister island since 1901 to be only 1.7 per cent—by far the smallest percentage for seventy years. The decrease in males was only 0.6 per cent since 1901 but in females it was 2.8 per cent. This is probably due to young men remaining in the country under the new land conditions, while girls still emigrate to become domestic servants. The result is that the males in Ireland total 2,186,804 and the females 2,195,147, so that the sexes are nearly equal. Women are greatly in excess in other parts of the United Kingdom.

The Army and the Woolen Trust

The War Department has decided to break from the grip of the "Woolen Trust" and have a fair competition on bids for supplying clothing to the enlisted men of the army. This is the plain English of the determination of the department to substitute carded woolens for worsteds. May 24 advertisements were authorized calling for bids within two months for 350,000 yards of carded woolens, and if this trial proves satisfactory woolen instead of worsted will be the standard cloth for uniforms. Worsteds will be retained for shirtings, because of their elasticity, but all other cloth made from wool will be of the carded woolen variety—the soft, rough cloth which has almost gone out of use as the popular clothing of the people, partly because of the insistence with which worsteds have been turned out by the mills. For years the army worsteds have been supplied exclusively by the American Woolen Company. According to the figures of the department only 226 worsted mills are operated in the United States, and 790 woolen mills. Army officers state that trust conditions exist in the worsted industry, and do not in carded woolens. They say frankly they believe they can get the cloth from fifty to eighty cents a yard cheaper for woolens than for worsteds, and that they will get a more serviceable article. They deny the assertion of the worsted men that woolen cloth has less tensile strength, and declare that it has greater, while they say the superiority of its abrasive quality is acknowledged. The Government has been paying from $2.30 upward for 22-ounce cloth to $1.30 a yard for 13-ounce cloth. The quartermaster's department expects a saving of thousands of dollars a year through the substitution, a more serviceable and pleasing cloth for the use of the men and a breaking up of the monopoly on Government contracts which the American Woolen Company has been able to exercise through well-practiced trade methods for many years.

The Peace Movement in Hawaii

There is no part of the country where careless war-talk is so firmly discouraged as in Hawaii. This is not because the islands feel that they occupy a strategic position in the event of hostilities; it is because the best sentiment there covets the distinction of being considered a strategic peace point in relation to Japan and the United States. This feeling has crystallized during the past two months into a modest, but definite and active peace movement. The Mid-Pacific Institute is a private school just out of Honolulu, founded several years ago by influential citizens of the territory for the education of boys of various races. It is beautifully situated about four miles out of the city, is richly endowed, and has a well-equipped teaching force, mostly of graduates from American colleges. As a beginning of the peace movement, five free scholarships in the Institute have been offered to the five Japanese boys who write the best essays on the subject: "Friendly Relations between Japan and America and How They May Best Be Maintained." The scholarships include not only board and tuition, but traveling expenses to and from Japan and Hawaii and all necessary books and equipment for the course. To make this competition effective for the end in view it was necessary to interest leading Japanese educators in the plan. For this purpose, Theodore Richards, the American treasurer of the Institute has just completed a special mission to Japan. He succeeded at the start in interesting Count Okuma, ex-prime minister and now president of Waseda University in Tokio. Count Okuma made his own house a centre for the work and helped Mr. Richards organize a committee made up of the best-known Japanese educators and leaders in reform work. The number of scholarships offered at present is small, but the help of distinguished educators and the eagerness of Japanese students to profit by Western education will doubtless lead to a large number of entries in the competition. Every entry will mean the creation of a little centre of peace interest to counteract the war-talk in both countries.

The Wireless Toothache

If the German scientist Hensingmuller's theories are correct the approaching wireless age will compel people to wear metal insulated suits to protect them from the deadly electric wave dangers. He says that a weird new form of violent toothache has already resulted among those exposed to the waves. He anticipates that those who are more dangerously exposed hereafter will lose their hair and some of their senses, and even their lives. He points out that there is no essential difference between wireless waves and X-rays, the terrible nerve shrivelling effects of which are well known. He estimates that only one three hundred-millionth part of the electrical energy generated for a message transmitted between stations one mile apart is actually used. The rest, he says, is dispersed in the atmosphere and hits some one somewhere.

Russia and Jewish Travelers

After many years of practical exclusion from Russia, Jews who desire to enter that country on business will in the future be admitted under restrictions to be prescribed by the Russian government. Official information has been received by the State Department at Washington that Russia will henceforth accord more liberal treatment to the Jews. This is a concession to the continued protests of the United States against the barring of Jews who are American citizens. This government contended that the barring of the Jews constituted a violation of the commercial treaty of 1832 between the two countries, which provided among other things for reciprocal rights of travel. Under the procedure which has prevailed up to this time Jews were admitted to Russia only after they had obtained passports which were properly vised by the Russian Embassy or by Russian consular officers in this country. This method of procedure has, however, practically been a dead letter, as in nearly all cases the Russian officers have declined to vise the passports. Several instances where prominent American Jews have desired to enter Russia and have applied for credentials, have in recent years brought this question to public notice. Now it bids fair to be settled satisfactorily

Killing the Opium Trade

The opium agreement, signed at Pekin on May 8 by Sir John Jordan for England and the Wai-wu-pu for China, promises the certain extinction of the traffic within seven years. It starts out by recognizing the good faith with which China has endeavored since 1907 to reduce the production of the drug within the empire, and the first covenant is that for the next seven years it shall continue the decrease in the same ratio that the annual import from India is diminished. Great Britain agrees that no opium shall be conveyed from India to any province of China which has effectively suppressed the cultivation of the poppy. The entire export of opium from India shall cease in less than seven years if proof be given that the home production has entirely ceased in China. The ports of Canton and Shanghai are to be the last closed to imports. The other provisions of the agreement provide for administrative details, including official inspection in each country. Great Britain consents also to an increase of duty to 350 taels a chest on imports, provided that an equivalent excise tax be placed on domestic opium in China. The annual reduction of the Indian exports is now about 5,100 chests, but it is to be even greater in 1912, 1913 and 1914. A loss of revenue of at least $15,000,000 is on the surface involved to India from the loss of the imports on the trade. This may have to be met in part by a contribution from the British imperial treasury. But in Parliament recently Under Secretary Montagu of the Indian office intimated that some other way might be found of meeting the deficiency.

Bohemian Has-Beens

Porter Garnett, author of the forest play to be produced at the next Midsummer Jinks of the Bohemian club, has incurred I am told the disfavor of several distinguished members who have hitherto been regarded as essential to the success of the annual events in the grove. I refer to the gentlemen who have figured as the protagonists of the grove dramas. Mr. Garnett will have none of them. There is not one of them, he says, capable of giving vraisemblance to the pictures which he has designed. It is not their talent he discredits but their physique. All of them are too well fed, too suggestive of animality. He even goes so far as to accuse them of embonpoint, jowls and other things inconsistent with manly beauty. All of which is unpleasant to the ears of the admirers of Allan Dunne, McDonald Spencer, Jack Shiels, Courtney Ford and Dick Hotaling. These gentlemen have long been regarded in the Bohemian club as the very finest specimens of masculine pulchritude. But Mr. Garnett says they will not do. He admits that any of them might be made to look the part of a man of mettle, of a knight of old, fit for joust or tournament, capable of storming castles or trifling at a middle-aged lady's toilette, but for his midsummer night's frolic in the woods among nereids and naiads they would be as much out of drawing as a policeman at a church festival. He has written a play full of airy dreams, languishing flowers, soft clouds, pale moonbeams, sweet sounds and sweet smells, and what mortal men appear therein must be of the Narcissus type, free from all suspicion of cocktails, with the locks of Apollo, rounded cheeks and ivory necks, and with the delicacy and grace that might be expected to "die of a rose in aromatic pain." So the veterans of the grove drama must take a back seat, and in no way disturb the enchantment in which Bohemia is to be lapt. Now the question is, "Can they ever come back?"

Two Appointments

Now are the loaves and fishes being distributed with a sense of gratitude which must command the admiration of all lovers of that rare virtue. To the Board of Control created by the only honest Administration that political pap might be more abundant Governor Johnson has appointed one of the most passionate of his panegyrists, Mr. John Francis Neylan, of the Bulletin staff. Mr. Neylan is a young man, not more than twenty-eight years of age, but that he is deserving we know by the industry he has shown in propagating the fame of our Governor. His appointment while it contributes to the efficiency of State government is a distinct loss to journalism. The enemies of the Administration will find it more difficult to criticise the appointment of Mr. Neylan than to criticise the appointment of Charles Cutten as attorney for the State Commissioners of Lunacy. Mr. Cutten was one of the ornaments of the State Senate. He voted for Works for Senator without scruple though his district and his county voted for Spalding.

Raking Dead Ashes

After ten weeks of laborious pondering Frank Short has lucubrated at weary length against Colonel Roosevelt. His apologia is a pedestrian effort set off by a few exhibitions of speed. But Short has been too long in training for his Marathon. The Commonwealth Club banquet whereat Colonel Roosevelt hit Frank Short with a meat-ax, so to speak, took place on March 27. When Short had had his little say of ten minutes and Colonel Roosevelt had devoted an hour to his reply, the etiquette of the occasion forbade surrebuttal; so it was the most natural thing in the world that Short should let out his moral indignation through the nub of his fountain pen. But that he should take such an unconscionable time to do it in spoiled the effect of the rejoinder. There can be no doubt that Colonel Roosevelt carried off the honors of the debate; that he triumphed brutally over an opponent whose mouth was closed makes little difference—the colonel often triumphs that way. So if Short could not frame burning words of retort while the controversy was hot, he should have let the matter rest. He is raking dead ashes. Not that his poker is clumsily wielded. He starts in this strain: "It was unanimously agreed that his address upon this occasion was probably Colonel Roosevelt's greatest effort. I, therefore, have at least the consolation, without hope of ever being able to make a great speech, of having provoked the greatest speech of the greatest man of the greatest generation of the greatest country on the earth." Not bad but too long in coming.

A Natural Mistake

As every clubman in town knows, the emblem of The Family is a stork and one of these busy birds is shown in stained glass at the entrance to the Family Club in Powell street near Bush. A few nights ago some of Herman Heller's musicians at the St. Francis who had been playing a special engagement at the Fairmont were returning to the former hotel. "This is the Family Club," said one of them casually as they passed the club house. "Is it?" returned another in unfeigned astonishment, looking at the emblem in the stained glass. "I always thought it was a maternity hospital."

More Trouble for Kent

The Hon. Bill Kent of That Ilk continues to enjoy immunity from uncomplimentary mention in the newspapers of this city. Those who are curious to follow the affairs of the congressman from the second district must read Sacramento's leading daily, the Union, which has an ever-watchful eye on Bill. The latest bit of news is that Bill's cattle company, the Golconda, is once more in trouble, having just been charged by the government with illegally enclosing government lands in several counties in Nevada. But this, it seems, is not all. I read in the Union: "There is also a protest in the land office at Carson City about mineral lands which, it is alleged, the Golconda Company tried to grab as agricultural land. It was only forty acres, but held the key to thousands of other acres of grazing land." Some of these matters will be taken up by the federal courts in Nevada before the end of the month.

White Is Not So Black

"Gus" White, the man appointed by Mayor McCarthy to succeed Chief Seymour is of the most catholic taste in the matter of companions and friends. As soon as his appointment was made public the Bulletin announced that he was Jerome Bassity's "pal." His intimacy with Bassity was news to me, but I was not incredulous, knowing that White has a wide circle of acquaintances and that his acquaintances are of a very mixed character. The Bulletin argues that White was appointed because of his intimacy with Bassity. By the same token it might be argued that he was appointed because of his intimacy with ex-district attorney Langdon, or because of his intimacy with Eustace Cullinan or because he was on such intimate terms with Fremont Older that he was selected to make the proposition that Older told about in the Flannery case. If White is Bassity's pal then the conclusion is warranted that between Bassity and the Bulletin there is almost as close a connection as the one between Seymour and the Bulletin. And therefore it may be wise for the Mayor to meditate as to whether he might not be jumping from the frying-pan into the fire. The ramifications of the Bulletin's friendships are mysterious and mystifying. There is somebody on the Bulletin with a genius for underground connections and with an amazing facility for reconciliation and reform. It was this genius that converted Roy Golden or Golden Roy from a sinner into a saint; that touched the cheeks of Carroll Cook with lips of fire instantly transforming the object of Bulletin anathema into a Bulletin pet and reformer; that searched the heart of Captain Duke and found it up to the Bulletin standard of righteousness and worthy of Bulletin confidence. So what may not be done with a pal of Bassity's. White, by the way, has social and fraternal connections that justify the confidence heretofore reposed in him by the Langdons and the Cullinans. He is a prominent member of the Knights of Columbus, he is an Elk and he is a member of the Olympic club.

Vox Populi Vox Dei

Some very amusing nonsense is to be found under the guise of sober philosophy in the editorial columns of our daily papers. Here is a specimen from the Chronicle of last Sunday: "The people never have and never will elect to the chief magistracy of this Republic one who would knowingly permit any dishonest transaction to be made if within the line of his official duty to prevent it." This is what might be called laying the flattering unction to our souls that we are a new Chosen People more favored than the Biblical tribes inasmuch as we are immune from error. In these days of pessimism, progressivism and everything but genuine patriotism the sentiment is refreshing and inspiring. It carries us back to the good old days when the Fourth of July was celebrated at every cross-roads in the country with much pomp of oratory, when the eagle was wont to spread himself and soar and shriek and the lion's tail was twisted till the beast roared in impotent rage; carries us back indeed many centuries, for the germ of the idea of popular infallibity is to be found in the medieval maxim "Vox populi vox Dei." This dear old maxim has been too long neglected; nay, it has fallen into disrepute. There are crusty old philosophers who tell us that it is unrepublican because it may be interpreted to mean that the people may do what they list, under the constitution, above the constitution and against the constitution; in other words that it is an avowal of disbelief in institutional government. They have even exclaimed in doleful accents, "Woe to the country in which political hypocrisy first calls the people almighty and then teaches them that the voice of the people is the voice of God." How wrong they are we know from the fact that Progressive Republican statesmanship today puts its faith in the divinity of public opinion. The medieval maxim is what animates twentieth century politics. Our greatest statesmen have discovered the remarkable mystical truth that though each of us is an erring individual the united clamor of frail mortals has a character of divinity about it. This is the truth which the editor of the Chronicle has enunciated with a cocksureness born of inspiration.

Discovered, Another "Pote"

Not since it was my privilege to delve into the pages of "Natoma" and read therein the glowing numbers that proclaimed our dear Joe Redding a "pote" among "potes," have I experienced such joy of discovery as overwhelmed my palpitating heart t' other day when I learned that Dr. Frederic Burk, president of the San Francisco State Normal School, was also a member of the sacred brotherhood. Yes, Dr. Freddie Burk is also a "pote." By right of discovery he is my "pote," just as Edwin Markham was Bailey Millard's and George Sterling was Ambrose Bierce's before a jealous world claimed a share in the ownership. It was by the merest accident that I discovered Dr. Frederic Burk to be a "pote." I shudder to think that I might never have known his golden quality had not "the ritual of graduation" of the normal school fallen into my hands. In this precious sheaf of inspiration Dr. Burk has bound up the fat ears of his highly cultivated field of fancy. I have been devouring his output and now with my hand on my heart I solemnly declare that Dr. Freddie is a "pote" worthier of celebration than Joe Redding himself. Which is going some.

Dr. Freddie's Ritual

The ritual of graduation which the students of the normal school must submit to before receiving their diplomas, may justly be designated a remarkable piece of writing. It is nothing if not all-embracing in its scope. Perhaps one might not improperly describe it as a pot pourri wherein biblical tags and psalms are mingled with reconstructed hymns, Kipling's Recessional, "Rock me to sleep, mother, rock me to sleep," a balderdash of bathos reminiscent of the "work" of some secret societies and—last but ah! not least—Dr. Burk's original verses. From this scented hotchpotch there arises the stuffy odor of the lodge room combined with the musty smell of an overripe sentimentality. Heralds speak the obsolete lingo of heralds; guild choruses sing lines that limp into irregular ranks of unmated rhyme; Woman greets the "initiates" in platitudinous doggerel and the "initiates" reply in kind; and "voices of the wood" give utterance to exclamatory nonsense. The whole thing is calculated to make a strong man blither with vexation and to cause a sensible woman—there must be many such among normal school graduates—to blush for the guiding spirit of the institution she is leaving. Really, I am not exaggerating the silliness of the thing. If Dr. Burk were the Freddie Burk of the old newspaper days he would agree with me.

A Taste of His Quality

But we are dealing with Dr. Burk the "pote." Let us sample his wares of Helicon. List to the "guild chorus":

A mighty host, an innumerable company
Of womankind, that in love find life's harmony,
Do now this altar assemble round,
Exultingly sing, till the heavens resound,
For they in service joy have found.
Love's work with children they espouse,
Divine love in their hearts arouse.
Let childhood's host rejoice, rejoice,
For them they hail with gladdest voice,
A woman's work, their happy choice.

In the presence of that singing voice let Joe Redding bow his haughty whiskers. Joe may have been kissed of Mary Garden but Dr. Burk has been bussed by the Sacred Nine, yea! by the whole outfit. But hist! the "response by the initiates":

With joyous steps we go on our way.
Love lends a halo to our day.
Light sorrow sails like clouds afar,
We say, "How strong we are."

And we of the uninitiated vulgus can only say how strong we are for the "pote." Hark to this witching strain:

Oh! the never forgotten school days,
Whose music fresh and pure,
Is woven hints of songs to come
Like a beautiful overture

We are all but God's school children,
And earth is our schoolhouse now,
Where duties are set for lessons
Whose windows life doth bestow.

I confess to a fondness for that "beautiful overture" but I can't quite see through the windows of life's schoolhouse. The panes are a little dusty.

The Doctor's Poetical Prose

I would that I might pluck more of these Burk posies for the delectation of a waiting world, but I must find space for a few jewels of prose. The Doc is addressing the children:

> We would not hold from you one iota of your birthright, yours from the race and nation's forefathers, handed down from generation to generation. And what have I for you, dear children? The pen and the book, these, our emblems of knowledge and wisdom.

In the following the Doc evidently pictures woman's form swathed in a hobble skirt:

> By a tall and graceful Ionic column do we symbolize Womanhood.

But immediately she becomes a stick:

> She is a support to the various canopies of protection for the children of the land.

The "charge" to the graduates is wondrous fine:

> We charge you to lead the children out under the wondrous firmament of night, etc. We charge you to lead the children to some high mountain, etc. We charge you to lead them forth into the stillness of the woods, etc. We charge you to lead them into the haunts of man, etc. And we charge you, especially, that you avoid the pitfalls of pedantry in your craft, etc.

Dr. Burk's Little Joke

Only once in this whole ritual does Dr. Burk appear as a humorist. That is when, in enumerating the "vows of the teacher," he calls upon them to promise "not to use, or knowingly to permit others to use in my behalf, any influence or arguments in securing appointments, other than those of my professional skill and qualifications of a teacher." Have we not here the exhibition of an antic wit? Or is it cant? How many normal graduates, think you, Dr. Burk, would refuse the friendly offices of a Board member in obtaining a school or a class? If Dr. Burk has never exerted his influence for a favorite pupil he stands alone among officials of his department. But Dr. Burk, being a "pote," may be pardoned for eccentricity.

"I think I'll be an explorer and take up mountain-climbing," said the sardonic person.

"Have you any training for that sort of thing?"

"I think so. I work on the thirty-fifth story of a building whose elevator gets out of order."

Some Creamy Business

From a shareholder of the United Cigar Stores I received some interesting information the day after the decision was rendered in the Tobacco Trust case. He said that the stock was selling on a three and a half per cent income basis with none pressing for sale even in dull times. The United Cigar Stores are selling upwards of $30,000,000 worth of goods a year. No store has ever been opened that did not make a profit from the start. There are three hundred stores in the New York metropolitan district and nine hundred scattered all over the country. The management of these stores is of the strictly up-to-the-newest wrinkle in American business. The thousands of salesmen are drilled like the soldiers of an army. They are taught politeness, cleanliness, alertness. It is impressed upon them that advancement in the service depends on their assiduity. They are closely watched, and promptly rewarded for good service. The matches which they give to customers cost the company $85,000 a year, but from the advertising on the back of some of the packages a revenue of $50,000 is derived. New stores are located only after a careful statistical study of street traffic. The first stores in New York were opened on the corners that actual counting of pedestrians had shown to be the busiest corners in America. All the stores are rented from the United Merchants Realty and Improvement Co., a subsidiary corporation which is making $1,000,000 a year on its $100,000 common stock It has put millions of dollars into the purchase of real estate and into long-term leases, and now its leases and equities are said to be worth the entire capitalization of United Cigar Stores. The $9,000,000 stock which was selling just before the decision around $230—more than $20,000,000 market value—is owned by the American Tobacco Co. and its group of friends. They have cut up one 10-for-one melon, and they have been receiving $8-a-share dividends.

Black Beetles in Amber

Slowly are the collected works of Ambrose Bierce issuing from the press of the Neale Publishing Company of Washington and New York. I have before me "Black Beetles in Amber," a volume of verses most of which are republished from San Francisco papers. This book is itself an answer to the familiar criticism that the author has dealt mostly with obscure persons; for even so, such is the intrinsic merit of the verses that they afford great delight. They are fine specimens of both gentle and mordant satire and they give enjoyment even to the reader who has no acquaintance with the persons pilloried on ridicule's lofty and lasting stage. The wit of the following, for example, would be none the less keen though we knew not the orator to whom it alludes:

Like a worn out mother he attempts in vain
To still the unruly Crier of his brain:
The more he rocks the cradle of his chin,
The more uproarious grows the brat within

And even though ex-Fish Commissioner Joe Redding had not immortalized himself by writing a libretto would we not nevertheless enjoy these lines.

Great Joseph D. Redding—illustrious name!—
Considered a fish-horn the trumpet of fame.
That goddess was angry and what do you think?
Her trumpet she filled with a gallon of ink,
And all through the press with a devilish glee,
She sputtered and spattered the name of J. D.

Bierce like Hogarth can sum up character with a few strokes of his pen. His deftness is shown in these lines that convey as good an idea of the character of the founder of the Palo Alto university as David Starr Jordan could impart in a fat volume of his sprightliest prose:

Here Stanford lies, who thought it odd
That he should go to meet his God,
He looked, until his eyes grew dim,
For God to hasten to meet him

This epitaph is not inscribed on the tomb of Senator Stanford, but if the love of biographical accuracy ever becomes militant it will be.

Scheffauer on Bierce

A fine appreciation of Ambrose Bierce appears in a recent issue of T. P.'s magazine of London. Each month this magazine publishes a masterpiece of fiction, drawing its material from every language, together with an article on the author's personality and achievements. From Bierce's writings, "An Occurence at Owl Creek Bridge" was selected as a vivid example of his work, and Scheffauer wrote the introductory note which opens with these words: "Since the death of Edgar Allen Poe, her apostle of beauty, America has not produced a more remarkable literary phenomenon than Ambrose Bierce, her apostle of satire and doom." He pronounces Bierce "one of the most versatile men of genius in the United States," and says that now at sixty-eight, "he is, with the exception of Joaquin Miller, the only representative of a splendid group of writers that centred about Bret Harte and his times."

Dr. Owen Gives Up the Search

So Dr. Orville Owen of Detroit has at last abandoned his attempt to explain the wherefore of the Wye in the Shakespeare-Bacon silliness. Well, it was about time. We were getting tired of the doctor-digger. The point of his jest was becoming dulled by overuse. The argument was consuming too valuable space in the literary papers and the deciphering medico was looming out of all proportion to his actual worth. For a while he supplied a diversion of tolerable idiocy, but we were beginning to yawn at him. He retired just in the nick of time to save our strained politeness from going by the board. If he will kindly submerge himself in the obscurity which has been the ultimate lot of Delia Bacon, Ignatius Donnelly, Mrs. Elizabeth Wells Gallup and the other innocuous monomaniacs who preceded him in the development of this literary hallucination, all will be forgiven. He did his darndest and failed, thereby exactly fulfilling the expectations of everybody rejoicing in the rudiments of common sense. Like his ancient namesake of the clan Glendower he essayed to call a spirit from the vasty deep, but the fractious spirit wouldn't come when he called. A thousand Hotspurs could have told him as much before he started. Deeper than ever did plummet sound let him drown his cipher and get him back to Detroit and his patients, if he has any.

Bacon and Gammon

He was a source of innocent merriment ere he grew stale. When first he burst upon New York with his cipher which he read by means of a machine like a Hoe printing press, with his complicated jugglings of the text of the First Folio, of Raleigh's History of the World, of Sidney's Arcadia and of Bacon's weighty tomes, he was legitimate prey for the jokesmiths. When he transposed the line, "It was for gentle Shakespeare cut" and made it read, "Seek, sir, for a true angle at Chepstow," the temptation to chaff was irresistible and naturally somebody insisted that the proper transposition gave, "P. S. This Owen real cute, great fakes." When he announced that Bacon was the son of the Virgin Queen Elizabeth, it was according to the best tradition of humor that Bram Stoker should adduce "proofs" to show that the Virgin Queen was a man. But when he went to Chepstow and obtained permission from the Duke of Beaufort to search for the "true angle," the joke began to fray at the edges. When he told us that the precious Baconian manuscripts would be found in five boxes twenty feet long, ten feet wide and two feet deep which had been hidden in a vault beneath the mud of Wye, we were certain that his powers of exciting merriment were waning. Perhaps the good docter realized as much, for he made a mighty effort to command our laughter once more by telling us that in one of these huge boxes he would also find the head of Shakespeare. The wheeze fell flat. Have we not been overincumbered with severed heads? One is enough in a generation and Dr. Owen reckoned without the head of Cromwell which was claiming attention. As a rib-tickler his head of Shakespeare was not in the same class with Mr. Dick's head of Charles I. The freshness had gone out of the doctor's tomfoolery.

Taking the Doctor Seriously

But when a comedian's powers wane there is always somebody to take him seriously. That is why Nat Goodwin found a chance to play Shylock, why some would like to see Eddie Foy play Hamlet. This law of change worked out on the doctor. He was taken seriously by a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries who almost but not quite revived the laughter-provoking possibilities of the situation. This solemn Britisher established that the timbers which Dr. Owen uncovered and attributed to the secreting labors of Bacon were the timbers of an ancient bridge built long before Bacon was born. He also showed that the wall which was part of the data given in the cipher for locating the boxes of manuscripts was not built till the nineteenth century. Other antiquaries and dryasdust diggers in ancient lore refuted the doctor with equally laborious solemnnity and for a moment the case threatened to regain its jocular prestige and to become almost as hilarious as a page of Punch. But our expectations were disappointed. The last chortle had been wrung from it. The Duke of Beaufort charged up the expenses of the excavation to profit and loss and the Duchess of Beaufort, a confirmed Baconian, motored up to London to attend the grand Shakespearian ball. And the doctor? He is dead to the world of literary freakishness Let us say of him in the language which another doctor applied to a great comedian, "His death eclipsed the gayety of nations, and impoverished the public stock of harmless pleasure."

She—I will have no smoking in this house. Do you understand?

He—Yes,please extend this prohibition to the stoves.

A Picturesque Personality

I noticed Humboldt Gates in the lobby of the St. Francis the other day. His is a picturesque personality. He has not yet passed forty, yet he has managed to accumulate a store of varied experiences in his wanderings over a territory extending northward to Alaska, southward to Mexico and eastward to the gold camps of Nevada. Wherever in this western country there was wealth to be dug out of the bowels of the earth Humboldt Gates journeyed eagerly, carrying the joy of life and the love of adventure with him. He was named after the county of his birth, is self-educated, and self-made in the financial sense His timber interests in Humboldt, I believe, are now very large. Up on the Yukon they still tell the story of his fight with a tenderfoot who aspersed the honor of a woman. It happened on ship deck and Gates went after the offender hammer and tongs, while everybody gathered round to see the scrap. The fighters clinched near the rail and toppled over into the icy waters locked in the embrace of combat. Both were good swimmers and it is said that they fought three rounds in the water before they were fished out. When Gates had inflicted sufficient punishment his opponent apologized.

Americans who have been so distinguished might be counted on the fingers of one hand. Curiously enough, it is one of Mrs. Atherton's earlier books which is being published in daily installments by Le Figaro. "L'Esclave de la Vigne," as they call "A Daughter of the Vine" is no doubt interesting to French readers but it will not make the sensation in Paris that it created here where the principal characters were well known to many people. The translation was made by Jean de Gail. Mrs. Atherton, by the way, has changed all her plans, if the papers quote her correctly, and will soon be with us for another season of literary work.

"Yes," replied the plumber, "and Mr. Sodder says it will cost you $60."

"Mebbe not, but he told me how much to do."

Wanted, a State Anthem

Untiring poetasters of the male and female variety have been trying for a long time to manufacture a California anthem suitable for rendition in the schools and on occasions of patriotic celebration. So far their efforts have been lamentable. Perhaps the reason is that an anthem must be born when the poet's mind burns with the inspiration of a great crisis and that the deliberate attempts of the poetasters inevitably result in mechanical lucubrations devoid of any sort of beauty or spirit. But the principal reason for the failures is that the attempts are made by poetasters. Our real poets have never turned their thoughts to the composition of a State anthem. The most recent attempt has been made by, of all persons, Ellen Beach Yaw. Undeterred by the discouraging reception accorded the "Eureka, California, Hail" which even a progressivist Legislature laughed to scorn, the singer with the freak high note tried out an anthem that was still hot from her pen, on the good people of Los Angeles who attended a concert she gave. Here is Ellen's attempt:

California! Glorious Land!
What mystery dost thou hold?
Thy name through the Universe
Is writ in shining gold.
The eyes of every nation
Are turned toward thee now,
For God has placed with gracious hand
A wreath upon thy brow.

Chorus

California! California!
Earth's own charmed land!
Thy name through all eternity
Is writ by God's Own hand!

Wondrous Land of Sunshine,
That draws men unto thee,
And holds them with a magic bond
In perfect unity.
Here is found a haven,
Where sun and flowers combine
To drive away all worldly care
And teach a love Divine.

Lift your voice in gratitude!
Ring out ye Mission Bells!
Proclaim with love and harmony
The joy our country tells!
Peace and sweet contentment
Forever shall abide
In the homes of California—
Our Nation's greatest pride!

The obvious criticism of this is first, that it is not poetry; second, that it embodies too much near-poetic license. The eyes of every nation are not turned toward California now. God has not placed a wreath upon the brow of California. Men are not held together in California with a magic bond in perfect unity. (Didn't Ellen ever hear Los Angeles knocking San Francisco?) Sun and flowers do not drive away all worldly cares in California and they do not necessarily teach a love divine. And California is not our nation's greatest pride. As for the chorus, I don't know what it means. In what way is the name of California writ through all eternity by God's Own Hand? No, Ellen Beach Yaw has not given us our State anthem. Who will write it for us?

of the Ocean Shore road was driven. The plain people of Santa Cruz were more elated than the banqueters at the Casa del Rey Hotel. The opening of that hotel was a public event of as much importance to the people of Santa Cruz as the selection of the Fair site will be to the people of San Francisco. Santa Cruz should be the Atlantic City of the West, and the only reason that it has failed to enjoy the popularity to which it is entitled by situation is that it has lacked up-to-date hotel accommodations. There was a time when the hotels of Santa Cruz were as good as those at any of our summer resorts, but gradually they fell into the has-been class, and the beautiful seaside resort held its own by sheer virtue of its natural attractions. So what the town needed above all else was a first class hotel under modern management, and it was the filling of this long-felt want that was celebrated last Saturday night when a Mr. Moroney made himself famous by taking a drink within sound of the surf.

The Pacific Cafeteria

Monday noon will see the opening of San Francisco's largest cafeteria which is located in the basement of the Pacific Building. This institution is the outgrowth of a popular demand for places to dine without the added cost of service by waiters. San Francisco has several such eating places but none can compare in size, comfort and ideal surroundings with the Pacific Cafeteria. It will have a seating capacity of 1500. Every convenience known to date has been installed to insure quickness of service which will be from double tables. For an entertainment feature the management has secured the famous Philippino Band of ten pieces which will render music during both luncheon and dinner. On Sundays the management will make a special feature of serving dinners from 5 to 8 o'clock.

Shaw on the Future of Music

George Bernard Shaw, who was a musical critic before he became a playwright, delivered a lecture in London the other day, in which he asked his audience to throw themselves a little into the future. As usual, people had not realized what the advent of the various pianolas and piano-players meant. It meant ultimately the abolition of the piano keyboard. Hitherto the arrangement of hand and keyboard in piano-playing had been the source of many imperfections. The keyboard had tyrannized over music. A great deal of the form and shape of our music was really due to the mechanical limitations imposed upon it by the keyboard. The composer of the future, however, would be able to compose music without any relation to the keyboard at all. What we wanted, Mr. Shaw continued, and what we should have eventually, was a totally new kind of music, the composer of which would not be fettered by the knowledge that the player could not get his hands wherever he pleased. He declared that at present it was impossible for a piano ever to be properly in tune, but with, say, fifty-three notes within the compass of the octave, piano-tuning could be brought to such perfection that every fifth would only be the 11,000th part of a semi-tone. But with the keyboard, if there were fifty-three notes to the octave, nobody would have sufficient manual dexterity to play it. The pianola would introduce a new kind of music, in which all sorts of intervals were employed that were not at present, and would give them a new technique and new resources in sound.

Children in New York Theaters

There are some interesting and significant facts about children in a study of the commercial recreations in New York City prepared by Michael M. Davis Jr., secretary of the committee on recreation and amusements of the New York Child Welfare Committee, and published by the department of child hygiene of the Russell Sage Foundation. It declares, for instance, that the weekly audiences at the low-priced theaters and moving-picture shows of Manhattan include, during the winter season, an average of about half a million children under sixteen, constituting 20 to 25 per cent of the total attendance. The boys outnumber the girls two to one, and, among the adults, the men exceed the women by about the same ratio. Contrasting these figures with those of the high-priced theaters, we find that the weekly attendance of children, at the latter, is about 8,000, or only 5 per cent of the total. Speaking of theatergoers in general he finds that at the low-priced theaters the majority of the audiences are of the working class, a minority of the clerical, and a minute remainder is made up of vagrants and leisure-class persons. At the high-priced theaters the leisure class appears to be in a slight majority over the business or clerical, the working class figuring in at about 2 per cent. Upon the mass of the people of New York, therefore, the direct influence of the high-priced, or so-called "standard," theater, is relatively nil.

At the Celestial Gate

The druggist approached the Celestial gate. St. Peter opened the portal for him and bade him enter and join the heavenly choir.

"Not so fast," admonished the compounder of pills. "Before I go in there I want to ask a few questions. Have you any city directories in Paradise?"

"No," replied St. Peter.

"Any remedies for growing hair on bald heads and door knobs?"

"None."

"Any soda fountains?"

"We don't know what they are."

"Do you sell stamps?"

"We don't use them here."

"And last, but not least, have you any telephones?"

"We have not."

"Then I'll go in, for I guess this is Heaven all right, all right."

The Sharons to Live Here

Mrs. Frederick Sharon is proving her affection for California in the decision to make her residence here permanently. With an assured position in the Faubourg St. Germain and a home in Paris she elects to return to her native State with all her lares et penates. Two years ago Mr. and Mrs. Sharon announced their intention of building a residence at Menlo Park for their visits necessitated by business connected with the vast Sharon and Tevis interests, Mrs. Sharon being one of the daughters and heirs of the late Lloyd Tevis, sister of Will and Harry Tevis and Mrs. Gordon Blanding. The house is not a pretentious one but the owners have become so attached to the property and to the California climate that they have decided to build a larger house and improve the park for a permanent home that will be one of the show places of the State. Mrs. Sharon is an indefatigable hostess and scarcely a week passes that there are not a dozen or more guests in the household. The Sharons maintain their apartments at the Palace the year round. They are going to England to visit their daughter, Mrs. Fermor Hesketh next winter but the absence will not be a long one.

The Stillman-Whitney Marriage

The two society wedding on Wednesday were celebrated in diametrically different surroundings. As befitted the nuptials of one of New York's wealthiest citizens the Stillman-Whitney marriage was a brilliant occasion. Trinity Church was filled with a fashionable throng that wore its finest raiment. Mrs. William Rockefeller, a relative of the groom, was the object of most interest before the bridal party appeared. She occupied a pew with Mrs. Reding, the bride's mother. The bride looked dainty and sweet and carried herself well. She will be the mistress of a Fifth Avenue mansion in a year or two and her new position in New York's millionairedom will not feaze her. Young Stillman's gifts to his bride form a rare collection of jewels and the Stillmans who are greatly pleased with the match have showered her with gifts. The youth of the bridal party was noticeable. One or two of the maids have not as yet made their debuts. Madge Wilson is a blonde of the Grecian order and her beauty won many comments. The two Otis girls are pretty debutantes of last winter. Dorothy Woodward and Florence Williams are Berkeley maids who made their bows at the assemblies last winter and Lillian Whitney was presented with her sister early in the season. The groom graduated from Harvard last term and the ushers were all young New Yorkers who came out for the wedding.

Jennie Lee Married

Later in the day there was a small home wedding at which the pretty Southern belle Jennie Lee became the bride of Lieutenant Rees of the navy. A limited number of friends witnessed the ceremony which was followed by a jolly informal dinner and dance, bride and groom leading the dancing in true Southern style. The bride is from North Carolina and the groom from Tennessee. Mrs. Rees has been much sought socially since making her home in this city with her sister Mrs. Schlesinger. She is popular in navy circles and has attended many of the dances at Mare Island, sharing the belledom of Miss Anna Peters who was a guest at the wedding. Miss Amy Bowles was the bridesmaid in a costume of pink and silver with a bouquet of roses tied with a silver cord.

The Ball at Santa Cruz

The ball in Santa Cruz Saturday night was the occasion for mirth and jollity like unto that of a Mardi Gras celebration. The similarity was increased by the presence of the Yama Yama girl who was the belle of the Mardi Gras in Dreamland Rink and attracted a train of admirers wherever she flitted. The handsome widow who acted as chaperon and who lives at the St. Francis received many approving glances. The two had a merry time. "Has anybody here seen Kelly" was soon understood to refer to the widow's charge who answered to the title when addressed. Mrs. Kathryn Voorhies Henry was a handsome figure at the ball in blue and with her was Miss King, a Spanish looking beauty from Honolu who had on a Carmen costume. Manager Swanton of the new hostlery would permit no turkey-trotting on the floor and when this was discovered the dancers sought the piazzas where the grizzly bear and the bunny hug defied the mandate. The manner in which Peter Martin, Louis Sloss and a bunch from the Family Club got ahead of the city ordinance was highly commended. In the quiet purlieus of Santa Cruz no drinks are sold after one o'clock a. m. and no lights are allowed in places of public resort. The word was passed and at 12 the bar was bought out. After one there was plenty to drink for everybody from the purchased stock behind the counter. Lights were turned out in the dancing hall but outside a string of incandescents in the piazzas furnished sufficient illumination for those who cared to trip the light fantastic within.

An Aviation Honeymoon

An unusual honeymoon is that of young Clarence H. Walker and his bride who was Miss Caroline Bevin before she gave her hand and heart to the millionaire birdman. They are at present in the Hawaiian Islands where Walker is giving a series of exhibition flights. Dexter T. Dorgan who was best man at the wedding is Walker's manager while the Honolulu manager who is directing the exhibitions rejoices in the name of Love, very appropriate in the circumstances. After giving flights in Honolulu, Hilo, Maui and other parts of the islands the birdman and his bride will continue their honeymoon trip to Australia where more air feats will be performed. By the way, this romance of an aviator reminds me of the lines Ambrose Bierce wrote a good many years ago when aviation had not yet supplanted aeronautics:

The Anglophile in Society

There is in our midst a well known matron who is noted for her brogue but who always claims to be English, thereby amusing her friends without deceiving them. One day recently she met in a street car a prominent society girl who is acquainted with her eccentricity and who always affects an English accent in conversation with her. When the two were about to part the matron said with an unmistakeable brogue: "I always love to meet you because you remind me so much of my own dear England."

The Deady-Howitt Engagement

The engagement of Mrs. Mary Thompson Deady and Dr. Henry O. Howitt which has just been made public has been an open secret to their intimate friends for some time. Mrs. Deady is the daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Robert A. Thompson of Santa Rosa and is prominent in the exclusive Southern set here. The family connections are very large including the Thompsons, Thorntons, Huies and others. Those attractive matrons, Mrs. Webster Loring Clarke, Mrs. Robert A. Holcombe and Mrs. Ray Taylor, are cousins. Dr. Howitt is a leading physician of San Rafael and a member of the Golf and Country Club. He is a widower with two children, Miss Beatrice Howitt, a young debutante, and Dudley Howitt, now attending Hitchcock's Military Academy. The engagement of this couple is unusually romantic and interesting to their many friends. Dr. Howitt and pretty Mary Thompson were sweethearts in their youth. But they drifted apart. Dr. Howitt married Miss Alice Chace, sister of Mrs. Oge. Miss Thompson married Paul Deady of Portland. Mrs. Deady went East where she remained for a number of years and only returned to San Francisco last year when she and Dr. Howitt met again, he as a widower and she as a widow. Old feelings and old ties were renewed with the result that the wedding will take place within a few weeks. The future home will be in San Rafael. Mrs. Deady is at present the guest of her sister Mrs. Harry Sutcliffe in Alameda. A great deal of entertaining will take place in honor of Dr. Howitt and Mrs. Deady in San Rafael and this city.

Mrs. Hearst's Business Acumen

The honor paid ex-President Diaz by the Government of one of the Mexican states calls to the mind of one of the Eastern bavardes a wigging which the ex-president gave this very Governor several years ago. It was in connection with Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, the mother of our versatile William Randolph Hearst, a woman who knows and follows up business details in a manner that puts her in a class with Mistress Hetty Green herself. Many of the enterprises left to her care by the late Senator were in old Mexico, and consisted of mines and plantations over which she placed Mike Tarpey in the capacity of resident supervisor in the City of Mexico. Tarpey by the way was entertained at the Riverside house of William Randolph a short time ago. On one of his trips Tarpey got word of a bargain in plantations and Mrs. Hearst went to inspect it herself. She was pleased with it and decided to make the purchase, which had to be recorded in the capital of the province, over which the Governor presided. The necessary documents and transfers were prepared, and Mrs. Hearst and Mr. Tarpey took them to the palace to obtain the Governor's signature. After a courteous salutation that dignitary paused, pen in hand, and remarked casually, "Madame knows that we poor men live by our fees, and I think it is worth $10,000 to her for my signature to this great bargain which Madame is now getting." If William Randolph has inherited his mother's cleverness and activity, and many are beginning to think he has, he will appreciate the continuation of the story which he may never have heard, for Mrs. Hearst is not a loquacious lady and Mike retains his position through knowing how and when to keep his mouth shut. Mrs. Hearst assured the Governor that she fully realized his necessities, that she had not that amount in her purse at the moment, but that on the morrow she would return with the money and then the business could be completed. Within five minutes of leaving the palace, Mrs. Hearst was in the office of the English railway manager chartering a special and to the Capital the lady went and told Don Porfirio about the attempt to hold her up. The Governor was promptly summoned from his seaside sanctum and was given a calling-down by the president which he has never forgotten. Mrs. Hearst got her plantation, the Governor received a very modest fee with chastened spirit and Mike betook himself to the American club for a game of seven-up with His Excellency the American Minister.

The Bulls Not Worrying

The fact that a bank in Santa Barbara has brought suit against Captain and Mrs. James H. Bull for a trifle like $10,000 loaned five years ago on a promissory note secured by a mortgage on valuable property will not cause these prominent people much annoyance. What is a lawsuit involving $10,000 to people who have just had their daughter presented at the court of King George? Many of the families whose daughters are presented at court owe many times that sum and have no such prospect of being able to pay as the Bulls have. For the Bulls are said to be very comfortably endowed with this world's good and probably forgot all about that indebtedness to the bank. The Bulls made a pretty figure at court, by the way. Mrs. Bull had some of her beautiful Chinese embroideries entrained in her gown of gold satin and Mechlin lace and Marjorie wore white chiffon embroidered in pearls with a train of silver white satin over silver tissue. Both were greatly admired.

Fourth of July Golf Tournament at Del Monte

Since the announcement of the big midseason golf tournament which will be held on the beautiful Del Monte links July 1 to 5, inclusive, Manager Warner has been receiving many inquiries and applications for entry. Among those who will play are Mrs. C. W. Clark and E. Raymond Armsby. They were in a party with Miss Jennie Crocker which spent some time on the Del Monte course recently and are enthusiastic over the prospects of a big meet. The Fourth of July falls on a Tuesday which means that a great many business and professional men will take advantage of the break in the week's affairs to leave their offices on Friday and return on Wednesday morning, thus extending the week-end. Manager Warner has planned the play in such a way that there will be trophies for winners and runners up, as well as in consolation, mixed foursomes and handicap bogey events. As the roads from both north and south are in excellent condition the golf tournament will be sure to attract many motor parties from Los Angeles and the cities about the bay. A goodly

A Cafe Innovation

Tait's Cafe has long been noted for the uniqueness of its decorations, as well as the excellence of its service, not only in its cuisine but the little innovations that have been adopted, from time to time, for the amusement, interest and entertainment of its guests, but at no time has the public been so deeply interested in the appearance of this cafe as during the past week.

Last Sunday, the main room of the cafe was decorated as a Summer Garden, on the lines of the latest decorations in vogue among the cafes in Paris. The effect is most pleasing. Outside of the splendid character of its service, a visit to this cafe should be a delight and a pleasure, not to speak of the latest in the culinary line, picked from the finest markets in San Francisco.

The Part That Billie Plays

By Edward F. O'Day

Mr. Somerset Maugham, the British contriver of "Mrs. Dot," probably builded the principal character of his comedy for some beauty of the London stage and not for Billie Burke. If Maugham had had Billie Burke in mind when he drew the fascinating figure of the brewer's widow with the amazing income he would be entitled to the highest praise as a practical joker of the rare inoffensive variety. For Billie Burke is preposterous in the role of Mrs. Dot. The lively widow is represented as pursuing the man she wants for her second husband through three tangled acts of indefatigable scheming. From her first appearance on the stage she is eager in the chase and she doesn't bring down her quarry till the curtain is about to fall at the close of the entertainment. Which, I submit, is a preposterous situation for Billie Burke. Will the reader kindly put himself in the position of the young man of the play. This is not asking too much for the young man is tall and handsome and has just become a lord; besides he is the object of Billie Burke's irrepressible devotion. Certainly the reader will not object to assuming the position, for a few moments at least. Let us suppose then that the reader is being pursued by Billie Burke with all the arts and wiles of experienced widowhood. Would he take Tony Weller's advice and "bevare of the vidder" for three whole acts? Would he resist the blandishments of this delicious young woman with the peaches and cream complexion, the nose that wrinkles with serio-comic perplexity, the big dancing eyes that flash a dozen different signals in a dozen seconds and the hair of dull gold that is forever tousling itself into the most unexpected of bewitching shapes? Would he remain cold before the fire of her frank lovemaking? Would he preserve his indifference in the midst of her ardent pleadings? Would he—but I shall not insult the reader by referring to Mrs. Dot's tremendous fortune, for doubtless he is one of those sterling characters for whom the jingling of the guinea makes no compelling music. But if the reader whom I have enlisted in the cause of my argument can candidly asseverate that he would be capable of holding off Billie Burke through three acts, then I can only say that he is a confirmed misogynist who should not have been brought into this discussion. If he is a single man of more natural proclivities he will agree with me that the situation prepared by Maugham is ridiculous; that the hero of the comedy would have been off with the old engagement and on with the new before the first act was half over; and that in consequence there would have been no play of "Mrs. Dot." Of course it is all very well to point out that the hero belonged in all honor to the silly young woman to whom he had engaged himself in a moment of moonlit sentimentality. But honor, as Falstaff pointed out, is a very peculiar attribute. One of the peculiarities about it is that it cannot supply adequate consolation to the miserable wretch who immolates himself upon its altar for the sake of one who does not appreciate the sacrifice, does not want the sacrifice in this case. In plain terms the young man is a good deal of an ass and like most of the assinine brotherhood he has to be kicked soundly before he comes to his senses. "I could not love thee, dear, so much loved I not honor more" is the burden of his song to Billie Burke and as a matter of course she does not appreciate the lofty stand of this modern Lovelace. For that matter there is no record that Lucasta of old approved the sentiment of her romantic poet. No doubt she threw him over while he was at the war and married some lucky stay-at-home. If Billie Burke had thrown over the hero of "Mrs. Dot" and married some more appreciative young man she would have been perfectly justified. However, Maugham constructed his comedy on other lines and we have to stand for the anomalous situation. To place Billie Burke in such a situation is a practical joke at the expense of all that is alluring in pretty, plump, healthy and clever widowhood. There are many actresses who might make the role seem convincing, though I am not bold enough to mention their names. But Billie Burke? Never! For the first time in her career she is playing a part and she has too much charm to make it convincing.

Gossip of the Theatre

Ethel Barrymore Coming

The next attraction at the Columbia will be Ethel Barrymore who is to make her appearance in a great double bill composed of the two Barrie plays "Alice Sit-by-the-Fire" and "The Twelve Pound Look." The last named play is said to be one of the strongest and most virile pieces of dramatic writing that has graced the stage in years. It is a drama in tabloid form and its terse, concise and pithy dialogue capture attention. Barrie wrote the play for Miss Barrymore and in its principal character gave her a role in which she has scored a tremendous hit. The company surrounding the actress includes Charles Dalton as leading man. Seats for the Barrymore engagement go on sale Thursday morning.

Another Week of Billie Burke

Billie Burke will continue to present the Somerset Maugham comedy "Mrs. Dot" at the Columbia next week. There will be the usual matinees on Wednesday and Saturday.

Florence Roberts in "Zaza"

An elaborate revival of David Belasco's "Zaza" is announced for the coming week at the Alcazar, with Florence Roberts, Thurlow Bergen, Theodore Roberts, the full roster of Alcazar players and a number of extra people in the cast. Thus the histrionic side of the offering is assuredly well taken care of, and as Stage Director Fred J. Butler is responsible for the scenic accessories some artistic pictures may confidently be looked for. Miss Roberts' first venture as a star was in the title role of "Zaza," and her success was instantaneous and so emphatic that for two consecutives seasons she carried the play over the western and southern circuits, under Frederic Belasco's direction. All the critics who witnessed her portrayal of the volatile Frenchwoman pronounced it in perfect accord with the author's ideal. Mr. Bergen will be seen as Dufresne, a role for which he is splendidly qualified, and as Cathcart, Zaza's singing partner, Mr. Roberts is sure to be impressive. There are twenty-five other people in the cast, with all the favorite members of the regular Alcazar company in well-fitting character, and each of the five acts affords opportunity for effective staging.

BELLE ADAIR

"Vaudeville's Sweetest Girl" who will appear this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum.

A Turkish Bath at the Orpheum

Joseph Hart's "A Night in a Turkish Bath" will be given next week at the Orpheum. There is comedy and song a-plenty and touches of sentiment. The star of the act is Robert J. Webb. The Farrel-Taylor Company consisting of Frank Farrel-Taylor, Blanche Davenport and Tom Carter will reappear in a skit entitled "That Minstrel Man," in which comedy is interspersed with bright and popular music. Belle Adair, the dainty singing comedienne who will make her first appearance here, is a charming girl with a personality that is most winning. James H. Cullen brings new material for comedy. Next week will be the last of George Austin Moore and Cordelia Haager; The Namba Japs; Isabelle D'Armond and George Moore and Master Gabriel and his company in "Little Tommy Tucker."

Our Alice Nielsen who is singing at the Komische Opera in Berlin was asked to create the title role in the English and American productions of the new Strauss opera "Der Rosenkavalier," but was forced to decline as her concert engagements in the United States will keep her busy till Christmas.

D'Annunzio's New Play

Gabriel D'Annunzio is his own best press agent. He has been telling a Parisian journalist all about his forthcoming play "St. Sebastian." This is the way the curious dramatist discourses: "In writing "Saint Sebastian," said he, "I banished all terms that are not of 'authentic race'—that is, at least four centuries old." Then he went on to say: "My worship of Saint Sebastian dates from my first youth, my period of humanism. An adorable friend of mine, the best femme de lettres in Italy, can bear witness to that. It was she who inspired in me a love for that superb youth, transfigured by the Christian myth. I remember sketching out a sort of paraphrase of the martyr's words: 'Quam libens ob tui amorem dulces jaculos patior memento.' It is in this same spirit that the saint in my new play is made to speak. In his hour of agony he says to the archers, 'Who wounds me most deeply loves me the most.' From the very beginning a note of ardent faith runs through my play. You constantly feel the invisible presence of Christ, and the intoxication of grief and death leads you up to the highest mountain peaks of heroism. I have not failed to put into my play what was perhaps the most intense and the most tragical moment of the Christian consciousness in those early days—the sudden outpouring of grace, the lightning-like illumination, the sudden conversion. The original Christ fell upon rebellious souls and carried them away like Dante's eagle.

The Plot of His Play

"In the first act, a whole family of Gentiles is converted. It is like a Christian transposition of the fable of Niobe. You can't imagine the extraordinary power the situation affords. I am amazed that no poet ever treated it before. The second act of my tragedy takes place on the night when Sebastian, aided by the zealots of the new faith, overthrows and breaks the idols in the Roman prefect's house. The slaves revolt. The crowd presses around the saint. Sick people are carried to him, imploring him to cure them. All beg him to show them the face of the new God. 'A sign! A sign!' they cry. Some recall the resurrection of Lazarus, others Christ's healing of the sick in Galilee and Samaria and Jerusalem. Sebastian answers, 'His face is hidden, his whole body is veiled.' The slaves and the crowd protest. Sebastian answers, 'He has no body now, nor any blood; he gave his body and his blood for the salvation of the world.' Sebastian's distress and the entreaties of those who beg him to show them God are so touching that I could not translate the scene without tears. But this is not the culmination. The tide of emotion keeps rising, with unforeseen episodes, till its final sublime musical outburst. For, whatever the critics and the public may say of my poem, I am sure that everyone will feel the power of Debussy's music. On the music's account, if on no other, I shall be forgiven."

His Inspiration

D'Annunzio hesitated a moment, then continued: "My first studies of the subject, three years ago, were in the domain of the Laudes and Devotions, plays that followed the type of the Italian drama of the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Certain little old gentlemen denounced me, and asked if I didn't mean some day to write a tragedy in Chinese. I didn't deny it. The good Fogazzaro used to say, in horror, that I was capable of anything. For once, he agreed with me. May God reward him. My resolve to make a 'dict' on the beautiful saint of Catholicism came to me after meeting an extraordinary creature who incarnated the very type of the fiery defender of the faith, as it has for centuries appeared to artists and devotees. Neither Mantegna's Saint Sebastian, nor Perugino's nor Espagnolet's, nor any other could compare with the vision of that actress. When I saw Ida Rubinstein I resolved to write this mystery play. And as she spoke French instead of Italian, I wrote in French, following the standards of your mystery plays, octosyllabic verses, with rondels and vilanelles. There was another reason, too, for my writing 'The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian' in French rhythms. I thought that whoever would touch what is deepest in a race must go down into the most mysterious of its sanctuaries—that of language. Neither the hills and rivers of the Ile-de-France, nor the cathedrals and chateaux, nor its history and legend would have given me the key at all as this study of old speech did."

T. C. C. Gregory, district attorney of Solano County, was a St. Francis guest for a few days.

Tne Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Without exaggerating its importance, it may be said that the cut in steel prices was the dominating influence of last week's business. It was felt in the stock market to the extent of checking what looked like a promising advance. It provoked raids from bear operators, particularly in United States Steel Common, which was heavily sold short before the Standard Oil decision and in anticipation of the Republic Steel Co.'s cut in the price of steel bars. The later may have been merely a coincidence, but the movement altogether is reminiscent of a kind of trading which flourished exceedingly in 1902, only to collapse completely in the following year. Technically the average price of the active stocks is still above the February figure, at least so far as the railroad list is concerned. As the stock market spent three months without falling below the December low price, or rising above the high figure of last February, the professional crowd will still argue that the advancing possibilities of the market have not been exhausted. The investment demand is decidedly good and, so far as the general trade conditions are concerned, it should be remembered that the stock market looks a long way ahead.

Wheat—With the May wheat deal out of the way the trade have turned their attention to the distant futures, July and the September options. The principal long in the May option took in all the wheat tendered him on contract, and has been a big buyer of cash wheat in the sample market. This has given the market a strong tone, and it only needed a few reports of Hessian Fly and dry weather talk to stampede the shorts in the distant options. No doubt there has been some damage done the crop both by insects and excessive heat in the winter wheat belt, but the season is too far advanced to expect any thing but a slight deterioration. The news from the spring wheat country, both on this side of the line and in Canada could not be more favorable. Showers have fallen in some parts of the spring wheat territory nearly every day and the crop is said to be as near perfect as it could possibly be. Foreign news on the whole has been favorable, with the possible exception of Southern Russia and Roumania where it is said excessive heat is doing considerable damage although this was partly offset by the heavy shipments from both countries. The foreign markets have not kept pace with our advance and with new wheat almost ready for market it looks as if present prices will be hard to maintain.

Corn—The strong upturn in wheat has been the big factor in the corn market and prices show a good advance. With the May option out of the way receipts are expected to fall off. Shipping demand has been good and there is very little accumulation at any of the primary markets. The strong upturn in oats caused by reports of damage by excessive heat, and the poor outlook for the hay crop have given the bulls courage. If the dry hot weather continues another ten days we are apt to experience a strong and much higher market.

Cotton—The Government crop report which was issued recently made the condition of the growing crop 81.7 against 80.7 last year and was construed as bearish by the trade. This was offset by the acreage report which showed only an increase of 4.74 or a total of about thirty-five million acres against thirty-two million acres last year. The statistical position of cotton continues to wield its influence over the nearby futures and while there was some loss in the July option the price is still well above 15 1-2 cents. The new crop options have held remarkably firm owing to reports of dry weather in Northern Texas, Oklahoma and the eastern belt. Temperatures have avereaged around the 100 mark and except for an occasional shower the map has been dry. There was also some talk that the Boll Weevil had made its appearance and was doing considerable damage. The bulls seem to have the market well in hand, and if the drouth is not relieved in the near future the market will undoubtedly have a good upturn. However 13 1-2 cents for cotton that promises a crop of around fourteen million bales discounts a good many things and it is well to exercise caution at this level.

midst of the busy throng of passers-by. Suddenly a vivid blush overspread her countenance and she drew herself back hurriedly. A minute later Mimi entered like a whirlwind, slamming the doors and overturning the chairs.

"What were you doing here, sister mine? Reading?"

"Yes, I was reading."

"And it did not occur to you to look out of the window?"

"And if it did?"

"I would congratulate you. I have been detained by the seamstress who brought my ball-dress, and I was trembling with impatience. Just think! Last evening I begged Robert to wear his beige overcoat, to harness Selim to his phaeton and to drive past the house at six o'clock. Has he obeyed me?"

"Robert drove past in his beige overcoat."

"Mercy! How do you know that? You were not reading?"

"I was at the window."

"And you recognized Robert at whom you never look? Wonderful! Did he salute you?"

"Yes."

"Did you, at least, smile?"

"No—yes—that is, I don't know."

"You are unkind, Jeanne. Last evening Robert was speaking of you."

"He said I was unkind?"

"No, but he asked me the cause of your reserved character, so different from mine. Then, I sang your praises. Ah, it was a beautiful eulogy! I said you were better, more amiable, more tender than I, with the single defect of hiding your good qualities. He listened very attentively, then asked the cause of your aversion for him."

"My aversion!"

"Listen, he was not wrong. You treat him so badly. But I defended you, and I even assured him that you liked him very much."

"Mimi!"

"I know it was not true, but Robert feels so much sympathy for you that you are wrong to treat him as if he were a stranger."

Jeanne threw her arms around her sister and embraced her. Mimi held her a moment, murmuring in a caressing voice:

"Why don't you love Robert just a little?"

The other disengaged herself with a brusk movement. "Then will you come with us this evening," resumed Mimi, changing the conversation.

"No, I have a headache. You can go with mamma."

"Naturally. Well, I shall go just the same, and amuse myself."

"Does Robert accompany you?"

"Nix. He is going to his club where there is to be a meeting of the board. I shall take advantage of that and dance until daylight!"

"And if he should hear of it?"

"So much the better; it will teach him to leave one at liberty. I do not wish him to get into bad habits."

"You do not love him very much, it seems to me."

"Very much; but in my own way. I must hurry to dress, for I need at least two hours."

Jeanne listened to the carriage that bore away her mother and her sister. She was alone, lost in the vastness of the great, well-lighted drawing-room, her hands resting on her lap, her head thrown back against the chair, her features contracted. She seemed to be a prey to some inward struggle, some deep grief. A step made her start; it was Robert. He approached, thinking that the other members of the family were in the next apartment. Jeanne rose in confusion.

"Good evening, Mademoiselle Jeanne."

"Good evening, monsieur."

Both were embarrassed, and Robert mentally wished the young girl in Hades. The latter, regaining her self-control, offered the young man a seat.

"Madame your mother is well?" asked the young man.

"Very well, thanks."

"And—Mimi?"

"Very well, also."

Silence. Robert felt a strange sensation of joy and bitterness.

"Is Mimi busy?" he asked.

With a slight, impatient movement Jeanne answered: "She has gone with mamma to the ball at the Dellinos."

Therefore Jeanne was alone and, unless he wished to be considered the most impolite of men, he must remain and chat with her. Robert, as the idea occurred to him, was possessed with an irresistible desire for flight, yet he remained.

"I came because the meeting at my club was deferred."

"Mimi did not expect you; I am sorry."

"Oh, that does not matter."

It was not very flattering to the absent one. "And you did not go?" he asked.

"No, I care so little for balls."

"You prefer to read?"

"Yes, very much."

"You do not fear that it will injure you?"

"My eyes are good."

"And beautiful," thought Robert, "but expressionless."

"I meant—" he added aloud.

"In a moral sense, perhaps? I do not think so. The books I read give me a great peace."

"Do you need it?"

"Everybody needs it."

Jeanne's voice was grave and full, yet Robert listened with surprise. He felt that he was in the presence of an unknown woman who was about to yield up her secret. Jeanne's coldness had disappeared; smiling, she chatted as with a friend. What had been the trouble before between them? What was happening now?

"When I like a book," resumed Robert, "I have a violent desire to know the author, to know if he is good, if he has loved, if he has suffered."

"I fear you would meet many deceptions. Authors describe the love of others, never their own."

"Through respect, perhaps?"

"Or through jealousy. It is often that love is the only hidden treasure of the soul."

Jeanne's voice was so quiet as she spoke—she was so simple, so pure, so convinced—that Robert felt no surprise at hearing her speak thus freely of love. Indeed, nothing astonished him; everything seemed natural, even this evening spent alone with this strange girl. When they parted their eyes met as if soul sought soul, Jeanne held out her hand, over which he bent, a portiere fell heavily, and Jeanne was alone.

Outside, the young man felt his heart troubled, his brain excited. He was happy and sad; he longed for death, yet he was full of life. He knew not what to think of Mimi, of himself, of the future.

Jeanne was happy, very happy. She buried her head in her pillow and wept.

Three months have passed; Mimi's marriage had been delayed.

Sometimes her mother, who was impatient at the pretexts given, would ask her, irritably: "What are you waiting for?"

"I want to know Robert better," was Mimi's constant answer.

And, indeed, she had become serious. She sang, laughed, jested as formerly, but she would often stop to look at her sister, or to listen to Robert. She was often seen with lips compressed, brows contracted, and tense expression. Mimi was on her guard.

Everything had changed. Robert was neither gay nor serene, but rather preoccupied and disturbed; his speech was dry and brief; those things that formerly interested him no longer attracted him. Sometimes he succeeded in dominating his humor, and became playful and amusing. But he was not accustomed to dissemble and his eyes betrayed his acute suffering.

Jeanne, too, had changed. Sometimes she embraced her sister passionately, and again, she fled from her. Her face would flush as with fever and her eyes flame; her voice, at times hoarse and deep, would break into harsh, strident notes; her lips trembled, her hands shook. Her nights were sleepless. Often Mimi would rise and go, barefooted, softly to her sister's door and listen to Jeanne's sobs.

When Jeanne and Robert met, and that happened daily, their words were few, vague, strange. Sometimes during the entire evening they would not exchange a word, yet each studied every gesture of the other. Robert would always find a pretext to examine the book or touch the work laid aside by Jeanne; and if she did not appear, his eyes sought the door continually, then, in a few minutes after her entrance, he would pick up his hat and go. Jeanne grew thin and pale, and dark circles formed under her eyes. At last she remained in her room for eight days. One evening Mimi entered and asked:

"Will you do me a favor?"

"Certainly."

"I must write a note. Robert is alone on the terrace; go and keep him company."

"But I—"

"You wish to remain shut in here? Does it cost you so much to do me a favor?"

"You will not be long?"

"Just the time to write four lines."

Gathering up her courage, Jeanne went toward the terrace. She stopped at the threshold. Robertn was walking up and down. She approached.

"Mimi has sent me," came in a low voice.

"You must be forced to come?"

"Forced? No."

Her whole body was trembling. Robert, with troubled features, was beside her.

"What have I done to you, Jeanne?"

"Nothing, nothing; you have done nothing to me. Don't look at me so!" she begged.

"You know that I love you, Jeanne—that I love you with all my soul!"

"Be silent, Robert, be silent, I beg you! If Mimi should hear you!"

"I do not love Mimi; it is you that I adore!"

"That is a betrayal of faith."

"I know it, but I love you! I will go away—"

"Well!" cried Mimi, appearing at another door. "Have you made peace?"

There was no answer. Jeanne fled, hiding her face in her hands, and Robert stood motionless, silent, stupefied.

"Robert?" called Mimi.

"Mademoiselle."

"What has happened?"

"Nothing. I am going."

And, without a word of farewell, he, too, went away with a gesture of despair.

Mimi looked after him thoughtfully.

"One to the right, the other to the left. Good! I must act."

"For all those good reasons I cannot marry Monsieur Robert Montefranco," concluded Mimi.

"Those are absurdities, my child," replied her mother, shaking her head.

"Well, do you wish me to tell you the whole truth? I no longer love Robert."

"Well, that's frank; but just the same it is only a caprice. Robert loves you."

"He will be consoled."

"He has my word pledged."

"You will take it back. There are no longer any forced marriages."

"What will the world say?"

"Mamma, what do you mean by the 'world'?"

"The people—"

"Who are the 'people'? I do not know them, and I am not obliged to be unhappy just to please them."

"You are a dreadful child! But what shall I do with Robert? What shall I say to him?"

"What you please. That is the duty of the mother."

"Yes; to excuse your follies. There will be a scandal."

"No, no, speak to him, gently, tenderly. You can speak of me harshly—tell him I am a coquette, a spoiled child, that I am not serious, that I am without dignity, that my sister—"

"Your sister? You are crazy, Mimi!"

"Bah! That could easily happen. Just now Robert and Jeanne are indifferent to each other; but they will appreciate each other when they become better acquainted, and then—who knows? A good mother marries her elder daughter first."

"True."

"I shall always have suitors and—I am scarcely sixteen years old. Then I want to amuse myself, to dance, to enjoy my youth with my dear mamma, my beloved little mamma!"

"You are a demon!" answered her mother, embracing her.

"Then it is settled. You will politely announce the news to Robert, adding that we shall remain good friends and that I shall expect to see him often. My sister and he will love each other if fate so wills. It is destiny."

"But do you think, you wicked little thing, that matters will be arranged so easily? You know I don't like comments."

"Oh, mother, more unbelieving than Saint Thomas! Yes, yes; since I, with my long experience, guarantee that there will be no trouble. Robert is a gentleman, and he would not wish to marry a girl that does not love him."

"What seems to be impossible is the question of Jeanne."

"There is nothing so possible as the impossible," replied Mimi gravely.

"Well, I leave matters to time, which settles all troubles. Nevertheless, you are mad!"

"And capricious."

"And hare-brained."

"A mad-cap, a giddy-head, and everything you wish! Preach me a sermon, I deserve it. I await."

"Kiss me and go to bed; a good night, dearie."

"Thank you, mamma. Good night."

"It is better so," thought the mother. "Mimi is very young to marry, and every day we see the sad results of a marriage of convenience. It is better so."

"Phew!" said Mimi to herself. "What diplomacy to persuade mamma! I would make a perfect ambassador! It is a veritable triumph! The triumph of Mimi!"

She stopped at her sister's door and listened. From time to time she heard a stifled sob; Jeanne had lost her peace of mind.

"Sleep, my cherished sister, sleep!" murmured Mimi dropping a kiss on the lock as if she wished to embrace Jeanne. "Rest and be tranquil, I have worked for you tonight!"

And the generous child fell asleep, satisfied that she had secured the happiness of those she loved.

Time, good old time, has accomplished his work. Mimi asked whether a bridesmaid at her sister's wedding should wear a blue silk or a simple foulard. She asked Robert whether there would be plenty of cakes at the lunch, and persuaded Jeanne to give her a beautiful embroidered handkerchief. The engaged couple, who knew Mimi's heart, smiled at her happy carelessness and looked upon her as their providence.

"You know I always said that husband and wife should have opposite characters," said Robert to one of his friends, on announcing his marriage. "Extremes touch; they end by blending and making a complete whole. While characters that are alike resemble two parallel lines running the same way and never touching. And then—there is love! I always said so."

Varied Types

remove him. Still, the uncertainty of tenure does not dampen his enthusiasm for the work. He is a man of independent means.

But he likes his job and would certainly like to retain it, principally because it keeps him in California. He was born in Minnesota and educated in the University of Wisconsin. He came to California expecting to die of tuberculosis and spent much of his time in the open.

"As a boy," he said, "I cared more for bugs than for ball. Everything that's alive interests me."

He has always been an enthusiastic angler and it was while on an angling trip that he met Livingstone Stone who built the first hatchery for the federal government in this State and was a pioneer in the artificial propagation of salmon and trout.

"When I discovered that men could make their living in that kind of work I decided to go into it," he said.

He's been at it ever since and has long since given up all thought of dying from tuberculosis. No wonder he likes California.

He entered the service of the Fish and Game Commission in 1890 and was made chief deputy in '92. In 1901 he resigned to become Commissioner of Fisheries for the British Colonial Government. He occupied that position in British Columbia for nine years, devoting himself principally to the study of salmon which is his specialty. Then Dr. Jordan, who has since become a member of the Fish and Game Commission, persuaded him to return to his old position.

All his investigations take an economic turn. When he is studying fish or game he has his eye on the market. His consideration for the sturdy, venturesome fisher folk of this city is typical of his attitude. And his pride in California's position in fish culture is very great.

"This State has always had a high place in fish culture," he says. "There is nothing greater in the history of the acclimatization of fish than the introduction of striped bass and shad into California. California is always instanced in this work by experts all over the world."

I wonder how many of us would have known that if Babcock hadn't mentioned it?

Pipe Straws

"What will the little brown sparrow do with the straw? Do you suppose he is going to clean out his pipe?"

"No, Hortense, he will stuff it into a rainspout, and the man who owns the house will attend to the pipe-cleaning later in the season."

Auto Notes

The recent announcement made by the Tahoe Tavern that a silver trophy would be awarded to the first car to reach that resort this season via the new state highway which passes through Auburn, Emigrant Gap and Truckee has occasioned a flood of inquiries from various sections of the State as to the exact conditions governing the contest. The question most frequently raised concerns the point from which a car must start to entitle it to the award. For instance an enthusiast of Grass Valley wishes to know if it will be necessary to come to San Francisco or Sacramento to start. The management of the Tavern declares that the crux of the test lies in crossing the summit and that any car doing this is entitled to the award irrespective of the point from which the start is made. A voucher signed by some hotel or garage man on this side of the summit should be presented as evidence that the run was made over the new state highway by the machine on reaching the Tavern.

A spectacular drive in a 1912 Packard "Six" through the wilds of the Jackson Hole country in Wyoming and neighboring states by President H. P. Joy and party is the climax of test runs which have given the new "Six" a total mileage in excess of 51,000. This figure is an impressive illustration of what is required of a Packard car before a new model is placed on the market each successive year.

Recent sales of Stevens-Duryea cars include the following: Taxicab Company of California, one Stevens-Duryear six-cylinder Landaulet, finished in Brewster Green, upholstered in Brewster Green Whipcord; Taxicab Company of California, two Stevens-Duryea six-cylinders limousines; J. R. Christy, a Stevens-Duryea six-cylinder touring car; Mr. Henry Landsberger, a Stevens-Duryea six-cylinder touring car; Mr. A. Lachman, a Stevens-Duryea six-cylinder touring car; Mr. W. H. Weilbye, a Stevens-Duryea six-cylinder touring car; Mr. T. Turner, a Stevens-Duryea four-cylinder touring car; Dr. F. J. Lane, a Model "X" Stevens-Duryea touring car; Mr. J. W. Goodwin, a Stevens-Duryea four-cylinder touring car; Dr. A. M. Tower of Lodi, a Cole "30" touring car; Mr. A. M. Dunn of Turlock, a Cole "30" touring and Dr. F. D. Johnson of Oakland, a Cole "30" touring car.

The automobile truck has proved its worth to Uncle Sam, as not only a time saver but also as the most economical means of transporting the great amount of freight handled. In this city the Quartermaster's Department uses a Packard Truck. After the usual careful consideration of the tire equipment that the government always gives, Diamond Spliceless Wire Mesh Base Tires were awarded the order. With the two Packard Trucks in use by the Quartermaster 500,000 pounds of freight are hauled per month at a cost of 56 cents per ton.

The Haynes Auto Sales Co. are advised that a Model "Y" seven passenger Haynes touring car is due to arrive in San Francisco from the Haynes factory very shortly. Although this Model "Y" has been in use for some time in the East, it has not yet made appearance on the local market. Except for greater power and size it is built along the same general lines as this season's five passenger machine.

Perhaps the most perilous trip ever taken by an automobile in California was successfully accomplished by O. K. Parker of Los Angeles when he drove a 30 horsepower White gasoline car to the top of Mt. Lowe, a feat never before undertaken.

Expert salesmen skilled in handling high grade motor cars in New England territory are talking about the unusual record of sales of cars above medium price just made by the Boston branch of The Thomas B. Jeffery Company. C. P. Rockwell, manager for the Rambler people in New England, claims this record for his organization. For the ninety-five calendar days, from January 26 to April 30, inclusive, this branch sold ninety-six cars, each one a definite order—no stock orders among them. In the ninety-five calendar days above mentioned there were fourteen Sundays and two legal holidays, leaving seventy-nine working days in which to sell ninety-six cars. The average price of the Rambler is in the neighborhood of $3,000. In spite of satisfactory Rambler sales in other sections, Boston holds the record.

No tedious trudging from house to house for H. P. Mumma, letter carrier No. 5 of Riverside, Cal. Mr. Mumma uses a Maxwell car. The automobile not only enables him to do his work in more comfort but also to do more work in less time.

According to advices received by F. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company an important change has been made in the selling arrangement of the Lozier cars in Brooklyn, N. Y. Heretofore Brooklyn business has been conducted through the Manhattan branch, but in the future a Brooklyn company will act as the selling agents for the Lozier cars in Brooklyn. This is due to increase of business.

A Rollicking Farce

Here's a rollicking farce, "The Haunted Pajamas," and if haunted isn't precisely the adjective which describes the enchantment, it isn't going to make a bit of difference, provided the reader is in the mood to enjoy such an inconsequent piece of pure fun. There is neither hero nor heroine, properly speaking, though there is a love-interest which culminates in a marriage—if that is a happy ending nowadays. The story itself is absurd enough, but it is doubly so when told by Dickey Lightnut, for Lightnut who has had abundant initial assistance from Nature, has deliberately set to work to model himself on the Dundreary pattern of British assininity, and the success which has crowned his efforts leaves one in doubt whether the perfection of his performance does not argue at least a modicum of brains. In any case, Dickey is a good deal more of a man than he himself suspects, despite—"You know—that sort of thing." Whether Roland Masterman knew what he was up to when he sent the mysterious garments to Lightnut doesn't make any difference, for with that he drops out of the story. He was a casual acquaintance in London, with a penchant for delving into physical phenomena and occultism, and having succeeded in securing a coveted post in Hong Kong, he sent to Lightnut, apparently as a graceful acknowledgment of courtesy, a suit of fine crimson silk pajamas. Instead of being of modern manufacture, as the recipient assumed, they were really of remarkable antiquity, some twenty-six centuries earlier than the Christian era, and they had been put under a spell by which, whenever donned, three mysterious transformations took place. They took at once the size and shape adapted to the wearer, they changed their brilliant hue for black, and the wearer was transformed in appearance into someone who, at some previous time, had worn them, the changes, however, being visible only to others, not to the one affected, and as the character and demeanor were unaltered, the incongruity of behavior added to the complexity. Small wonder then, that the devoted Jenkins, roused from his sleep and coming to see if all was well with his mild-mannered employer, was staggered at finding a villainous looking Mongolian comfortably smoking an opium pipe in his favorite chair. Equally disconcerting was Lightnut's experience when, having agreed to put up the rackety younger brother of his friend, Billings, for a night, he returns from his club to find not a hobbledyhoy youth, but a beautiful and refined-appearing girl whose actions and accounts of her escapades are decidedly out of keeping and whose scatter-witted brother comes in for some mighty objurgations for his lack of sense in sending "the kid" to a bachelor's apartment. These are only samples of what could and did take place and a mere hint at the complications brought about without any one's having the slightest suspicion of the transformations, much less their cause, to say nothing of the further mistakes growing out of a confusion of names and identities. There's an enormous fortune in rubies tangled up with the weave, too, but since Francis Perry Elliott has taken the trouble to spin such an intricate plot he ought to be allowed to tell it in his own way. Don't mistake this for a serious effort gone astray. It was designed as a frolic and as such it is a decided success From the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

Book Notes

Robert Alexander Wason, author of "Happy Hawkins" and "The Steering Wheel," once had aspirations towards an army life. It was something more than a score of years ago, when the policy of West Point was to keep the supply of prospective offices down to the probable demand, and entrance examinations were planned with the deliberate intention of cinching out as many applicants as possible and conducted in circumstances which would virtually insure failure. One part of the test consisted of writing an account of a siege in the middle west, an abstract from a reading made by one of the officers. The story was filled with technical terms unknown to any one who had not been coached in advance, and the future author "fell back on phonetic spelling and undying hopes," neither of which were of any assistance. A band performed under the windows and a company of cadets drilled within sight. The applicant failed in spelling and writing. Small wonder! Later on Mr. Wason, like Jack London, took to the road, being inspired by a series of tramp stories published in the magazines. Not only did he propose to go a tramping, but he enlisted a dozen of his friends, all of whom backed out before the date of starting, and the senior Wasons fervently hoped their own hopeful would do likewise, but he persevered, and part of the results of his experiences and observations is recorded in "Happy Hawkins."

Persistence

John Lane, the well-known publisher, said at a literary dinner in New York:

"As an editor I find nobody so persistent as the amateur contributor. If the amateur were half as ingenious in writing his material as in trying to land it he would become a Dickens in no time.

"An amateur said the other day to an editor I know:

"'Allow me to submit this bear story.'

"'My readers don't care for bear stories," said the editor. 'They want something spicy.'

"'But this,' said the amateur, 'is a story about a cinnamon bear.'"

Marks—I induced the hotel keeper to go to church with me this morning, and he declared that one of the hymns sung just suited his business.

Parks—What hymn was it?

Marks—"Abide With Me."

A Change of Opinion

Governor Woodrow Wilson confesses that he has changed his opinion about the referendum and recall, but unfortunately he doesn't tell us his reason for doing so. Thus in a speech in Norfolk he said: "For twenty years I preached to the students of Princeton that the referendum and recall were bosh. I have since investigated and I want to apologize to those students." This is a fine specimen of candor. It indicates that Governor Wilson is not cursed with the pride of opinion. Perhaps he is deserving of praise for confessing error. Change of opinion is the progress of human thought and sound knowledge. Often what appears to be inconsistency is in reality growth and expansion. It is only the fool that perseveres in his errors. On the other hand the opinions of some men depend very much on public opinion, which, according to an eminent philosopher, "is always pressing upon the mind and like the air we breathe acts unseen, unfelt." Woodrow Wilson may have been cast in a soft, susceptible mould. His enthusiasms may be fickle and treacherous. He may be one of those capricious persons whose violent revulsions of judgment are in their own motives, rather than in the reason of things; whose opinions depend on their lives and habits. Goethe expressed this idea epigrammatically when he said, "As our inclinations, so our opinions." Governor Wilson has experienced a change of life, as it were; and at the same time a change of inclinations, which may unconsciously have effected the substitution of opinion for conviction. When he was preaching to the students of Princeton he had no thought of the White House; of anything, presumably, but the truth. Now he is preoccupied with his own interests, and he appears to be catering to popular whim. His confession, if impressive, is singularly incomplete. He would have us believe that his change of opinion about the referendum and the recall was the result of investigation, thereby implying that in the days of his preaching he was uninformed and thus reflecting grave discredit on himself and seeming to vindicate the rumor that the man who now aspires to the executive office of a great nation was a failure in the profession for which he had been trained. If Woodrow Wilson was engaged for twenty years in inculcating a principle of government which he never investigated, which he had accepted on faith alone, then he is a man whose claims on public confidence are not to be seriously considered. He presents himself to us now in the attitude of a penitent sinner, asking not merely for our indulgence but for our favor and our trust. What proof does he give us that he has investigated the principle of the referendum and the recall? To investigate a principle of government is to investigate the experience of mankind, to study the progress of human affairs which has been certain and inevitable because of obvious principles of human nature. This investigation and study may be made at first hand. From history we may learn of the perpetual intestine struggle between Authority and Liberty, and how the science of government has attempted to prevent either from prevailing. Or the investigation and study may be made at second hand through the comments, deductions and speculations of philosophers who will be found to agree that there are certain fundamental principles of government which must be recognized in every State. Now there is a prodigious amount of material elucidative of the very principle which Governor Woodrow Wilson says he has investigated, and it would be a most excellent achievement on his part were he to utilize some of it in support of an argument to justify his change of opinion. So far we have had nothing but opinion on this subject from the proponents of the recall and referendum. And the language of their opinion is almost identical with the language employed in several widely separated periods of the world's history by politicians more deserving of the execration than the applause of their countrymen.

A Wail from Oregon

Perhaps Governor Wilson though a scholar and student does not agree with those philosophers who tell us that the past departs not, the truth never dies but works through endless changes. Perhaps it is not his practice to glean out of the dark backward and abysm of time grave warnings for the future or to derive from errors that are dead live lessons for the present. Perhaps he prefers to borrow enlightenment from moderns than from the ancients. Thus peradventure his study of the recall and referendum may have been confined to the current experience of men in several of the States of this glorious union. If this be so it is not improbable that he has been led astray from neglecting the maxims of common prudence. For the referendum and recall have not been thoroughly tested in the modern workshop of practical politics, and it would be rash indeed for any man to conclude that as it is not apparent that they have done any harm the underlying principle of them is not to be challenged. The new remedy that is worse than the disease is not always found to be fatal immediately after the first experiments. What testimony is to be had at this time regarding the contrivances approved by Governor Wilson is by no means of a character to justify jubilation on the part of our progressive statesmen. Politicians intent upon vindicating their devotion to the people are bubbling over with enthusiasm for the devices that have realized the ultimate ends of democracy, but nowhere is there evidence of popular ecstacy. On the contrary there are symptoms of reaction even among progressives. As for example comes a wail from Oregon, the most progressive of all progressive States, the abiding place of Modernism in politics, the seat of political sweetness and light to which every prophet of innovation points with pride and gratification. We find in the Oregonian, on the same page with a panegyric of Woodrow, the melancholy lament that the Legislature has gone to the demnition bow-bows, that it has lost its representative character, gone down in public estimation and does nothing but shift, dissemble and sidestep. Yet the Oregonian is not reactionary. It has faith in the intelligence of the people as well as in the sincerity of Woodrow Wilson.

When Harlan Concurred

Some pretty harsh criticism has been visited on Justice Harlan for his gratuitous comments in dissenting from the opinion in the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust cases. It is considered unfortunate that he should have expressed sentiments most gratifying to those critics of the judiciary who would have the people believe that the Supreme Court is disposed to veto legislation and thus usurp the powers of a coordinate branch of the government. He certainly talked as though he was in a most querulous mood, and his remarks so strongly flavored as they were with dogmatism and arrogance, were, to say the least, far from philosophical. To account for his sentiments it has been suggested that he has been peeved at not having been chosen for the exalted honor bestowed on his associate Justice White. But Justice Harlan is a very old man, and it is given to but few men to retain placidity of temper at the extreme age which he has reached. And now that he is on the far edge of his declining years after long, arduous and honorable service that entitles him to respect and indulgence, it is hardly generous to challenge the sincerity of his opinions. At the same time it is important that attention should be called to the fact that the Supreme Court did nothing more than enunciate an established principle of law when it asserted that the judicial function included the right to interpret statutes in the light of reason and to refuse a literal application of the words of a statute where they would involve a manifest wrong. The truth is that Justice Harlan himself is on record as approving this view of the judicial function. In the case of Church of the Holy Trinity versus United States reported in 143 U. S. 457, the court had under consideration the act of Congress known as the alien immigration act. Justice Brewer wrote the opinion in which all his associates including Justice Harlan concurred. "It is a familiar rule," said Justice Brewer, "that a thing may be within the letter of the statute and not within the statute because not within the spirit nor within the intention of its makers. This has been often asserted and the reports are full of cases illustrating its application. This is not the substitution of the will of the judge for that of the legislator, for frequently words of general meaning are used in a statute, words broad enough to include an act in question and yet a consideration of the whole legislation, or of the circumstances surrounding its enactment, or of the absurd results which follow from giving such broad meaning to the words, make it unreasonable to believe that the legislators intended to include the particular act." Here certainly is the doctrine of reasonable interpretation. Justice Harlan in this case concurs in the broad principle that an act within the express language of a statute is not affected by it when it is not within the intention of Congress. From this decision it is obvious that no new principle was introduced by the rule of construction adopted in the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust cases, the rule of reading general words in a statute by the light of reason.

Oracles of Criticism

A curious new school of so-called literary critics is attaining great prominence in this country. Its performances are a compound of preciosity, sentimentalism and metaphysics. The critics of this school are engaged in expounding some of the decadent and mystic writers of recent years,—such men as Nietzsche, Pater, Wilde, Ibsen and Shaw. Their work is not criticism at all, but it passes as such. To criticism in its true sense it has no claim even to approximation. Literary or artistic merit is a matter of minor consideration from their standpoint. The purpose which they affect is to explain the attitude of a writer toward life and this they do by torturing the most obvious expressions into a thousand meanings. They have no hesitation in identifying an author with his characters for the purpose of drawing the conclusion that his sentiments were precisely those uttered by his puppets. Thus we find Professor Archibald Henderson, who is described in Current Literature as a "brilliant critic of modernity," arguing that in Meredith's philosophy a man ought to take "a pagan joy in the clean play of his senses." Professor Henderson knows this is what Meredith believed because one of Meredith's characters remarks, "I am not to follow any impulse that is not the impulse of all my nature—myself altogether." Professor Henderson is typical of his school, of the school that presumes to tell us the precise significance to be attached to Nietzsche's conception of the Superman, but leaves us in doubt as to whether the Superman is a problem of history or eugenics, or as to whether Nietzsche was a biological philosopher like Spencer or merely a pessimist like Schopenhauer. The critics of this school have great admiration for the writers that rail at the world and sneer at Christian morality, most of whom were diseased with their self-importance. The critics themselves appear to be similarly afflicted. Their writings abound in egotisms and affectations. They reel off a prodigious lot of nonsense as though it embodied the articles of a creed, and while their style is in spots lively and engaging, all of them have the same habit of thinking in superlatives, expressing themselves in superlatives, indulging in silly paradoxes, tinsel epigrams and glittering generalities. Yet they must have a following, else the unsentimental publishers wouldn't handle their wares.

A Pulpy Question

There is no study more interesting than that of the passions and motives of men gradually unfolding themselves in new situations. This study is now afforded by the current drama on the stage of national politics which has the reciprocity agreement for motif and "Battle Bob" La Follette as the figure of central interest. "Battle Bob" has reached a perilous point in his flashlight career. But yesterday the adored idol of the plain, unvarnished and unsophisticated masses, the gonfalonier of all the radicals; today, (at least at this writing) "viewed with suspicion" by the avowed patrons and admirers of genuine patriotism, threatened with anathema by the newspaper heralds, outriders and trumpeters in the procession of fame. As "Battle Bob" is distinctly a newspaper-made hero the question apparently about to preoccupy attention is whether like the monster in the story he is able to defy his maker. For years "Battle Bob" has served the purposes of the muckrakers, a close affinity existing between their mode of reasoning and his. As their spokesman they have held him up to public admiration; they have bowed to him as to truth itself. From them we have learned that the welfare of millions often hung suspended as he spoke. They have widely disseminated the assurance that his rectitude was inflexible. They have guaranteed his purity, affirmed his freedom from every selfish motive. They have explored the labyrinths of his grey matter and certified to his extraordinary capacity, going so far as to assert that he excelled his contemporaries in the Senate in quickness of apprehension, in the extent of his knowledge, in the clearness and distinctness of his views. In short they have pictured the little man from Wisconsin as the glory of his country, as a statesman with an intuitive perception of every political question in all its bearings and consequences, whether of commerce or agriculture, of political economy or of foreign or domestic policy. And now they appear to be intent on his undoing. And why? Because he joined hands with Senator Root in support of the amendment to keep the tariff on wood pulp. Now wood pulp is the reason of the enthusiasm of the press for reciprocity. Free wood pulp means reduction of the high cost of paper. It means more money in the coffers of the newspaper trust. President Taft shrewdly appealed to the cupidity of the great American despots of public opinion when he included wood pulp in his reciprocity agreement, and hence the great change that has occurred in the attitude of the press toward the President whom even the insurgent papers are now conceding to be the logical candidate of the Republican party. When "Battle Bob" voted for the Root amendment in the committee meeting he did the most courageous thing in his whole career; he defied the daily press of the whole country. Yet for this act his motives, for the first time, are questioned by his most ardent sponsors. And now the newspaper bludgeon is swinging before his eyes. The Hearst papers are growling ominously. They accuse La Follette of voting for the amendment to spite the President. Though no meaner motive could be attributed to any statesman the Hearst papers do more than charge La Follette with meanness; they frankly intimate that unless he recants he will be made a target of abuse. "This paper," says the Examiner, in an editorial addressed to La Follette, "has been with you in many battles for the public right. And it would be gladly with you in many more. But it cannot be with you in the way you are going." What this implies "Battle Bob" will have no difficulty in perceiving. The outer darkness for him henceforth with occasional bolts from the central blue of journalism to sear and scorch and scarify. "Battle Bob" must make his choice. The paramount question for him to decide is whether he shall act according to his own persausions or according to the dictates of the self-constituted tribune of the people.

Adoration

Dear, they are praising your beauty,
The grass and the sky:
The sky in a silence of wonder,
The grass in a sigh.

I too would sing for your praising,
Dearest, had I
Speech as the whispering grass,
Or the silent sky.

These have an art for the praising
Beauty so high.
Sweet, you are praised in a silence,
Sung in a sigh.

A Compliment

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Do you know that one of our papers down here has been paying you a compliment? It is quite a pretty compliment, but to save your modesty from too great a shock the boost is lovingly intertwined with a knock. In a recent editorial the editor of the Santa Cruz News wrote: "Town Talk of San Francisco—which, by the way, is one of the most cleverly-written papers in the State, though its point of view is not always commendable—" etc. It must warm the cockles of your editorial heart to scan the first half of that phrase; but how depressing to read the second half! Of course no paper is worth its salt unless its viewpoint is at all times commendable to all people. I need not tell you that we have that paragon of journalism down here I refer of course to the News which never makes a mistake or an error in judgment and is always on the right side of every question. I don't have to prove this because the editor of the News will admit it

Some Trick Verses

Is your Hibernian still hungering for verses? Here's a specimen of Revolutionary poetry which, read as printed, is condemnatory of the American cause, but if only the words to the right of the comma in each line are read, and then those to the left, the Revolutionary cause is encouraged and commended.

Hark! hark! the trumpet sounds, the din of war's alarms,
O'er seas and solid grounds, doth call us all to arms;
Who for King George doth stand, their honors soon shall shine:
Their ruin is at hand, who with the Congress join
The acts of Parliament, in them I much delight,
I hate their cursed intent, who for the congress fight:
The Tories of today, they are my daily toast;
They soon shall sneak away, who independence boast;
Who non-resistance hold, they have my hand and heart,
May they for slaves be sold, who act a Whiggish part;
On Mansfield, North and Bute, may daily blessings pour,
Confusion and dispute, on congress evermore.
To North and British lord, may honors still be done,
I wish a block or cord, to General Washington.

Making cento verses used to be a popular evening amusement, each line selected from some different poem. This "Remembrance of Minstrelsy," now some forty years old or more, was concocted from the lines of songs which had their vogue then or thereabouts Most of them are long since forgotten

There was a frog lived in a spring,
He kissed me a fond adieu.
Together let us sweetly sing
With the dark girl dressed in blue

She wore a wreath of roses;
Her bright smile haunts me still;
And her big chignon pinned on behind
With the sword of Bunker Hill

Good bye, John, don't stay long,
Then you'll remember me
Molly, put the kettle on,
My barque is on the sea.

Hark, I hear an angel sing.
Shoo fly, don't bother me!
O love, it is a ticklish thing,
Upon the dark blue sea.

Respectfully submitted,
—A Reader

A Slight Difference

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: The progressive press, so-called, notably Collier's Weekly, is busy extolling the sterling virtues, the rugged honesty and the judicial wisdom of Justice Harlan of the Supreme Court. This echo of approval is due doubtless to that jurist's dissenting opinion in the Standard Oil case. Justice Harlan believed that his associates read into the Anti-trust Law elements which the lawmaking body had omitted He maintained that legally this could not be done as the function of the Court was judicial not legislative. And so paeans of praise have gone up for this upright judge. You will remember how these same papers, and again notably Collier's Weekly, vilified our State Supreme Court for failing to read into the Schmitz indictment elements it did not contain. It might be well in this connection for Collier's Weekly and the others to read these words of Justice Harlan in concluding his dissent: "Mr. Justice Bradley wisely said when on this bench that illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of legal proceedure. We shall do well to heed the warning of that great jurist."

Sincerely,
—A Layman

The Infallible Philosopher

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: When I behold the suffragettes and the anti-suffragettes waging war about the comparative merits of man and woman and hurling such authorities as Lecky and Buckle and De Quincey at one another, I cannot refrain from quoting what a better seasoned philosopher had to say on the subject. These are the closing lines of Montaigne's great essay "Upon Some Verses of Virgil:" "I say that males and females are cast in the same mold and that, education and usage excepted, the difference is not great. Plato indifferently invites both the one and the other to the society of all studies, exercises and vocations, both military and civil, in his commonwealth; and the philosopher Antisthenes rejected all distinction between their virtue and ours. It is much more easy to accuse one sex than to excuse the other; 'tis according to the saying, 'The Pot and the Kettle.'"

Sincerely yours,
—Neutral.

XXVI—THEODORE ROBERTS

By Edward F. O'Day

"Why, thirty-one years ago I saw Ristori play Lady Macbeth at the old California Theater in a hoopskirt. I remember how I admired the graceful way in which she glided across the stage in that hoop. But imagine an actress playing Lady Macbeth in a hoopskirt today!"

I tried to imagine Modjeska and Nance O'Neil and Julia Marlowe, the most important Lady Macbeths it has been my luck to see, moving through the part in hoops. But my imagination responded feebly. It found especial difficulty swathing Nance O'Neil in crinoline, for crinoline is as foreign to Nance as the jupe culotte. But it was not merely the weakness of imagination which bothered me. The truth is, I was distracted. I was not paying proper attention to Theodore Roberts' words because I was preoccupied with Theodore Roberts' face.

"Theodore Roberts is the man in the iron mask," I said to myself. Yes, the fancy is not entirely frivolous. That powerful face is truly an iron mask concealing a personality which may be iron or may be velvet, for aught I know. One doesn't pierce masks during a half-hour chat in the living room of a Hyde street apartment house. Still, at intervals he lifted the mask a little bit. The piercing eyes of him would focus their steady glitter in an unwinking stare and then flame suddenly into a smile. The prognathous jaw, closed like a trap on his cigar holder, would unfasten for a moment to let a laugh glide through. At such instances the iron of Theodore Roberts was transmuted to a softer metal. But take him all in all, here, I should say, is a giant of a man, heavy-treading, heavy-fisted, yet genial withal, a tender giant yet endowed with fierce passions that had better not be aroused.

The mind, when interested, will speculate like this on the scantiest data and I was so wrapped up in my speculations that it required an effort to carry my thoughts back to the hoopskirts of Ristori and the conditions which they were dragged forth from the property room of Theodore Roberts' memory to illustrate.

He was harking back to the past. Why not? Actors would not be actors if they did not love the glories that have faded into history. And then too, Theodore Roberts is a San Franciscan. We are a retrospective town. Roberts journeyed into the past of the old town a few days ago—to the past which concerned him most, to the corner of Washington and Stockton streets where he was born.

"Where the old house stood," he regretted, "there is now a combination of Mexican adobe and joss house."

The alien Chink had struck hands with the original Greaser and the Gringo felt a little sore.

But immediately he was the man in the iron mask again, discoursing of less personal matters.

"My memory of the theater goes back thirty-six years," he said. "I recall when John McCullough and Lawrence Barrett were at the old California, playing 'Venice Preserved' and 'The Wife: a Tale of Mantua' and 'The Honeymoon.' Such plays would be impossible today. The plots were impossible. 'Queen Elizabeth' or 'Mary Stuart' wouldn't be acceptable now. 'Jim the Penman' had to be blue-pencilled before we presented it last week and still it creaked in places."

I filipped his critical faculty with the old familiar question, the inevitable question that goes as naturally with all mention of the old California as mustard goes with an Englishman's roast beef or as trouble with an appointment to the Police Commission.

"No," he asseverated, gripping his cigar-holder more tightly than before, if such a thing was possible, "no, the actors in those days were not better than the actors of today. As a matter of fact acting today is better than ever before in the history of the world, the old timer with his prate of the palmy days to the contrary notwithstanding. No actor towers today over his fellows as Booth did in those days, but that is because the plain has risen to the mountain top, not because the mountain top has descended to the plain."

Again I put the obvious query.

"The reason of the improvement? Electricity. Electricity has produced the principal changes that have come over the stage. It has caused a revolution.

THEODORE ROBERTS

"In the old Baldwin we had gas—gas bunch lights, gas footlights and gas borders in shields of wire netting. The scenes were shoved on and off when a whistle blew and the audience could see the heels of the stage hands. But when electricity came in we got strips of lights lit by the thumb of the gas man. A twist of the wrist did everything.

"The consequence is that we can get effects now that we couldn't get before. We can play certain scenes which there was no possibility of playing before. The picture is more perfect. The actor is truer to life. And the play must be correct emotionally and chronologically.

"We used to say that with a slouch hat, a pair of top boots and a roll of cloth an actor could dress for any part. We used to chalk a line down the boot to make it look highly polished. You could do that with gas light. But you can't shine a black boot with white chalk nowadays. Electricity makes shams impossible. You could conceal many things with gas, but now the stage picture must be an almost microscopic picture of life. Everything must be genuine. Stage money is rarely used. There was a time when an actress made all her clothes of cheese cloth or farmer's satin; now she spends thousands on her gowns. They make the opera glasses too well. And the public is too well informed."

And yet, with all this, Roberts says that there has not been much change in the mode of enacting the old roles. There is the part of Baradas, for instance, in "Richelieu." That was Roberts' first part when he made his first appearance as an actor at the Baldwin in 1880. Tradition still dictates the way in which such roles are played.

Tom Maguire of the old Opera House was running the Baldwin when Roberts went there. In the stock company were Frederick de Belleville, James A. Herne, Catherine Corcoran, Harry Edwards and John Jennings, nearly all dead but still fresh in the memories of old San Franciscans. But the "Richelieu" company was a special company and it included James O'Neill, Lewis Morrison, (afterwards the husband of Florence Roberts, Theodore's cousin), John Wilson, A. D. Bradley, James O. Barrows, Rose Wood, Adeline Stanhope and Louise Beaudet.

Roberts left this city to join Robson and Crane in Chicago. He traveled through the East and Northwest with these famous comedians and after some time in New York came back to barnstorm up and down the Pacific Coast.

"We played on the stumps of trees, in hotel dining roms, in tents," he said. "I was leading man for Nellie Boyd who was well known in her day. She made a great deal of money and settled down in Fresno where she died about a year ago."

Roberts gave his cousin Florence a lot of her early training

"I was the leading man of a company organized here to play through the South. We played Los Angeles and San Diego but we didn't have much success. Florence played 'bits.' She was very nervous and frightened at first. I remember when we gave 'Fanchon.' I was playing Father Barbeau and she was Mother Fadet. She was so nervous she couldn't speak and in one scene, when I turned to her with a stern face and roared at her, 'Look at me!' she ran off the stage and it was quite a while before she had enough courage to reappear."

Of course Roberts has written plays. The iron mask dropped a little when I asked about them.

"None of them have seen the light of day yet," he confessed, "but I sometimes torture my friends with them. I have one that I think is excellent, but so far I haven't impressed any body with my idea of it. I would like to produce it here or in Los Angeles after our present season, but as I haven't the money myself I would have to get somebody to go halves with me. And I am not putting too much trust in it. I have presided at the burial of too many plays in my years on the stage. You never know what's going to happen till the curtain goes up on the first night."

I didn't commit myself, but I have a hunch that the man behind the iron mask might write a corking good drama. I wish him luck anyway, if only because he's one of us. In such matters at least San Franciscans can stand together.

The Red Barque

By Antonio Beltramelli (From the Italian)

Ardi was a sailor; his name was one of bronze in the legends of seamen. Fearless and proud, silent and strong as the very rocks, he steered his barque through the wildest tempests, watchful at the helm and ready with the sail, amidst the clouds and the wind and the seething waters.

When on land, he lived in a thatched cottage with his young son, Rimuel, and love shared it with them. His wife, whom Ardi had adored with all the ardor of a first love, died in giving birth to Rimuel, and since that day twenty years had passed, long and endless as a chain of grief, for the sailor had a constant heart and knew nothing of the tears that blot out remembrance.

Rimuel was fair and straight as a ship's mast, stronger even than the dusky cables that coiled and twisted in the depths of the sea. He loved nothing and no one but the proud man who gave him bread, and the little red barque, decked out with its yellow sails. His dream was of silences and unknown lands, looming out of the distant mists.

There was a rough, tenacious affection between the two men, neither sentimental nor impulsive, but expressing itself in a constant mutual respect, in their thoughtfulness for one another, in smiles and fleeting words at parting, when one or the other was to embark upon the sea. For their simple life they were very well off; none of the other fishermen, or sailors, possessed so much. A house and a barque are like a kingdom without boundaries.

Ardi and Rimuel realized their good fortune and spent the years in working, so there was never a lack of bread; they desired nothing else, neither the sombre man, who was like a storm spectre, nor Rimuel in the serenity of his youth.

For all that, it was the gossip of the old men and women, as they sat mending their nets upon their doorsteps facing the sea, that the two had been born under a May moon, when each day brings its own blessing and the promise of every gift that the fates can offer.

Uriana heard this repeated regularly in the evenings, when Ardi, springing from his barque, would pass before the cottages on the shore; and every evening she would raise her dark eyes, watching until he appeared, the fearless, handsome fellow, who never once had turned to glance at her. He seemed always absorbed in some fixed thought, his face rigid in an impenetrable silence. She would remain motionless, transfixed by her love, gazing at the point where Ardi had disappeared, forgetful of the ragged nets that lay across her knees: Uriana, who was so beautiful, so spirited, that the young men had nicknamed her "The Flame."

So it had been every evening for a long time, and the girl knew in her heart that the power of Ardi had made her his slave.

Although so ardent and impulsive, Uriana had never responded to any man, for she despised those who were humble towards her. Her passionate soul required an iron will to hold her in the power of its suggestion; eyes to gaze into her own, fixed, immovable, gleaming, terrible in their insistence: so to be mastered, compelled to her martyrdom, herself the slave of her own love.

She longed to be as the sail passing through a sudden gust, conscious of the dominating influence before abandoning itself. Meanwhile she continued to mend her nets, silently, listening to the tales of the old men and women as they sat on their doorsteps, facing the eastern sun and the sea. She had renounced everything, living for his scorn alone (which to the bitter soul is like a faithful companion) and with her warm, rich voice, low with its tone of bronze, she sang softly to herself the songs that are born of love.

So a long time passed. She was twenty-five, in the bloom of her youth, and it was no sorrow to her, this continual renunciation of pleasure, for she was as the flame that twists and writhes, scintillating, stretching out its curling tongue as if to caress the air that gives it life.

She cared nothing for her beauty. Her room was bare, except for a bed of straw, and an old wooden chest, in which lay her few garments and the white linen sheets that her mother had left for her marriage day; not a single object of even the simplest luxury; not a mirror, not a drop of perfume. She wore a white zendado, drawn over the shoulders and crossed at the breast; it fell at her feet, softening the bold curves of her figure, adding grace to her beautiful carriage. Her red curly hair, encircling her face like a coronet, was in violent contract to the snowy whitness of the silk; when she ran in the sun, it seemed to flame up suddenly like a phosphorescence. Her face was oval, with exquisite lines; the eyes large, ashen-gray, with black shadows about them; they were never animated with the gay thoughtlessness that leads youth into the customary paths of love. She was like the wind that subsides only in the highest mountains: her soul convulsed and passionate, longed for its yoke.

At twenty-five, she was as the dawn of day. And yet, ever before her mind was the vision of Ardi, with whom she had never spoken. At first, through the tales of the old people, who exalted him, he had seemed to her as one of the heroic figures of antiquity, the mighty sailors of the past, whose souls rise out of the wintry mists upon the sea, amid the howling of the waves, encircled by the flying sea-gulls. As the silent days passed, her fantasy was ever weaving fresh marvels about the man and his bravery, until she was seized with an uncontrollable longing which drove her, in the sudden crisis that takes possession of certain strange souls, to betray herself to him and drag him with her into the whirlpool of her passion.

One evening, exasperated by the long waiting, her blood inflamed, her desires multiplying like waves lashed by the hurricane, she summoned her courage. When the man passed, whom she had chosen for herself out of all the world, she abandoned her nets, binding her zendado about her, and followed him cautiously with a beating heart.

Yet, when the momment came to approach him, her heart failed her. She felt that no sound would come from her lips, that Ardi would only laugh at her. What did the little red fool want of him? Why was she so pale and trembling as if she were cold? In her heart, she feared that he would treat her as a child, with the same good-humored indulgence. She was afraid, Uriana, with the dark eyes that were the color of ashes, and she followed Ardi, silently, heedless of the passersby, who stopped and stared after her.

She went so for some little distance, torn between her impulses and her fears; her blood surged madly. He was nearing his home, she would not be able to speak to him that evening after all. Yet all of a sudden, her voice, in two leaps as it were, called twice:

"Ardi! Ardi!"

Then the hair on her head rose with terror.

"Ah! it is you, Uriana! I did not recognize you. It is growing dark. What can I do for you, beautiful Uriana?"

She listened to him, strangely, with her eyes fixed, almost as if she were hearing from his lips all the tumult of passionate words that were passing through her own mind. And when Ardi looked at her, with the questioning air of a stranger, she was oppressed as with a weight on her heart, and knew not how to break the painful silence.

"Are you ill?" continued Ardi.

She had only breath to reply feebly:

"No!"

"You are pale and trembling," the sailor added gravely. "Look at yourself, Uriana, illness is on your face like a shadow."

She was silent for a moment or two, then she said faintly: "May I ask a favor of you?"

"What is it?"

"Chiuravi would like to borrow your nets. His are broken and I have not been able to mend them. Will you lend them?"

"Certainly. Do you need them at once?"

"Yes."

"Then come with me."

"I am coming," replied Uriana.

And they went on.

They walked along the quay, amidst the tangle of fishing boats that were anchored there, and the fires that the sailors had lighted. The air was full of the healthy odor of fish. With the setting of the sun came the fog that throws a shadow of unreality over everything. The old sails, the masts, the lines of rigging, the strong, projecting prows and the red fires loomed dimly, silently, out of the unknown.

Uriana had all the illusions of a dream. She walked beside Ardi, believing that he was leading her to some distant place of love; and when from a black barque, sailless, with its short, broken mast, that had yet within it a last glimmer of life, came the rhythm of a love song, she turned to her tall companion, laid her hand upon his arm and smiled.

"It is Gera," she said. "The more Fate pursues him, the more he sings. The sea has shattered his boat, Death has taken his two beautiful sons, his wife abandoned him last summer to follow a stranger, not a soldo is left to him, he has a trouble with his eyes that will probably rob him of the best that is in life, and Gera sings! So he will continue to sing, until he dies! Love has not abandoned him."

Uriana let her hand fall slowly from the arm of Ardi. He had not grasped her meaning.

They reached his cottage; she waited on the doorstep until the sailor returned with the nets and handed them to her, saying: "Take them and keep them as long as you like." She bowed her head, and without replying, hurried on along the quay, the voice of the poor unfortunate, undaunted by his sufferings, still floating across it.

After that Ardi met her in his path more than once, and noticing the insistence of her gaze, he wondered what bitterness and grief had taken possession of the soul of Uriana. And one evening, when he had leaped upon his barque,

Greek at Oxford

After interminable discussions the professional teaching circle at Oxford has decided that henceforward students taking the scientific and mathematical course at the university may cut Greek entirely. There has been much indignation expressed at this innovation. It remained for the Saturday Review of London to sound a note of sadness. "If the scientist likes to be a Barbarian," says the Review, "well, let him. He is concerning himself with big and recondite things; he usually must be a specialist of specialists. But that the mass of the gentlemen of England, especially those who are to take up the amusement —or, as we must now say, follow the trade—of governing the country, should lack humanity, is anathema. We do not admire the selfish luxury of the arch-Hellenist who cares not what happen outside so long as he and one or two others can go on refining on Euripides undisturbed in their corner." In other words the Review thinks that Greek, though not too much Greek, is essential to the education of a gentleman. How old-worldly and old-fashioned that view must appear to an American rah-rah!

To Abolish "Yoshiwara"

There is a strong sentiment among certain classes in Tokio against the reconstruction of "Yoshiwara," the gigantic bagnio run under governmental supervision. The "Yoshiwara" was burned down not very long ago and there is a strong demand that the system which it represented be abolished. A meeting was held in the auditorium of the Tokio Y. M. C. A. and the hall was filled with earnest men and women, both Japanese and foreigners. As illustrating the spread of occidental ways in the orient the discussion has an interest altogether apart from its intrinsic importance. A member of the Imperial Diet read a petition which he had drawn up for Mrs. Kaji Yajima who is the president of the W. C. T. U. in Japan. Colonel Yamamuro of the Salvation Army made a speech containing interesting arguments. From the standpoint of humanity he said the system was the worst form of slavery; that the payment in advance on the contracts under which young girls were secured amounted to actual purchase. "America set the black race free by a mighty struggle," said Mr. Yamamuro, "and why not abolish slavery in Japan. The Government says if the licensed quarter is done away with the number of secret resorts will increase, but I say no. There are a great many such places outside of the licensed quarter, especially about Asakusa Park, which is in that vicinity, and since the fire has removed the licensed places the secret places still remaining near that district are not doing business enough to pay, while they flourished when the Yoshiwara was going full blast." Mr. Yamamuro emphasized the objection from the standpoint of health, and continued: "If the Yoshiwara is banished the Government says prosperity will decline. I say No! The money spent in dissipation and licentiousness ought to go for the education of children and for household necessities or luxuries to contribute to the happiness of the home. While some are financially benefited by the system many lose. The revenue the Government derives from this source is like devouring the flesh from one's arm to sustain life. In America nine States have stopped the sale of liquor, ignoring the revenue from this traffic, and why should Japan accept money from the prostitution of her women. From the standpoint of national character any country that allows its young girls to be ravaged for mercenary gain despises womanhood. If Japan is such a nation how can we expect to live? With legitimatized prostitution in their own country young Japanese women go to other countries to pursue the occupation there, which causes trouble to the foreign authorities and puts Japan in world-wide ill repute. The fire has obliterated this noxious spot in Tokio, opening the way to begin and by forbidding its reestablishment here the Government should proceed to banish the system."

The Supply of Affinities

Many fashionable ladies of Bucharest (Roumania) have recently received invitations to join a society known as the "Women's International Free Love League." The league undertakes to put them into communication with kindred spirits who will supply the deficiencies of husbands who fail to understand the complex nature of their wives. The league's motto is "Equal Rights for All," and ladies are assured that the heads of the league will be in a position to put them into communication with their affinities. Ladies are asked to subscribe to the funds of the league whether they are in immediate need of its services or not, as it is impossible to know when such a need may arise. A husband of one of the ladies who received the league's circular put himself into communication with the police. The police traced the circulars to Milan, where it was discovered that a certain Hungarian and her Italian husband were the founders of the league. The woman, questioned by the police, said that the league had thousands of members in every country of the world. She explained that the consolation offered to the ladies was of an entirely spiritual nature, and that her object was merely to supply the demand for sympathy caused by the brutal obtuseness of most husbands. The police decline to take any actions against the league.

Oil-burning Battleships

The final designs for the two battleships, authorized at the late session of Congress, are ready for departmental approval. The plans provide for oil-burning ships, and otherwise a reproduction of the battleships of 1910. The armament consists, in the main battery, of ten fourteen-inch guns, so disposed that there shall be two turrets containing three guns each. This is recognized as an ideal arrangement of turrets, limited to four. It has been decided, after much discussion of the subject, to have additional weight of armor, the heaviest being the fourteen-inch of the main belt. It was suggested that the maximum thickness be as much as seventeen inches, and it is reasonable to suppose that that thickness of armor will eventually be attained if it is desired to have armor really protected. It has been regarded as one of the demonstrations of the firings against the Katahdin and Texas that there must be greater protection with an extension of the armor to a greater under-water area. Most of the features incorporated in the 1910 battleships are retained in the 1911 vessels. There has been no change in the height of the cage-masts or in that of the funnels.

The English Sparrow in Danger

The English sparrow, cordially invited to this country about 1869, is now believed to outnumber any native bird family of the country. As he has outlived his welcome many persons may be glad to hear that a parasite suddenly developed in the neighborhood of the University of Wisconsin does not agree with him. The parasite forms conspicuous cysts in the skin of the English sparrow and is causing considerable mortality among these immigrants in Wisconsin. Indeed Professor Lewis J. Cole of the university writes that possibly the parasite may become one of the means that will help to check the increase of the English sparrow in North America. This impudent alien was introduced here under a misapprehesion. He had won distinction in Europe as an enemy of noxious insects; in his new home he lost his appetite for insects and became largely graminivorous, doing considerable damage to farmers, lording it tyrannically over many native birds, and multiplying at a rate that soon made him a nuisance. There are those who will heartily welcome any parasite that will keep the English sparrow within bounds.

Japan's Emigration Policy

The following is the gist of the emigration policy adopted by the Japanese Government as a result of the conference of Prefectual Secretaries, just held at the Foreign Office. The new Japanese-American treaty will in no way change the policy of restricting the emigration of Japanese people to the mainland of the United States, Hawaii and Canada. The so-called "sending for a wife," which is getting more and more popular, is really marriage contracted by exchange of photographs. The Government will hereafter investigate more strictly the applications of those women who desire to go abroad in this way, because they are often deceived by people abroad seeking to hoodwink the authorities. For the time being the authorities will allow from 100 to 500 men per steamer to proceed to the Philippines, which region is considered as promising for Japanese emigration. Applications of emigrants to Mexico will be granted within a certain limit.

Britain Bans Morocco

The British Government's invitation to Morocco to send a special Ambassador to the coronation of King George has been withdrawn, and the Foreign Office has notified El Mokri, who had been designated to represent Sultan Mulai Hafid, that he will not be received. This action on the part of the British Government is due to the cruelty with which the Sultan's troops treated women and children during the recent troubles at Fez. The soldiers captured many women and girls in the neighboring villages and sold them on the streets of Fez. The action of the British Government sets a precedent in international morals which might be carried to queer extremes under a radical administration.

Older on Dynamiters

Mr. Fremont Older, editor of the Bulletin, does not vouchsafe the readers of that journal the benefit of all his sentiments and opinions. Occasionally he has something to say of peculiar interest to communities in which the Bulletin does not circulate, and then he seeks the most advantageous channels for the dissemination of his thoughts. Thus we find him uttering himself for the edification of the people of Los Angeles through the columns of the California Outlook, the weekly organ of our progressive politicians. "Dynamiters and Dynamiters" is the subject of his discourse the animus of which sticks out between the lines like a sore thumb. Mr. Older is no clear or clarifying soul. His incoherency is so pronounced as to seem studied. You get no glimpse of his thesis till you reach the last paragraph which opens with this sentence: "I am forced to the conclusion in view of the present aspect of public sentiment as I hear it around me that the greater part of the indignation expressed has as a basis hatred of organized labor." Not by most careful examination of all that goes before can one learn how this extraordinary conclusion was forced upon Mr. Older. He offers no analysis of public sentiment. He assumes that the Times building was blown up by dynamiters who did not know "what employes would lose their lives," yet he cannot conceive why the crime should cause indignation unless hatred of organized labor be postulated of the indignant ones. Mr. Older has not expressed himself accurately. It is evident he did not mean to say that any conclusion was forced on him. Rather what he meant to say was that he fashioned the conclusion in advance of the premise and then had a very tough time effecting a reconciliation between them.

The Gallagher Dynamiting

Mr. Older harks back of course to his favorite topic, the graft prosecution, an obsession, which, to his friends is like a tune played on a barrel-organ. Pursuing his prejudices with the narrow pertinacity of a respectable ant he goes to Los Angeles to espouse the cause of men charged with murder not because he believes his friend Burns is executing another frame-up, not because he has any sympathy with the defendants or pity for them, but because he hates Harrison Grey Otis. This is the animus of his discourse. His whole argument is based on the circumstance that the public was not indignant at the dynamiting of Gallagher's house in Oakland. He repeats the old familiar story with which he once strove in vain to rouse the rabble,—that the dynamiting of Gallagher's house was "an endeavor to murder the witness whose testimony was an essential link in certain of the graft cases." And he says that "the newspaper claque for the wealthy criminal class went so far as to accuse William J. Burns of procuring the dynamiting of Gallagher's house." Then he adds: "If my memory serves me the Los Angeles Times repeated this false charge against Burns as it repeated and magnified every false charge against him for his attempting in San Francisco to convict wealthy criminals." There you have a nice concrete example of unconscious self revelation,—of Mr. Older under the dominion of his obsession, frothing at the mouth and raving like a fever patient. The spectacle enables you to estimate how much of sincerity there is in the argument that follows, the argument that as no indignation was manifested by the public when Gallagher's house was blown up it must follow that what passes as indignation in Los Angeles is hatred of organized labor. There is about as much sincerity in this argument as there was in most of the arguments with which Mr. Older and his claque tried to influence public sentiment whenever a fresh frame-up was pulled off in the days that are gone.

A Memorable Clew

The dynamiting of Gallagher's house is a matter the discussion of which, perhaps, somebody very close to Older ought to be eager to discourage at this time. Whether Mr. Older really believes that Gallagher's house was dynamited to eliminate Gallagher as a witness is a question which I will not attempt to solve. My own opinion of the matter is that very close relations existed between the person who inspired the deed and the author of the anonymous letter which the Bulletin published the day after Haas shot Heney. The Bulletin said the letter was found among the unopened mail on Heney's desk. The writer advised Heney to direct Burns to watch in and about Ruef for there were to be sensational developments. According to the Bulletin Detective Burns pronounced the letter genuine and recognized it as a clew. Of course that was before Haas committed suicide. Nothing more was ever said about that clew. It was one of the many strange devices that went into the limbo of forgotten things during that tumultuous period. But what great theatrical effects that letter might have justified had Haas remained in the land of the living! If the dynamiting of Gallagher's house was, technically speaking, a frost, the shooting of Heney about the genuineness of which there could be no dispute, might have suggested a thousand expedients of compelling vraisemblance beyond human power of resistance. But Haas ruined the whole drama in the midst of the first act.

A Celebrated Miracle

To return to the dynamiting of Gallagher's home. It would be interesting to know whether the credulous Older also believes that Gallagher and his family and friends were in the house when the explosion occurred. Apparently so, for he says: "By the merest chance no one of the eight people in the house at the time of the explosion were killed." Mr. Older expressed it somewhat differently in the Bulletin the day after the shooting. He said that it was by "a remarkable freak" that nobody was killed. The Call described that remarkable freak as "a miracle." And it was indeed necessary to employ the miracle hypothesis in explanation of the incident. The room the people were said to have been in was wrecked by the explosion. The furniture was splintered, the walls broken, the chandelier twisted and thrown into an acute angle with the ceiling; yet a few moments after the explosion Gallagher made his appearance without even an abrasion of the skin to show how near he came to death. And still Mr. Older wonders why the public was not wildly indignant! Indeed the self-control of the public on that occasion was such that the conclusion is forced upon Mr. Older that the indignation roused by the killing of a score of people in Los Angeles was phoney. Perhaps if Mr. Older were to freshen his recollection a little he would be inclined to admit that the indifference of the public following the dynamiting of Gallagher's home was quite natural. The miraculous escape of the sweet-scented Gallagher eased the public mind somewhat, and then there was the discovery that some months before the explosion there had been bargaining with a bomb-maker named Wilhelm for the purpose, as he said, "to make a demonstration against Judge Lawlor and bring public sentiment back to the Graft Prosecution." There is but one assertion in all of Mr. Older's article to concur in which I have no difficulty. He says Felix Paudevaris is now wandering about Europe and it is significant that no detectives are searching for him. I am constrained to add that it might also be considered strange that Paudevaris was never captured by Burns, especially if, as Mr. Older says, Burns was accused of "procuring the dynamiting." I think Burns is the one detective with sufficient ability to catch the fugitive.

Apropos Burk's Poetry

"Burk's poetry isn't any worse than other things at the Normal School," said a former teacher who had just been reading the specimens of the Doc's verse published last week. "I heard of a this-year graduate who objected to a picture of a goose swimming. 'Geese do not swim; they fly.' Web feet to the contrary notwithstanding, all the memory gems tell of wild fowl on the wing—and she'll be teaching as soon as she can get a school, the same brand of nature study she has been absorbing since her own kindergarten days. I also heard of a student at Berkeley who couldn't locate London. The professor was duly astonished at her ignorance. He thought people were born with that much knowledge. Not unlikely it is one of his own chickens coming home to roost for the educational mind which prepares the courses of study for primary schools believes in plenty of nature study, Christmas card designing and other folderols. Why waste time on reading and spelling, primary geography and grammar, which children will learn anyhow?

BEAULIEU VINEYARD

Rutherford, Cal.

There was a suit for damages decided in favor of the plaintiff against one of the correspondence schools last week. The institution professed to be able to teach illustrating in a few lessons by mail. The student found it wouldn't work and for once someone was not dumb under the imposition. There was a great wail over those cotton mill children in East Oakland a little while ago, thirteen and fourteen years old and unable to read a printed poster. Who was to blame? They must have been at school the better part of eight years. If their eventual destiny is to be that of mill hands, perhaps a little elementary instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic might be of more practical use than literature, dabbling with crayons and killing time in ten minute subdivisions. A suit against the State for the false pretenses under which pupils are deluded into wasting time even when they have serious intentions, and destroying what initial power of concentration they are endowed with might bring some of these fool educators to terms." All of which, I submit, is not so very far away from my view of the educational system.

An Enthusiastic Spender

John Y. McKane is in town. No need to ask who John Y. McKane is because not to know John Y. argues oneself out of touch with the current history of joyous spending. John Y. is one of the most feverish spenders that ever pitched double eagles at the birdies. Money is flame to his touch and his pockets and pocket books would be a mass of cinders if he didn't succeed in ridding himself so expeditiously of the lucre with which fortune has blessed him. He simply can't help breaking a big bill and forgetting the change. It's a habit from which he cannot divorce himself and he wouldn't if he could. Not that it is as bad now as it was a few years ago. After all, years make a difference in this as in all sports; enthusiasm wanes as gray hairs increase. McKane doesn't spend nearly as ecstatically today as he did when he first made his odd millions in steel through the good graces of Charles Schwab. In those days he used to delight his friends by flinging a handful of bills in the air and betting which one would flutter to the ground first. And whether he won or lost he was always too busy to spare the time to pick up the scattered currency. Once upon a time John Y. conceived the idea of running for Parliament in Canada; so he hied him to Toronto where he had a legal residence and started his campaign by purchasing three newspapers for a sum which easily passed the quarter million mark. It was one of the liveliest campaigns to which the good electors of Toronto were ever treated. It cost McKane something like $750,000 before he got through, if I have heard the story aright, and then he was snowed under. I believe the fickle franchise-wielders averred that they didn't like his quotations from Macaulay or proferred some equally frivolous excuse. Certainly McKane loves to quote Macaulay, and Shakespeare too. He is a well read man and yet, in the gold camps of Nevada whither he went to augment his fortune, he was never regarded as a highbrow. He came out of Nevada with another million or so and a mighty thirst which, I am told, is just about quenched.

Good Railroad Attorneys

When we were told that the railroad was to be "put out of politics' the allusion of course was to the bad railroad,—the S. P. which incurred the disfavor of the politicians when it quit putting up, and of the righteous editors when it quit paying for advertising in anything but "Transportation." There was no attempt at deception. When Governor Johnson was campaigning for Governor his language was unequivocal. His fulminations were against the Southern Pacific, never against the Western Pacific or any other road. It cannot be said that he was supposed to mean the Western Pacific, for as a matter of fact it was charged by the unrighteous that he was on friendly terms with that corporation. There were mean imputations in circulation to the effect that it was to his interests to advance the interest of the Western Pacific owing to the relation of attorney and client that had existed between himself and J. Dalzell Brown of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company, the institution that had floated the stock of the Gould railroad. So the situation was well understood, or, at least, it was portrayed in a way tending to acquit Mr. Johnson of hostility against all railroads save the iniquitous S. P. In the circumstances, therefore, I perceive no reason why there should be any criticism in respect of the appointment of Western Pacific attorneys to jobs under the State government. The explanation of this observation is that my attention has been called to the appointment of A. de Ligne to the attorneyship of State Bank Commission. I am told he is attorney of record for the Western Pacific, as is also Max Thelen of Railroad Commission, and Warren Olney, Jr., attorney for the Board of Regents. It has been suggested to me that a howl would have gone up all over the State if Gillett or any of his predecessors had gone in quest of legal talent to the law department of the Southern Pacific. This may be true enough, but it should be remembered there is a vast difference between good railroads and bad railroads; also, that the attorneys for the Western Pacific who have been rewarded for the zeal which they manifested in Johnson's campaign for Governor are reformers incapable of doing wrong. Max Thelen, for example, is of the unco guid of Berkeley and Warren Olney is a trustee of the First Congregational Church of Oakland.

Encouraging Competition

Let us not be astonished then at whatever Governor Johnson does to show that he can discriminate wisely between good railroads and bad. If State Mineralogist Aubury should lose his job and it should be said that his scalp was demanded because of the trouble that he tried to make for Mr. H. H. Yard of the Western Pacific, let us not marvel or waste any sympathy. We must expect appeals to our prejudices from the unregenerate standpatters and reactionaries. But if the Harbor Commision should adjust the ferry slips in a way highly advantageous to the Western Pacific and not at all to the liking of the octopus and its purblind patrons, doubtless there will be talk of injustice and patriotism but it will not emanate from the plain people, for it was the plain people that elected Mr. Johnson to do precisely what he said he would do to the S. P. It may be argued that he only said that he would put the S. P. out of politics but if he goes further and tears up the tracks it will be for the praiseworthy purpose of encouraging honest competition and striking off the yoke that irritates. And by the way the Western Pacific I fancy is in need of encouragment. The other day the Denver and Rio Grande, a Gould road, passed its dividend, and the International and Great Northern, another Gould road, was sold at Receiver's Sale. So it really behooves our State officials to do something for the Gould family and thus indirectly do good to the whole State.

A Complaint

Speaking of the ferry slips reminds me of a complaint I heard the other day about the Harbor Commission. It was to the effect that the Commissioners are not attending strictly to their business. The State pays the president of the Commission five hundred dollars more a year than is paid to his confreres, the reason being that he is expected to keep office hours on the water front and attend to his multifarious official duties. But, so the complainant informs me, President Hale cannot afford to spend all his time down where the bilge water breezes gently blow. Nor does Joe Dwyer spend his time there either, but Commissioner Hill hasn't anything else to do. One commisioner on the job, in my opinion, might be able to transact all the business under a well regulated reform Administration. The fact is I am impatient of carping criticism directed at officials who are guaranteed to be incapable of doing wrong either by omission or commission.

News for Billie Burke

"What is to be your play next season?" an interviewer asked Billie Burke the other day. "I know absolutely nothing about it," she replied. "Have no idea who wrote it, what the plot is or anything else, but my role, I am afraid, will be the same as the widow or Jacqueline or poor little 'my wife.' The story will be different, the plot will be different, the scenery will be different and the environment will be different; only I will remain just the same." Billie is a sweet little woman and it will always afford me pleasure to do a favor for sweet little women; so I am going to give her some information about her next play. She will no doubt be surprised to learn that her manager, Charles Frohman, is considering the advisability of allowing her to appear in a French play in Paris next season. She will be gratified to learn that her role is to be different from those she has played hitherto. Messrs. De Caillavet and De Flers whose works are known in English through the adaptations of our own Gladys Unger, have agreed to meet Frohman in London and arrange with him to secure Billie's services for their next play which will be presented at the Gymnase. One of the characters is an English girl who speaks French indifferently and this is the part they want Billie to enact. If Frohman will let her go to Paris they are prepared to assign to him the English and American rights in the play and of course Billie would bring the play from Paris to London and New York and afterwards take it on tour. Is it not an attractive proposition, Miss Burke? And are you not glad to hear this news?

Margaret Illington in Stock

At last Mrs. Edward J. Bowes, otherwise Margaret Illington, is to enjoy a spell of domestic bliss. Not that Margaret is to retire with Edward to private life; but she is going to play a stock engagement at the Burbank Theater in Los Angeles and during her engagement there she will have an opportunity to cultivate the long-craved graces of the household, including of course the chief of all, to-wit: sock-darning. It is no reflection on Margaret that she is going into stock. Great players are doing this every day. James K. Hackett, Virginia Harned and Florence Roberts, Herbert Kelcey and Effie Shannon are among the mummers who have not disdained to appear in stock at the Alcazar; so why should Margaret object to a season in Los Angeles? Her engagement is the result of the consolidation of the Oliver Morosco and John H. Blackwood theatrical interests in the metropolis of the citrus belt. These men have capitalized their interests at a cool million and control the Burbank, the Belasco, the Majestic, the old Orpheum and the new Belasco theaters. They have arranged affiliations with the Alcazar in this city, Ye Liberty in Oakland, the Baker stock in Portland and with stock companies in Spokane and Seattle. So who knows but that we may see Margaret in stock right here before long? But let us hope that she won't play that awful near-drama in which we saw her last and which she took on the road with such disastrous results.

Jack London's Latest

Jack London, still under the impression that the first duty of the novelist is to point out what's wrong in the world and suggest a remedy, has written a story called "Burning Daylight," The hero, Elam Haguist, is a superman, one of the pioneers of the Yukon, who becomes a Klondike king and later a "robber capitalist" in San Francisco where he is on the point of being jilted by the girl he loves because she is an idealist and hates big business and its magnates. To win the girl he sacrifices all his millions and goes with the darling of his heart to a ranch in the Sonoma Valley where he settles down and enjoys the "clean game" of the open air. The last glimpse which London gives of his hero, he is toiling frantically to hide from the knowledge of men all traces of a gold reef he has discovered on his ranch on Sonoma Mountain. Crazy? Oh, no; a sane sentimentalist, cured of his greed, a man to be admired for his ideals, for his humane and most virtuous impulses. All of which may be called romantic in the sense that it is anything but classical. As romance it is so crude as to be grotesque; fully as grotesque as the average old-time melodrama and not half so plausible. I have read a criticism of this book in The Nation of London and I find that while it is pronounced inartistic the "blend of sentimentalism in an ultra-masculine nature" is conjectured to be "a regulating force that makes for American sanity." In other words the English reviewer is inclined to allow that what may seem preposterously incredible to Englismen is plausible enough in this country. He is even willing to give credence to the "extraordinarily schoolboyish love-making" of London's hero. He accepts it as explanatory of "why most American women wish to keep their men's noses to the business grindstone."

His Purpose

The English reviewer of London's novel pronounces it a healthy corrective of the American craze for business." This is probably what London intended it should be. London is more of a reformer than a literary artist, and he allows his passion for preaching to impair his skill for story-telling, the result being that his polemics go for naught. A novel to be a healthy corrective of anything must first be a good novel. For the novelist must first persaude his hearers before he can convince them and there is nothing persuasive in melodramatic claptrap. Nor is London any the more persausive when he digresses for the purpose of expounding his views of the synthesis of society. He makes it evident enough that if he were God he would order some things better than they are, but still the question remains, might he not neglect some loose ends with disastrous results? You never can tell.

It seems that Hampton's Magazine which is muckrakiest of the muckraky, advertised more than a year ago that it was prepared to sell stock to its readers. The definite statement was made that if at any time the purchaser of the stock desired to get his money back, the stock would be bought back by the company at the price paid for it plus interest on the money invested. The offer appealed to the prominent cit and he bought five shares of stock for his little boy. After a time he decided that it was not the sort of investment he wanted for the lad, so he wrote to Hampton's stating that he was prepared to avail himself of their offer by returning the certificates. He has been writing ever since, but he can't get his money back, apparently. "It's a case of the cashier being out or the bookkeeper being sick or the vice-president being rushed with other business every time I make demand for that money," he told me in deep disgust. And being an innocent soul who expected consistency in muckrakers he was greatly shocked to discover that Hampton's resorted to methods not of the most examplary kind.

The Kohl Shooting

Lamentable as was the shooting of Fred Kohl it brought out in such strong relief the sweetness of his character that it cannot be said to have been without compensation. Lying in what he believed to be his death-bed he expressed forgiveness of the woman who had shot him. The human heart never appears so strong as when it appears to have no room for the memory of a wrong; and there is no generosity that more directly appeals to the imagination than that which shines with the godlike glory of forgiveness. The shooting of Fred Kohl stirred the tender feelings of all who know him because he is just the sort of man one might judge him to be from his behaviour immediately after the shooting. I have never forgotten that Fred Kohl's conduct after the earthquake was in strong contrast with that of most of our millionaires. It will be remembered that nearly all of them were in a state of panic and that some who had the least reason to worry about the future discharged all their servants. Fred Kohl though he had lost his city home sent the servants that had been employed therein to join the staff at his country house. A millionaire friend met him one day and observed, "Well, Fred, I suppose you've cut down your help to reduce expenses." "No," said Kohl, "I think they need to be kept now more than before."

Let Us Inquire

There appears to be no doubt that the unfortunate woman who shot Kohl is insane. From what I have read about her I infer that even before the shooting it was not difficult to perceive that her mind was disordered. From what occurred in court on the trial of her suit against Kohl I infer that there was no evidence to warrant his being made a defendant. If there had been such evidence the motion of a non-suit presumably would not have been granted. In the circumstances may there not be reason for criticism of the attorneys who took the case? This is no trivial question. To me it seems of sufficient importance to justify inquiry on the part of the Bar Association. Some weeks ago I observed that there were many suits which never should have been filed,and that there is much dishonest litigation. Is it not the business of the Bar Association to discourage dishonest litigation?

The Gideon Bibles

San Francisco's ungodly hotels are soon to be submitted to the Christianizing influence of the Bible. The Gideons have shipped to this city 25,000 copies of the Good Book and when the shipment arrives the Bibles will be allotted to the various big hotels which will be expected to place them in their rooms. The Gideons, be it understood, are an association of traveling salesmen who go in for Christian uplift in hotels. They feel that the ordinary drummer is exposed to many temptations when his itinerant activities bring him to a big city and they are trying to inoculate him with religion. The theory is that when the drummer picks up a Bible from the writing table in his room he will give up all notion of sallying forth to dally with the insidious highball or the demoralizing Havana or the wicked game of draw and will settle down for an improving evening of religious reading. It is a picturesque theory and we cannot but look forward with interest to its working out in a practical manner. The traveling salesman is a man of wide sympathies, eager for all sorts of enlightenment and it may be that he will prefer the Book of Job or the Psalms of the royal shepherd to the white glare of Powell street. Still we cannot but cherish a slight feeling of doubt. The love of serious reading is a habit not to be acquired in a day or a week or a month. Hotel life is peculiarly unsuited to its development; and of course the Bible is the most serious of all serious books. I understand that between the front fly leaves of each Bible the Gideons have inserted a printed slip containing these suggestions:

If lonesome or blue and friends untrue, read Psalms 23 and 27; Luke 15.

If trade is poor, read Psalms 37; John 15.

If discouraged or in trouble, read Psalm 126; John 14.

If you are all out of sorts, read Hebrews 12.

If you are losing confidence in men, read 1 Cor. 13.

If skeptical, read John 6:40; 7:17; Phil. 2:9-11.

If you can't have your own way, read James 3.

If tired of sin, read Luke 18:35-43; 18:9-14; John 9.

If very prosperous, read 1 Cor. 10:12, 13.

Happy conclusion, Ps. 121; Matt. 6:23; Rom. 12.

All of which shows a touching faith in the susceptibility of the drummer to religious influence. We shall see what we shall see.

In Defense of Sterling

Some time ago the New York Times Review of Books published a sonnet from George Sterling's latest book, "The House of Orchids" and declared that William Watson might be proud to have written it. But the Times treated Sterling as a "minor poet." This aroused the indignation of one of Sterling's admiring readers and he has written to the paper as follows: "It seems a singular anomaly that a poet of Mr. George Sterling's rank and responsibility should be referred to as a minor poet, and still more so that Mr. William Watson should be mentioned in the same connection. Mr. Sterling is not only a great poet, but inconceivably the greatest living, in either England or America. The sense of his art as a divine mission—

Remiss the ministry they bear
Who serve her with divided heart;
Who stand reluctant to impart
Her strength to purpose, end, or share—

—stamps the high seriousness of one whom Shelley, Poe and Keats would have been the first to welcome. Let us honor the living as well as the dead.

—Samuel Loveman.

Newspaperman Goes to London

San Francisco has sent many of its best newspapermen to New York and the story of their success in the metropolis is an oft-repeated tale. Now we are to send a newspaperman to London. The fortunate gentleman is Mr. Ben Allen of the Associated Press. Some time ago Mr. Allen left one of the local papers to accept a position with this great news gathering institution. At that time there had been many complaints from interior papers that they were not getting a prompt news service from San Francisco and it was Mr. Allen's task to remedy this deficiency. Owing to his intelligent efforts the papers of the interior are supplied with the news of important happenings in this city as promptly as our own press. In recognition of his ability the A. P. has decided to transfer Mr. Allen to a bigger field. He will be what is known as an "outside man" in the London office and will receive many assignments on the continent of Europe. That he will make good those who know him readily agree.

In Trouble at Stanford

Allen had the distinction while at Stanford to earn the displeasure of the university authorities. He collided with the peculiar system which has made Stanford a "sick university" and had to leave in consequence. He was the editor of the Daily Palo Alto when the Students' Affairs Committee, headed by Professor Green (the same committee which expelled Will and Wallace Irwin), planned to put spies in Encina Hall, the men's dormitory. Allen exposed and attacked the gumshoe project and advocated students' self government. He was expelled for his boldness but the exposure resulted in Dr. Jordan's appointing the most popular committee the college ever had and Encina was put under student government. This incident excited widespread comment and the New York Sun, admiring Allen's spunk, offered him a position. But the worry of the affair brought on a fever and for a time he was in a desperate condition. It was only after the earthquake, however, that he was allowed to return and take his degree.

Colonel Johnson's Latest

Time was, not so long ago, when Colonel Frank Johnson of San Rafael would have nothing but aviation. After the first big aviation meet at Los Angeles, the meet which imparted the aviatory fever to all our amateur fliers, Colonel Johnson purchased a Curtiss biplane and started to defy the laws of gravity. The results were rather discouraging. From Fresno and Bakersfield, from Sacramento and Petaluma and other communities where Colonel Johnson gave exhibitions, stories came regularly about the biplane's distressing habit of smashing its nose against telegraph poles and other upstanding obstructions. Colonel Johnson escaped without serious accident, but apparently he has tired of the upper spaces and has returned to the definite joys of terra firma. For the other day, as I walked up Market street, my ears were assailed by the sophisticated strains of "The Barber's Ball" played on an automobile horn. The music attracted general attention from passers-by and I was only one of several hundred who craned at the musical motor and its occupant. I just had time, as the car flashed by, to glimpse a conspicuously elevated pair of gorgeously purple ankles and to recognize the classic features of the colonel.

The Play at Carmel

Down at Carmel-by-the-Sea they are whispering a tale which purports to carry the explanation of the choice of "Twelfth Night" as this year's forest play. That choice has caused some surprise. Carmelites as a class are not too keen about Shakespeare. Some of them have been heard talking about him in language one might expect from Dr. Owen, the Baconmaniac of Detroit or from George Bernard Shaw. So, when "Twelfth Night" was picked out there was considerable speculation. Were there no unacted plays reposing in the cedar drawers of the desks of the highbrows of Carmel? Was there to be no sucessor to Constance Skinner's "David?" And then it was told that the directors of the forest theater had selected a Shakespearian play because they didn't want to accept a drama written by one of the bright particular stars of Carmel. This bright particular luminary has not had much experience in writing. He lacks the chastening influence of publication. He is still to achieve fame. But he thought he could write a play and set to work. The result of his labors, I am told, was amazing. But it was not a play. So when he offered it for production in the forest theater the Carmelites gently but firmly declined it with regrets, explaining that they had decided to give a Shakespearian comedy.

A Matter of Principle

"But, as I understand it," said the lawyer who had been assigned to defend him, "you had plenty of opportunities to kill your victim in half a dozen States. Why did you wait until he got into New York State before you assassinated him?"

"Because," replied the murderer, "I am opposed to capital punishment."

Society at the "Coast"

When Mary Garden was represented in the papers as suffering such shock from the spectacle of men and women dancing the "turkey trot" at Caesar's that she up and ran away, I pointed out that the "turkey trot" had the approval of our exclusive society people and that Mary's prudishness, if it was prudishness, was in strong contrast to the liberality of our aristocracy. I mentioned some of the smart folk who have not disdained the resorts of the Barbary Coast, who in fact have gone there to "turkey trot." My statement received additional verification the other night when a gay party of young people who had attended a smart wedding "blew into" Caesar's. They were chaperoned by a wealthy maiden lady and the girls were as pretty a collection of girls as one ever sees. One of them became so enthusiastic in her enjoyment of the delights of the place that she jumped up and executed a dance of her own while even the waiters paused to applaud. Another girl in the party espied some friends at a nearby table and approaching them, begged that they join her party. "This is an all night party," she said. "Come with us. We are going to the Midway." It was then one in the morning and the invitation was not accepted.

A Not Too Munificent Reward

Down Blingum way and in the rarefied atmosphere of Hillsboro they are laughing over a story in which Mrs. Henry T. Scott is the principal figure. It seems that Mrs. Scott drove in her handsome trap to a nursery near Burlingame and purchased some plants and orchids. The orchids were pinned to her dress with a long pin containing a valuable solitaire. The stone became loosened and dropped from its setting. Taking her whip Mrs. Scott prodded about among the bushes where she thought the stone had dropped. But she could not find it. The nurseryman's assistants went down on their knees and began grubbing for the precious stone, but without success. Finally, while they continued their efforts, Mrs. Scott climbed into her trap and whipped up her ponies, saying: "I'll give five dollars to the man that finds it." The nurseryman's assistants looked at one another and gave up the search.

Alas, Poor Paul!

All the world knows by this time that when pretty Jennie Lee announced her engagement to Lieutenant Rees she sent a pang through the warm heart of Paul Verdier. Immediately after the announcement of the engagement Verdier departed for Paris and although he did not go away on account of the dashing of his hopes, the coincidence called more attention to his disappointment than it might otherwise have received. Those of his friends who attended the wedding breakfast following Miss Lee's quiet wedding were rather put out by the jokes at Paul's expense which were perpetrated by some well meaning but tactless humorist of the bridal party. It was a little unkind, for instance, to place a salad a la Verdier on the menu; and there was not a great deal of wit in the cable which purported to come from Paul, embodying an expression of his disappointment. If Verdier had been present, it would have been different. He is a good natured chap and it is possible that he would have joined in the fun, but in his absence these things did not look well. So say his friends who, like Paul, are neither illiberal nor lacking in a sense of humor.

The Family Is Noisy

Ellis Parish, safe returned from the far East, had his return celebrated with due form and ceremony at the Family Club last week. Wednesday night a score of jovial souls took motor for the Family Farm where a dinner was enjoyed at the expense of H. O. Harrison, host of the occasion. The piece de resistance was Family Club steaks roasted on spits before the open fire-place. They say some of the neighbors who put up summer cottages in the vicinity some years ago to spend seasons of rural quiet are trying to sell their property.

Let Us Watch 'Em in August

The story of how Louis Sloss paid $1,000 for Frank Moroney's drink at Santa Cruz has been told. Moroney was on the water wagon pledged to pay Wellington Gregg and John Daniels $500 apiece if he fell from grace. Sloss asked him to drink with others at the Casa del Rey opening and on hearing why the invitation was turned down wrote out a check for $1,000 to pay the fines, and Moroney drank. It is left for me to tell the sequel. Moroney went back on the water-wagon first thing in the morning and he is there yet under the original conditions. These I am assured will obtain for the 90 days agreed upon, the fines having squared only a single defection. Gregg, Moroney and Daniels will get off the wagon together in August.

High-Priced Hyphens

I hear that Delmar Smith of Manila whose wife was a San Francisco belle came into the sum of $10,000 for consenting to add Clinton to his name. His mother, a wealthy Eastern woman, requested her two sons to assume her maiden name and accompanied the request with a promise of $10,000 each if they complied. I am reminded of the Hyde-Smith family of which the daughters used the double name until a bequest from their paternal relations in Chicago was left them on condition that they no longer combined Hyde with their father's name. Both agreed to the change but married Baldwin Wood and young Dillingham of Honolulu soon after and their mother continues to be known as Mrs. Hyde-Smith. She is a daughter of Alcalde Hyde who amassed a fortune in San Francisco in early days. Her sister, Mrs. Camillo Martin, married the consul from Spain to this port.

Two Washington Belles Coming

Society will have the addition of two Washington belles next winter. They are the daughters of General and Mrs. Warren, U. S. A. and are handsome girls with many attractions. General Warren comes to take command of one of the new Pacific divisions of the army. His wife who was a Miss De Rusey of this city will be accorded a warm welcome from her old friends. The De Rusey family belonged to the old regime in San Francisco. They had a home in South Park and the De Rusey sisters took an active part in social doings thirty years ago. They were friends of the McAllisters and Friedlanders and others of the South Park and Rincon Hill residents. General Warren has been in Washington for several years and his family has been prominent in the smart set activities of the capital. They will probably occupy a house in the city while stationed here.

A Son and an Anniversary

The son and heir born to Ensign and Mrs. Kirkwood Donovan at San Diego last week arrived on the anniversary of their marriage which took place last June at the bride's home in San Rafael, Mrs. Donovan was Dorothy Draper, the younger of the dashing Draper sisters. Mrs. Draper is now in San Diego with her daughter and new grandson. The coincidence of his birth on the anniversary of his parent's marriage pleased them greatly.

Miss Elkins May Return Soon

Society is wondering if the William Delaware Neilsons will visit San Francisco next winter with the wife's beautiful daughter Marie Louise Elkins. When Mrs. Kate Felton Elkins went East in the Spring she promised to return in December and after her marriage renewed the promise in letters to friends in this city. Her father, ex-Senator Felton, is past the three score and ten mile stone and it is probable his daughter with the grand children of whom he is very fond will cross the continent to see him. I am told that a romantic attachment for a well known member of the local jeunesse doree will lead Miss Elkins to urge her mother to take the trip. Some of her intimate friends looked for an announcement of her engagement before her departure, to the young scion of one of San Mateo's richest families. He is a graduate of Oxford and his sister and cousin both married French titles. The match would be suitable and would be an alliance of two old and wealthy California families.

Mrs. Martel Worried

Mrs. Jane L. Martel was plunged into the greatest anxiety about the welfare of her son Louis who was in Mexico during the revolution. He was traveling with Edward Hoag, the brother of Mrs. Prentice Cobb Hale, and was apparently unable to communicate with his mother. But a wire came last Saturday and relieved Mrs. Martel's anxiety. It brought the news that the two travelers were sailing northward on the Peru. Through an error of the telegraph operator the wire read: "Ed and I are sane" instead of "safe." Mrs. Martel had no doubts about her son's mental condition and when her fears were relieved she couldn't help laughing at the message.

Miss Cosgrave Here

Miss Patricia Cosgrave has been here visiting her friends and has been entertained at a number of delightful affairs. This young woman has had an interesteing life. When Miss Katherine Dillon inherited an immense fortune from her millionaire uncle, she invited Miss Cosgrave to make her home with her. When the two friends wearied of social activities here they would tour the world. Their tastes in the better things of life were sympathetic and the intimacy was not interrupted by Miss Dillon's marriage to Emory Winship. But some time ago Miss Cosgrave's brother J. O'Hara Cosgrave, the editor of "Everybody's" asked her to go to New York and keep house for him and she did so. Cosgrave has a charming home in New York and gives dinner parties for which invitations are eagerly accepted. He has a position in New York that is the envy of many climbers.

The Latest in Bawths

A rising young lawyer tells this story on himself. He was invited recently to spend a week end at a country house where things were done a notch or two more elaborately than he was accustomed to, and he stood in not a little awe of the solemn person who was assigned to act as temporary valet to him. The climax came when this functionary tapped at his door on Sunday morning and told him it was 8 o'clock. "All right, I'll get up," said the visitor, and the solemn man disappeared into the bathroom, from which presently the noise of water running into the bath tub was audible. In half a minute more the solemn person emerged, holding a large silver bowl full of water, with which he approached the bed. "He must have seen the astonishment in my face," said the lawyer. "I couldn't conceal it. It was a wholly new game to me and I didn't know whether I was expected to dip my head in it or to drink it. It was an awful moment, but that man was a diplomat. He realized my embarrassment and he just let drop in a cold and aloof tone, as if he had outsiders to deal with every day, the simple explanation: "'The temperature of your bawth, sir.'"

New Way to "Sit Out"

London chaperons have now to cope with a new danger. It is a new fashion of "sitting-out" dances and much more exciting for the participants than the old practice of seeking (usually in vain) a "cosy corner" in a leafy conservatory or on the stairs. This new sitting-out device is to hire a taxicab at the door of one's hostess and to go for a spin with one's partner. This little escapade can be decidedly flirtatious, and some couples recently were indiscreetly long in their absence. The first pair who thought it necessary to say the taxi broke down found the excuse acceptable; but when the same tale was brought out by the fifth couple some folk smiled. The girls from here who are in London for the crowning will doubtless bring the fad back with them and we may look for some interesting developments.

Del Monte Activities

Word has been received that the Southern Pacific will make a rate of one and one-third fare for the round trip from California points to Hotel Del Monte between August 15 and September 12, in connection with the annual month of sports which will be held then. Some of the events of this time will be the dog show, the annual golf tournament and the golf championship of the Pacific Coast. The golf tournament has been recognized as the premier golf event of the year and is eagerly anticipated by many of the best players who plan their vacations so that they can be there for the whole time. Much interest has been aroused in the coming tournament which will extend from July 1 to 5 inclusive. The tournament will carry some handsome trophies and cups which will be well worth playing for and will give opportunity for some very delightful games. Manager Warner is busy arranging other features of interest for the entertainment of his "over-holiday" guests and will spring some pleasing surprises.

Miss Crocker Stranded

An interesting story is going the rounds about Jennie Crocker's trip to the County Fair in Merced County, where she and Templeton Crocker have large holdings and where she is so much interested in her model dairy and poultry farm that she made an exhibit at the County Fair. With Julia Langhorne for a companion, the trip was made in Jennie Crocker's machine, and a scion of one of our newly quoted first families was at the wheel when the car got stranded many miles from nowhere as the shades of night were falling fast. Finally, they were towed into the only place where they could put up for the night, which happened to be one of those places where they dispense liquid refreshments along the country road. They made the best of it and hoped the story would not get about. But it has.

John Drew is spending the vacation period in San Francisco with his company. Probably no actor on the stage has more friends, real personal friends, than John Drew, and to see him walk through the lobby or down the corridors of the St. Francis is to see him stopped many times to renew the acquaintance of this one or that one.

Colonel and Mrs. Dan Burns who have been touring Mexico for the past several months, returned to their apartments at the St. Francis during the week.

"Zaza" at the Alcazar

By Edward F. O'Day

The Alcazar will be waterlogged before the week is out. Not since the night during Max Figman's engagement when they had to raft the audience into the aisles has there been such an inundation. "Zaza" is the cause of the downpour and Florence Roberts is the Juno Pluvia (if I may so far trifle with mythological diction) of the occasion. I used to think that "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch" was Florence Roberts' prime tear-compeller, but after taking soundings Monday night I am in doubt. The plumb reported fathoms of salt water in the aisles. And of course dripping handkerchiefs must be taken into the calculation. High tide, I suppose, will be reached at the Saturday matinee when the girly-girly ducts let loose their streams of sympathy. Poor Zaza! I didn't think it was in you. Thought the last drop had been shed for you years ago. But no, you are still good for a lachrymal display. Your woes still have power to evoke a saline tribute from soft feminine eyes. Whether Leslie of the incarnadine locks could still produce the phenomenon is a question, but Florence Roberts who has been responsible in her career for enough tears to fill the Panama Canal, certainly retains her mastery of the sobful secretions. This feminine Moses can strike the rockiest feminine bosom and make it gush. The ladies, God bless 'em! make intermittent fountains of their eyes every time hers fill. And hers are forever filling in "Zaza." I wonder how they manage to remain so bright through it all. It is a good cast that supports Florence Roberts in "Zaza." Handsome, throaty-voiced Thurlow Bergen carries the role of the ass Dufresne very gracefully. Theodore Roberts as Cascart, Zaza's singing partner, finds considerable enjoyment in a small part and the audience shares the enjoyment to the full, which is as it should be. Georgie Woodthorpe as the brandy-drinking, scheming old aunt, does as fine a piece of character work as we have ever had from her and that is saying a great deal. Her facial play is irresistible and her boozy voice is a triumph. Burt Wesner as the doddering old duc adds another fine portrait to his gallery. Why doesn't somebody write a play for Burt Wesner and Georgie Woodthorpe? Lillian Armsby as Zaza's servant is appropriately stupid and adoring. Florence Smythe looks sweet and pretty and ignorantly good in the part of Zaza's poor but honest friend. Viola Leach as Dufresne's wife is very proud and haughty and handsome. Altogether it's a good cast and of course the play is mounted in the superior Alcazar style. But the property man had better look out or the furniture will be ruined by tears.

Gossip of the Theatre

Ethel Barrymore in Barrie Plays

Ethel Barrymore, no longer the portrayer of namby-pamby society heroines in plays in which fine frocks and dress clothes form so much of the stage adornment, but an actress capable of expressing and portraying the deeper emotions of life, comes to the Columbia Theater on Monday when Charles Frohman is to present her in a bill that is very promising. This bill is a double one by James Matthew Barrie and comprises "Alice-Sit-by-the-Fire" and "The Twelve Pound Look." Barrie has endeared himself to the theatre-goers of two countries through the charm and worth of his plays. In the double bill he shows himself in two moods and each of them admirable in its way. To some of the admirers of the Scotch author "Alice-Sit-by-the-Fire" will always remain his most beautiful play. It tells the sweet and tender story of a mother who returns to her children to find herself a stranger in her own home. There is much wit, a good deal of playful satire and some whimsy in the story and running underneath it all there is much humanness. All of Barrie's plays carry a message and the one brought out by "Alice-Sit-by-the Fire" is that a mother's place is with her children. The position of prominence on the bill is given to "The Twelve Pound Look," it coming last. This drama in one act is by some considered the strongest and most virile work that Barrie has written. It is a severe arraignment of mere man and with direct force it shows the dire and utter failure of success. The story is told concisely and there is not a gesture or a syllable in it that is not of import. "The Twelve Pound Look" is described as a perfect play admirable in construction and flawless in technique. The work gets its title from the look given a man by his wife. Barrie wrote the play for Miss Barrymore and in it she has scored very heavily. Among those in Miss Barrymore's support are Charles Dalton, Louise Drew, Mrs. Sam Sothern, Frank Goldsmith, Helen Freman, Thomas Kelly, Alice Beresford, James Kearney and Anita Roth. Miss Barrymore's engagement is for a fortnight.

"The Right of Way" at the Alcazar

"The Right of Way," announced as the Alcazar's attraction throughout the coming week, will afford the Roberts-Bergen-Roberts stellar combine another splendid opportunity for the individual and collective display of fine acting.

EDWIN ABELES AND CHARLOTTE LANDERS

Who will appear this Sunday Matinee at the Orpheum.

In the cast with them is the complete roster of Alcazar players and the pictorial side of the production will be most picturesque. Most of the scenes are laid in the rugged mountains of Northern Canada. Eugene Presbrey adapted the play from Sir Gilbert Parker's famous novel similarly titled, and an excelent job he made of it. Mr. Theodore Roberts made one of the greatest hits of his professional career when he starred in Portugais, several years ago.

Fine Fare at the Orpheum

The Orpheum bill will be headed next week by Edward Abeles who made such a great hit last season in the one act drama, "Self Defense." His contribution will consist of Grant Stewart's international comedy success "He Tried To Be Nice," and associated with him in the cast will be Charlotte Landers, a well graced actress who never fails to appeal successfully to her audiences. Raymond and Caverley whose names are household words, will reappear after quite a lengthy absence. They are conceded to be the two funniest German comedians in vaudeville and do much to maintain their great popularity by presenting an entirely new act each year. Now their offering includes the skits "A Booming Town," "Swivel Service" and "Talk of Society." Albert Hole, the English boy soprano who made an American tour with Liza Lehmann and created quite a sensation with his beautiful voice, will be a feature of the new bill. He is famous as the most remarkable of boy sopranos and his voice in sweetness, purity and volume is remarkable. The Bellclair Brothers, known in theatrical circles as "The Modern Hercules" will appear in their extraordinary feats of strength. Next week will be the last of Belle Adair; James H. Cullen; The Farrell Taylor Co. and Joseph Hart's production of "A Night in a Turkish Bath."

A Big Choral Concert

The big choral concert which is to precede the formal opening of the thirteenth annual International Sunday School Convention, to take place at the Coliseum on Monday evening, bids fair to be a musical event of importance. Over a thousand voices and an orchestra of one hundred picked musicians will render music such as has not been heard here in many a day, including many of the master compositions of Mendelssohn, Gounod, Mozart, A. R. Gaul and others. The musical directors of the big affair are Robert Husband and Wallace A. Sabin and the rehearsals have been held ever since March. Louise Brehany, a soprano of great repute, will be a soloist, Miss Blanche Merrill, a violinist of note, will play the Fantasia Appasionata by Vieuxtemps; and St. Luke's Episcopal Church Male Quartet, composed of Charles F. Bullotti, tenor, Carl E. Anderson, barytone, Clarence Oliver, first bass and Wilfred Glenn, second bass, will sing

Some of the choral numbers will be Keller's American hymn, "The Radiant Morn," by Woodward, Mendelssohn's "Be Not Afraid," from the oratorio of "Elijah," "How Lovely are the Messengers," from the oratorio of "St. Paul," also by Mendelssohn, "Great and Marvelous," from the oratorio of the "Holy City," by Alfred R. Gaul, Mozart's "Gloria" from his Twelfth Mass, "By Babylon's Wave," by Gounod, and the "Hallelujah" from the oratorio of "The Messiah," by Handel. An orchestral number of peculiar interest will be the overture from "St. Patrick at Tara," conducted the composer, Wallace A. Sabin, and two male choruses from Mr. Sabin's composition, "The March of the Kings," and "Veni Creator," will also be on the program. W. Fletcher Husband, organist of St. Luke's, will play the piano accompaniments and Mabel Jones and Lilia Forderer will preside at the organ. There will be a seating capacity of over eight thousand at the Coliseum.

Truly Shattuck, erstwhile of our town, has given up the literary life after a brief experience. She was engaged as press agent for Hammerstein's Roof Garden in New York, but she couldn't get along with Oscar Hammerstein. Besides, she was expected to be in her office at eleven o'clock every morning and she indignantly declared that she wouldn't get up in the middle of the night for anybody.

Lillian Russell, Newspaper Woman

Lillian Russell is back on Broadway after a very successful season in the comedy called "In Search of a Sinner" in which she was seen here some time ago. To the interviewers she confided that during her absence from New York she had become a newspaper woman. "I have been telling my sisters what I know about beauty in a regular paper that is published every day in Chicago," she said. The cynical interviewer hinted that her very capable press agent may have written the beauty talks for her, whereupon she waxed indignant. "The idea is absurd" she cried, jingling a diamond studded fountain pen that hung from her chatelaine. "My father was an editor and so was my mother before I was born and it would be a disgrace to my family if I couldn't do my own writing. Besides the San Francisco Press Club presented me with a key to their clubhouse more than three years ago." That clinched the matter and the interviewer subsided. What Miss Russell said about the local Press Club is less than the truth. She has been presented with three golden keys to the club houses of the newspapermen. The first fitted the lock of the old Withrow home in Pine street where the scribes were housed after the fire; the second was for the door of the rooms in Bush street; and the third which was presented during her last visit, was the open sesame to the new home of the club in the Commercial Building. Miss Russell is the only member of the club who has been so honored.

Saved by His Spouse

"I tell you you can't beat my wife for presence of mind," said the man at the club proudly. "Listen to this. One day last week an old gossip of our neighborhood called, and I left her and wife alone in the parlor. An hour later, having the impression that our caller had departed, I bounced into the room with, 'So the old cat has gone, eh!' Well, say! as I lifted my eyes, there was the woman herself in front of me. But my wife—bless her—was there with the goods. 'Yes, dear,' she said calmly, 'I sent it to the cat's home in a basket this morning.'"

Tne Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—In view of the substantial progress toward higher prices already made by the stock market since the trust decisions and a consequent reduction of the short interest, leading bull interests continued reluctant to bring about a further substantial upturn. Uncertainty regarding the effect upon the grain and cotton crops of the long continued drouth in the southwest, which was described at length in the Government's weather report, also exerted a restraining influence upon bullish operations. Although the bear element took advantage of the opportunity to extend its committments on the short side the leading shares receded only fractionally while a large number of specialties and usually inactive stocks made material gains. The movement of prices was irregular throughout the week, and at the close of the week small net losses were counterbalanced by net gains.

Wheat—The July option was the center of attraction in the wheat pit the past week and fluctations were fast and furious. The big bull leaders spread the report that the deal in the May option would be continued in the July option. Frightened shorts bid this option up to 94 early in the week fearing a repetition of the May squeeze. However, at the advance there seemed to be plenty of wheat for sale, and when this selling was traced to the bull crowd prices turned very weak with almost a panic at the close of the week. The news was generally in favor of the selling side although the excessive heat during the week was responsible for a little nervousness on the part of the shorts. In some sections of the winter wheat-belt the wheat is in the milk and there was some talk of damage which would result in shriveled berries and light weight should high temperatures continue. The winter wheat crop is said to be almost perfect, and temperatures have been about nominal with occasional showers. Cash demand has been poor and the same can be said of the flour market. Stocks of wheat in both this country and abroad are ample for this season of the year. And the foreigner shows no inclination to take any of our wheat at prevailing prices. Some new wheat is arriving at primary markets and it will take heavy buying by the bull interests to hold wheat at this level.

Cotton—Owing to the continuance of the drouth in the southwest and the Mississippi Valley States new crop values were traded in at higher levels the past week. News from the interior is to the effect that while corn is commencing to deteriorate for the want of moisture, cotton is holding its own and that conditions, except that rain will soon be needed, could hardly be more favorable,—fields clean, stands good and early planted cotton squaring. The continuance of dry weather, however, would probably give cause for complaint, and it is these possibilities that the market is trying to discount before their maturity. It is said that if a good general rain were had over the entire belt, the fields and crops are in such splendid shape to receive moisture that the rains would put them in the pink of condition. But the rains have yet to be had and until they make their appearance, nervous and probably excited markets will follow, as the trade can not suffer the crop to deteriorate before it has been laid by. From now on the weather influential as it has been of late will become a price-making factor. If the drouth continues, a higher level of prices is inevitable, especially for fall and winter options.

Corn—Dry hot weather over the corn belt the past week has awakened interest in the coarse grain markets. Temperatures of over 100 in the big corn States with very little moisture has sent a flood of buying orders to the pit and the prices have responded to a three cent advance. A good deal of the advance was caused more by the damage done to the oat crop and the poor outlook for the hay crop rather than actual damage done to corn. Corn is not suffering any in the big corn States but the southwestern States are urgently in need of moisture and should the drouth continue it will be reflected in the distant futures. Cash demand for corn is not very brisk and stocks are accumulating.

G. K. C. on Detective Stories

For a man who writes detective stories G. K. Chesterton maintains a painfully skeptical attitude toward them. Here is "G. K. C.'s" recipe for the writing of this kind of literature: "I like detective stories; I read them, I write them; but I do not believe them. The bones and structure of a good detective story are so old and well known that it may seem banal to state them even in outline. A policeman, stupid but sweet-tempered, and always weakly erring on the side of mercy, walks along the street, and in the course of his ordinary business finds a man in Bulgarian uniform killed with an Australian boomerang in a Brompton milk shop. Having set free all the most suspicious persons in the story, he then appeals to the bulldog professional detective, who appeals to the hawklike amateur detective. The latter finds near the corpse a bootlace, a French newspaper, and a return ticket from the Hebrides, and so, relentlessly, link by link, brings the crime home to the Archbishop of Canterbury."

The Red Barque

he suddenly espied the girl, standing on the quay, her white zendado lashed by the wind. She cried:

"Ardi, Ardi, wait, I must speak to you!"

He grasped the edge of the dock with his iron hook and held the barque, until Uriana had reached it.

"Where are you going?" she asked.

"For fish."

"Take me with you."

Ardi gazed at her, fearing that she had lost her mind.

"Don't you want me?" cried Uriana.

"You are not a child," replied Ardi, "and you ought to know that I cannot take you with me, alone, at night."

"Are you afraid of the gossips?"

"No, it is for your good that I speak."

"My good is here!" she said, raising her dark eyes. "What does the rest matter! Take me with you, I have waited for you three hours this evening, you cannot leave me here alone."

Into the dark eyes of the sailor there came a sudden light, the awakening of a fierce desire; but his brow darkened.

He was bending over the hook that held the barque strained to the shore; his head and his breast were bare. It was night now, and the fishing boats were far out upon the sea.

"Uriana," the man repeated sternly, "think well what you are doing!"

"I want to go with you!" she said, leaning toward him until her face almost touched his.

Then Ardi straightened himself, loosened the hook from the shore, unfurled the sail, and as the wind caught it slowly, the barque sped swiftly out upon the sea, under the trembling stars.

There was a brief silence between the two, then Ardi said:

"You are running an ugly risk, Uriana. Look out! Repent, while there is time. Go down into the hold, so that I shall not know you are with me."

"But I love you!" she cried, stretching out her arms to him. "I have no one in the world but you, and I will follow you wherever you go. I will be your servant, if you will only love me. For nearly a year I have waited for you. Now beat me if you like, I will follow you."

She flung herself upon his breast and threw her arms about his neck, pressing her lips boldly upon his. Her hair fell about her, covering the snow-white zendado as with a red stain.

And over the sea crept a white phosphorescence, so that the red barque seemed to be sailing on waves of silver.

The wedding followed. Rimuel made no opposition to his father's wish. He saw him renewing his youth and assented joyfully.

Uriana, in her white zendado, was beautiful and young. She would be a cheerful companion and a good housewife for the two men, lonely as they were. So she entered her new home, a blessing, welcomed by love and kindness. The storm had cleared from her breast; her dark and turbulent spirit was robed anew as with the fresh spirit of spring and she became like a child again. A touching simplicity took possession of her, a great longing for peace. With every new moon, she sang her song of contentment and incantation.

The months passed, tranquil and sweet, but the season of joy was rapidly ebbing. At first all her being seemed to soften in the consciousness of her victory over the man, whom her imagination had so ardently exalted. His love, so long passive, breaking forth in innumerable forms of sentiment and adoration, fascinated her heart so completely that she believed herself at the summit of joy. But Uriana was like the air that rages and is lulled again by forces over which it has no control.

She adored Ardi, abandoning herself to him with all the exuberance of her strong youth, showering upon him all the wealth of her womanly sweetness; she belonged to him, as the stump to the flame, that mounts hissing about it. But Ardi, in this later love, had all the weakness of a boy, his masculine vigor forsook him and his strength; he was content to obey his little queen, with the burning locks, whom he adored so humbly; for he realized now that he was growing old, whereas she was in her full bloom and flower.

Uriana had imagined a stern master, a man proud and forceful, and she had sought him with the blind abandon of the earth, that precipitates itself into the infinite, in its quest for the golden sunshine. Now she saw him before her, quiet, submissive, her slave in everything. His eyes had none of the fire, the savage rebellion, which she had formerly imagined. They gazed at her, half-imploringly, full of a tender, sentimental light; his words followed one another in whispers and pleadings half-suppressed; he obeyed, obeyed always. If she had said to him, "Stretch yourself there on the ground! I will walk over your prostrate form!" Ardi would have done it without a murmur.

She tried at times to irritate him, but in vain; she endeavored to arouse his jealousy and he only smiled at her incredulously. And so Uriana, finding herself bound to a man whom she no longer loved, gave free rein to her secret rebellion.

Growing up beside her was Rimuel, the fair youth, who was beautiful as a young god. He lived with her, breathing the same air in the small space of one house, in the smiling verdure of one garden.

In the noonday pauses, as she sat with her eyes fixed, lost in her daydreams, he would smile at her, silently; or sit at her feet, while she sang of the legends of the sea.

Stirred by the soft sweetness of the spring time, half-unconsciously, she was drawn towards him; a sudden tenderness came over her for the fair boy, with the curly silken hair and the great expressive eyes, more beautiful than words can tell.

They were alone, almost always alone, in the long days of summer, under the burning sun. She could not work for the great pain in her heart, and idled from house to garden, in a constant tremor of restlessness, of waiting; while Rimuel, seated in the blue noonday shadows, worked incessantly on some task in preparation for the great fishing season.

They smiled at one another, more and more often; they sat nearer, suddenly, both were conscious of a dark presentiment of the end. And one day, as he gazed at a tremulous little vein, as it throbbed in her temples, all of a sudden, their lips met as if sealed together.

The darts of the summer sun, shot from the quiver of love, thus found a prey.

Ardi was returning from a long voyage to Istria. He had his barque laden with lumber, resinous and sweet-smelling, and the wind was favorable. His route was towards the east; it would be a long time yet before he could trim the sail for his own peaceful little port. There were four men with him, the companions of his long voyages; and among them, one who was idle and talkative and malicious; a cross-eyed man, with an olive complexion and a flat nose, He was called Pirsant.

Pirsant had seen a great deal with those eyes of his that went in opposite, and he divined still more. He knew that the happiness of Ardi was like a breath and that he could destroy it. The mere thought of having such power over the peace of a soul, gave him a feeling of intense satisfaction. First, he reflected, in the dark silences of his imagination, on the tragedy that he was about to awaken, then, when it seemed to him that the propitious moment had come, he spoke.

They were alone one night, on the deck of the barque; Pirsant and Ardi. Pirsant was at the helm, Ardi, leaning against the high mast, watching the flickering of the lantern that was fastened to the yard-arm of the fore-sail.

The ship was running under a high wind, pitching a little in the surf, and over the men spread the great sails, that were black in the darkness and beating against the cordage like the rhythm of a pulse.

Suddenly Pirsant said: "Ardi, unless my eyes mistake me, the stars indicate that our own land is near."

The sailor raised his eyes to the heavens and nodded his head.

"How long shall we still be on the sea?" continued the man, with his eyes crossed.

"Two months or more!"

"Until the autumn?"

"Yes."

"Then we shall return in time for the feast of San Claudio. You will be taking a gown of silk to Uriana, and she will be a queen."

Ardi made no response.

"This is a stupid life of ours!" continued the steersman. "The good one has, one can enjoy very little of; and, who knows! some one else may be enjoying it in the meanwhile!"

Ardi paid no attention to the spiteful insinuation and was silent.

"Some one else may be enjoying it in the meanwhile! Distance is a danger. One never returns suddenly from the sea."

"You cross-eyed fool!" cried Ardi, turning slowly. "I don't understand you tonight. What do you mean?"

"I am only speaking in general," replied Pirsant. "I mention no names."

"And what do you know? You talk in riddles."

"I know a great deal that I keep to myself."

Ardi was on him almost with one leap and grasping him by the shoulder, he screamed:

"Tell me what you know, and beware, you squinting fool!"

"If I speak, it is for your good name!" returned the man maliciously, shaking himself free.

Then in a lower voice: "Uriana is faithless to you and so is your son! This is a fact as true as the light. You can surprise them, if you wish. I stake my life on it!"

So the red barque changed its course, veering suddenly towards the northern coast, while Pirsant, at the prow, watched the setting of the stars.

Ardi was alone when he stepped from his barque the following night. His companions had landed in a region far down the coast. He left his barque anchored at the end of the quay. No one saw him arrive, as it was late and the night was dark, with great masses of clouds. He sprang ashore, with his eyes staring into the darkness, running as if the sea were pursuing him, as if the waves, roaring and high as mountains, were at his heels.

He had no perception of what had passed; only a terrible numbness of pain that drove him forward, running madly, dishevelled through the night. He was panting, before his eyes danced

"Those Lustrous Eyes are Murine Eyes"

Beauty's Eyes

When Beauty's Eyes upon me rest,
A strange sweet thrill darts thro' my breast,
As though a perfumed, winged dart
Had pierced the region of my heart.

But oh, what anguish, what dismay,
When Beauty frowns or turns away,
When Beauty laughs, I know not why
My hopes fall earthward from the sky.

Alas, I feel how far above
My wild ambition is her love.
But when those Eyes are Bathed in tears
The crystal drops dispel my fears.

When Beauty's Eyes are closed in sleep,
Earth's loniliness o'er me creep.
Without those Eyes to shape my mood,
The world is filled with solitude.

And when they open fair again,
Life, joy and music fill my brain.
'Tis strange indeed what power lies
Within the depth of Beauty's Eyes.

My acts, my thoughts, my life control,
Those Witching Orbs command my soul.
And yet, again, their glances mild
Would soothe to sleep a fretful child.

I plucked one day a pretty flower,
And stole away to Beauty's bower,
To leave it, as an act of grace,
On Beauty's plate glass dressing case.

There Beauty sat, to my surprise,
A'dropping Murine in her eyes.
And now I know the secret art
That to her Eyes such "Glows" impart.

And whence the power and grace that lies
Within the depths of Beauty's Eyes.
And many a comely lass, I ween,
Has played the same trick—with Murine.

innumerable little flames, darting and writhing out of the shadows, the illusion of his senses. His eyes were fixed, intent, as if seeking in the impenetrable darkness, the hidden secret of their love; his pulses were beating a terrible reveille and he ran and ran, faster and faster, hurling himself forward.

Like a sudden gust of wind that sweeps past shrieking to lose itself in the spaces of the wilderness, so his whole body was shaken with sudden shudderinges of terror. He fled like the swift shadow of the sail across the sea, driven by some unseen force, past the first cottages, half hidden in the darkness.

Then the hair began to rise on his head as he seemed to hear behind him the rhythm of two bare feet, running even more swiftly than his own. Who was following him in the night? He heard them coming nearer and nearer, more and more menacing, the footsteps of the unknown, and, though he hurried faster, straining forward in a last brave attempt, the rapid footsteps caught up with him. He heard a breath, a whisper, the sound of two names intertwined, the echo of a threat; then suddenly a piercing voice, calling him by name.

"Ardi!"

Instantly he fell full length, lying on the ground. When he raised himself and looked about him, his eyes troubled and dark, he saw nothing and heard nothing.

From the distant mountains came the sound of crackling, as of a funeral pyre. The sailor made the sign of the cross on his breast; for he knew that Death had followed him.

A few steps more and he was at his own cottage.

Cautiously he slipped the key into the lock, turning it slowly to avoid a sudden creaking; he entered, closing it behind him, like one in a hypnotic state.

In the lower room, which was lighted by a lantern, he saw that Rimuel was not there. On the table were the remains of the supper, a bunch of hawthorne and two clusters of the sweet basil. It was all revealed with unmistakable clearness.

He began to climb the wooden stairway, suffering at the slightest sound, listening as he advanced slowly, stopping, closing his eyes in mute protest. All at once he stood motionless, rigid, before the low door.

The silence was intense, it seemed as if the life had stopped about him. The sailor, his pupils staring and bloodshot, was like the tragic shadows suspended over the abyss.

Then he heard a movement, a murmur and a voice heavy with sleep: "Rimuel, it is light! Look, Rimuel, Rimuel! Some one is there!"

Then came a shrill cry, the shivering of broken glass and the crash of a door, shattered by a heavy blow.

Uriana was seated on the edge of the bed, her long, red hair encircling her pallid face; she remained motionless, gazing at Ardi, without a tremor.

"Follow me!" cried the man.

Drawing her white zendado about her shoulders, barefooted, fearlessly and without a cry, she followed him to her death.

Together, united for a last time, they went to the end of the quay, where the red barque was anchored. A wind had sprung up, but the clouds were heavy and motionless.

Behind Ardi, Uriana stepped upon the barque, silently, without hesitation or fear. Her love was so great; what did the rest matter!

To the high mast, slowly, with a sailor's skill, Ardi bound her fast, with long twists and innumerable knots—the pale woman who was his wife, his once proud companion.

She gave no sign of pain as the rude ropes cut into the delicate flesh, as the blood from the wounds fell drop by drop. In the depths of her savage heart was only a bitter tumult of passion. With the sudden, strange changeableness of a woman's heart, she loved again this man of violence, who was sacrificing her to his vengeance.

When Ardi had finished his long task and stood upright, he saw that Uriana was smiling at him. He went down into the hold, returning with a fiery torch; presently the cargo of resinous lumber began to crackle here and there, throwing out little tongues of curling flame. Then he swiftly unfurled the sail and made it secure.

Amidst the first flashes he heard the voice of Uriana, imploring him sadly:

"Ardi! Kiss me once more! ..."

He ignored her. With a spring he was on the prow, casting aside the moorings, then as the barque made swift headway under the wind, he flung himself into the sea and gained the shore.

As the distance increased, the luminous flame spread, mounting upward with rosy tongues, until it towered like a threatening torch, suspended over the abysses of the sea.

The sailor gazed at the vanishing pyre, rigid and convulsed; he crouched forward, waiting for a cry, a beseeching voice, a call of love; but all he heard was the fierce crashing of the waves.

So Uriana and the barque went down together. Ah, the love that gives, the love that takes, therein lies the spirit of the sea!

Far off in the distance, the flames were scarcely visible, dying away into eternal solitudes, forever; while he, full of terror and anguish, called madly, vainly upon Death.

The beating of the heart in his breast was like the blows of an axe against the tree-trunk. Suddenly he saw near him the form of Rimuel, tragic, pitiful. The boy was scarcely breathing. As Ardi stretched out his arms to him, he fell forward with a terrible cry.

Then once more, the sailor heard the footsteps of Death, coming swiftly through the night.

Auto Notes

According to advices received by the Pacific Motor Car Co. from the Grundy Motor Car Co. of Los Angeles, a big demand is developing in Southern California for the Cole 30 car. Machines of this make are being sent out on delivery as soon as supplied by rush shipments from the factory. The Cole's popularity in Southern California had its beginning last year when Bill Endicott won his sensational victories in a Cole stock car on the Los Angeles Motordrome.

A number of Eastern automobilists are already touring California for their summer outing. Among those who have recently visited San Francisco is John B. Jones of Sioux City, Iowa, who has just begun an extensive tour of the State in his Cartercar. The car he declared is running perfectly. His speedometer shows that he has driven the machine over 10,000 miles during the past year during which time he says that not a cent has been spent on repairs.

Jos. Littlewood, Minneapolis branch manager for The F. B. Stearns Company, manufacturers of Stearns motor cars, broke all existing records last week in a wild dash from Minneapolis to St. Cloud. He covered the distance on a $1500 wager in one hour and 28 minutes, this being an average including one stop, of over 46 miles per hour.

C. A. La Rue of Davis is one of the most recent purchasers to take delivery of a Cartercar touring car. Mr. La Rue who came to San Francisco to get the machine, reported roads about Davis and between that town and Sacramento in excellent repair. A number of new machines have been brought to Davis this spring.

According to advices just received from Tahoe, the Maxwell car which is reported to have crossed the Sierra Summit did not make the trip via the new State highway to Tahoe Tavern and consequently did not lift the cup offered by that resort for the first car to make this particular trip this season.

The adoption of the worm drive by the Pierce Arrow Motor Car Company of Buffalo for its 5-ton truck has stirred up considerable interest in Europe where the worm drive for commercial vehicles has been in use successfully for a decade.

Two large additions to the plant of the Thomas B. Jeffery Company, manufacturers of Rambler Motor Cars, at Kenosha, will be made immediately. A new addition to the drop forge is now in course of erection, while ground was broken this week for a new building, 60x200 feet in dimensions, to be devoted to the finished car department. Just 22,750 square feet of additional floor space will be added.

The Red Raven, Comet and Teta motor boats made a clean sweep at the recent regatta held in conjunction with the Colusa carnival and captured all the trophies offered. The motors of these three boats were lubricated with the new Monogram Marine Motor oil. It would appear that this Monogram Marine oil is to be as large a factor in motor-boat racing as the original Monogram oil is in motor car and aeroplane contests.

A Dialect Study

Docia Trigg Cooney's "Study in Ebony" is a record of the sayings and doings of a precocious little colored girl whose short life ended in her twelfth year. Ethey had a strain of Indian and perhaps some white blood to modify the African, but in any case she combined the power of observation of her Indian and the loquacity of her negro ancestry. She was the child of Miss Graham's cook, and the mistress tacitly encouraged her conversation, which was in reality a monologue made up of negro folk lore, superstitution, shrewd observation and fertile imagination. For lack of other auditors she could talk to herself or to the flowers, the birds or the insects and her nimble fancies were a bewilderment to the slow-witted Pete, the chore boy who classed all her flights as plain lies deserving of punishment and wondered that the white lady could have patience to hearken to her. The only time that Ethey's tongue was silent was when listening to fairy tales and mythological romances related to her by the mistress or when she had coaxed Aunt Vesta into reminiscences of "Furginia" and her own childhood during slavery time. The characters are probably drawn from life and the women, though unquestionably negro, have all been house servants and are of a better class than is apt to figure in books, their language and morals approximating nearer to those of the white race. Ethey is not a type but an individual, an exception in any race or community. Taken in small doses, "A Study in Ebony" will be both interesting and amusing, but as it is written in dialect throughout, and as the author has frequently fall into the error of seeking to heighten her effects by adopting rag-time spelling that in no way modifies the pronunciation, the two hundred and eighty-four pages of childish chatter cannot but be monotonous, despite its originality. From the Neale Company.

A Good War Book

Considering that two full generations have grown up since the first call to arms was made in 1861, it is remarkable how much interest still survives in the narratives of those who participated in the action. Of late quite a number of volumes of personal reminiscences have come from the press, stories of privates who served in different branches of the army on both sides, and as they are devoid of the controversies, charges and recriminations which have been so unfortunately prominent in the histories of the officers, they make, for the layman, infinitely more interesting reading. One of the latest of these accounts is "Three Years in the Confederate Horse Artillery," the substance of which is a journal kept with remarkable regularity during the whole period in which George M. Neese served as a gunner in Chew's Battery, a unit in the command of General J. E. B. Stuart in the army of Northern Virginia. Neese, like thousands of others, was personally opposed to war, but found the call of duty stronger than his inclinations. From first to last the glory of victories never shut out the horrors of butchery, and his inclination always was to dwell more on the natural beauties of the situation than the military possibilities. The fighting was a grim and terrible business to be got through with as effectively as possible. The writer carried with him an admirable sense of humor which enabled him to see the amusing side of things, though it is never once directed against the person of friend or foe. Indeed, if the journal has not been copiously and carefully edited, it is a remarkable example of restraint, considering the time. The only approach to heat is to be found in the one or two references to "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and the ravaging of the Shenandoah Valley, the writer's home land. Though only "an humble private in the rear rank," making no pretense to understand the plans of his officers and directors, it is evident that he might have filled a higher if not a more important place, but the absence of even a frontispiece portrait is characteristic. Though he had countless narrow escapes from death or disablement, Mr. Neese passed through the war without a wound. The last eight months were spent as a prisoner of war at Point Lookout. Prisoners of war do not expect to be treated like star boarders under any circumstances, but a never-ending mystery is the question why, with abundance at command, the Confederates should have been starved, frozen and denied decencies. The treatment of the captives in the Northern prisons is as great a disgrace as the carpet bag regime of the Reconstruction period. Another good book from the press of the Neale Company.

Apropos F. Marion Crawford's posthumous volume of ghost stories, the last time the author was in New York he attended a dinner where Spiritualism was a topic under discussion. "In principle it may be true," said Mr. Crawford, "but Spiritualism as it is practiced today is a thing to beware of. I know a man whose wife suddenly developed a great interest in Spiritualism. She attended seance after seance at the home of a handsome medium with dark, thick hair and smouldering eyes. The husband cured her though. He took to accompanying her to the medium's, and at every seance he got the most passionate and tender messages from his first wife."

Sir W. Robertson Nicoll says that the pathos expended over Robert Louis Stevenson's hard fortune in having received only a hundred pounds in royalties on his 'Treasure Island" is all wasted. It is true that the author received only that sum on account but up to the present time the book has netted to author and executors the comfortable sum of four thousand four hundred pounds, quite a fortune in itself.

Lest We Forget

The question regarding the explosion that wrecked the Maine having been solved it is now proposed to tow the shattered mass of steel into the Atlantic and there sink it to the bottom. The Navy Department knows of no reason why this should not be done, believing that the wreck can serve as nothing but a memento of a most deplorable catastrophe. As a matter of fact it might serve as a memento of something else, something which the sovereign people of this country, for their own good, should never be allowed to forget: a memento of the rash impetuosity of public opinion. The explosion that wrecked the Maine should be remembered for all time for the salutary lesson available from the dark and bloody consequences which it enabled an unscrupulous and tyrannical press to precipitate through the medium of weak and faithless public servants. The cruel and unjust war with Spain, a monstrous crime which we are now expiating under the "white man's burden," was the greatest of all the notable, boasted triumphs of yellow journalism. The most powerful of all American journalists, the man who today is doing more than all our statesmen, more than all our muckrakers, more than all our apostles of discontent and innovation, toward shaping the opinion of the "most enlightened people under the sun," never claimed credit for anything with greater justice than for the darling consummation of his protracted and perfervid appeals to popular prejudice and passion in the days of the Cuban revolt against the power of Spain. And now that under his guidance we are embracing new schemes of government the effect of which will be to quicken the sensibilities of public officials under the spur of public opinion; now that we are intent upon amending the Constitution to the end that the treaty-making power of the nation shall be made of the same temperament as the pupulistic lower house of Congress, would it not be well for us to consider the Maine, how it was wrecked, and how precipitously we responded to the rabble-rousing suggestions of our incendiary Fourth Estate? If the shattered old battleship is not to be preserved let us at least revive and perpetuate the soul-stirring battle cry with which we thrilled our gallant volunteers in the dawn of a new epoch when a supplementary pension roll was in the making. Let us indeed remember the Maine; nay, lest we forget, let us have miniatures of it struck off in enduring bronze and distributed by a paternal government to serve as symbols of public opinion on the rampage.

The Honoring of Phelan

In the Bulletin the other day we read this attractive headline: "Native Sons of Golden West Honor Phelan." Beneath was a despatch from Santa Cruz:—"The Native Sons and Daughters of the Golden West disposed of much notable business at yesterday's session, but the day will be most remembered because of the hospitality extended to the delegates by Hon. James D. Phelan. Mr. Phelan extended a general invitation to all attending the convention to be his guests at his country place and from 4 to 6 o'clock the delegates were royally entertained." That was how the Native Sons honored Phelan: they accepted his royal hospitality. An honor of this kind has come to be greatly appreciated by our charming and versatile young millionaire whose appetite for distinction is more eclectic than what it used to be. A change has come o'er the temperament of the man who once made a great figure in the State, taking as he did a deep interest in general humanity. The darling object of his desires ravished from him by envious fortune, softened and subdued by habitual self-contemplation, he has become something of a stoic, calm, passive, yet companionable, viewing the busy world, however, with philosophic indifference through the loop-holes of retreat. He who once "flattered the rank breath of the world and bowed to its idolatries," would no longer condescend to barter repose for the chance of disappointment. No more does conscious worth bid for the homage of the huge monster of ingratitude which takes up its favorites in no greater haste than it puts them aside. The serene air for him of his country home on the Cliff, far above the restless surf that beats upon the rocks at Santa Cruz. Inaccessible there to the malice of man he looks down with compassion on the follies of frail mortals. No longer an object of attention or curiosity he revels in the life of a pure spirit, a surfeited spectator of the mighty scene peopled by the madding crowd. But no Timon is our seasoned philosopher. Experience has not made a misanthrope of the man who was once the most public spirited of all ambitious citizens. His raptures on the lonely shore he is ever ready to share with Native Sons, Elks, Eagles, Knights of Columbus or any other organized body of men. Welcome, thrice welcome to his shady bowers and luxurious repasts are all fraternal promoters of the brotherhood of man. Nothing gives him greater pleasure than to see the vapors of his celestial nectar ply round their susceptible hearts. The recluse of the Cliff, now easily stifled in the atmosphere of frigid clubs where he was wont to loosen up and simulate bonhomie, is still in his old responsive mood, and he needs but to be asked to grace an occasion of almost any kind. His oratory is on tap as well as his nectar for any body of men or women. In this respect he is as gracious as "Laughing" Billy Hynes and not less willing. Yet he does not appear to be so much in demand as formerly. Hence perhaps the Bulletin's effort to remind the public of him by the news of the honor that was paid him at Santa Cruz. Perhaps we shall soon hear of his distributing prizes at Sunday picnics.

The Commonwealth Debate

That was a very lively debate on the question of the advisability of applying the recall to the judiciary which was held by the Commonwealth Club last week. It was more lively than instructive. It was instructive only in the sense that it elucidated the insincerity of the proponents of the recall amendment and the ignorance of their adversaries. Most vehement among the advocates of the recall was Francis J. Heney who had very little to say of the principle involved or of any principle whatever. He addressed himself to the question of the fitness of certain judges, and made it clear that he was in favor of the recall not because it would further the ends of justice but because it might enable him to gratify his consuming passion for revenge. Preoccupied with the nursing of his grudges Mr. Heney fondly hopes to enlist the sympathy of the people of the whole State. There are three judges, he says, whom the people do not trust and whom they will recall if given the chance. Which means that Mr. Heney thinks that the venom privately and publicly circulated by the cabal which he represents has had the desired effect. W. C. Clark of Oakland who appeared as a proponent of the recall made the point that the people had come to the conclusion that the courts held property rights above personal rights; and such being the case he is in favor of employing the recall as a bludgeon to bring the courts to a sense of the will of their masters. Mr. Clark is not a profound thinker else he would perceive that there can be no protection for the individual except in the absolute independence of the courts. In this country where the people is the supreme power the judge theoretically stands between the individual and the sovereign. Mr. Clark unconsciously is in favor of giving the sovereign absolute power over the individual. In other words he is the advocate of a species of monarchical despotism. One of the leading opponents of the recall proposal in the Commonwealth debate was Warren Olney who said that the two great objections are "that it will have a bad effect upon the judiciary and that it will not accomplish what its supporters expect." These happen to be merely minor objections as Mr. Olney might learn by studying the fundamentals of the science of government. There is really but one great objection to the recall and that is that it would substitute might for right as was the case in Athens when all the horrors of a cruel despotism resulted from the administration of justice by the multitude. It will be remembered that when the Athenians resolved to put some of their military chiefs to death and were told that their action would be in violation of the laws they answered, "We made the laws and it is our privilege to suspend them." This is the privilege which the advocates of the recall would bestow on the dear people. If to the initiative and the referendum we add the recall why should the dear people suffer themselves to be restrained by one of their own statutes? What judge would be so ridiculous as to attempt to restrain them? Even now with our absurd system of electing judges the effect that Mr. Olney fears is apparent enough. A great French actress once said, "How much better we should play if we cared less for applause." How much better our judges would administer the law if they cared less for public approval?

The Maid of Domremy

In the town of Rouen where Joan of Arc was tried according to ecclesiastical justice and burned at the stake as a heretic and a witch the fifth centenary of her birth is about to be celebrated. And thus will be added another curious circumstance to the many attached to the memory of the Maid of Domremy. For hardly less remarkable than some of the events of her career is the circumstance that by the celebration now projected will be fulfilled a prophecy made by a writer to whom we are indebted for one of the most touching tributes ever paid to the memory of the great French heroine. Turn to Thomas De Quincey's beautiful essay on Joan of Arc, and there you will find the prophecy. De Quincey is the most neglected of all the great writers of English prose. A man of extraordinary genius, endowed with a mind of peculiar analytical power, a prolific producer of genuine literature, yet he is hardly known but for the bizarrerie of his "Confessions of an English Opium Eater," which, by the way, is one of the least important of his works. De Quincey made a most sympathetic study of the career of Joan of Arc, and like Andrew Lang, Saint-Beuve and the many other literary men to whose imagination and admiration she strongly appealed he tried to explained her in terms of physical science. And in the midst of his meditations and reflections he made this prophecy: "Daughter of Domremy, when the gratitude of thy king shall awaken, thou wilt be sleeping the sleep of the dead. Call her, King of France, but she will not hear thee! Cite her by thy apparitors to come and receive a robe of honor, but she will be found en contumace. When the thunders of Universal France, as even yet may happen, shall proclaim the grandeur of the poor shepherd girl that gave up all for her country, thy ear, young shepherd girl, will have been deaf for five centuries." How strange that De Quincey should have stretched the time of his fancy out to the second decade of the twentieth century and that this should be precisely the period resolved upon for the glorification of the Maid by the people of Rouen! In his day French historians guided by the love of truth were beginning to regard Joan of Arc as a pathetic figure most worthy of pity and admiration, but there was no prospect of her being taken seriously as an object of glorification. Then, as until very recently, she received her warmest commemoration from the maganimous justice of Englishmen. In 1850 the Historical Society of France collected in five volumes the history of Joan of Arc, particularly the texts of the two trials, the trial of condemnation and the trial of rehabilitation, which took place twenty-five years later, and we learn from Saint-Beuve in his review of the work that the people of France had ceased to applaud Voltaire's licentious poem Pucelle, "which," said the great critic, "he himself would be ashamed of today"; also that it was no longer safe to risk the slightest witticism on the subject. What remarkable transformations and vicissitudes has the reputation of the Maid of Orleans undergone! Burned at the stake in the early part of the fifteenth century, before its close her purity and piety affirmed as the result of a most thorough investigation; in the eighteenth century made the object of licentious ridicule by one of the intellectual lights of the age; in the nineteenth rehabilitated again; in the twentieth beatified by the church under whose authority she was condemned to the stake, and now to be glorified in the very town that witnessed her death. In all history there is not a more captivating subject of inquiry than that of the point of view from which we should regard Joan of Arc and her achievements. To account for those achievements on anything but the hypothesis of supernatural agency has been the effort of many learned men who regard every doctrine that involves miraculous phenomena as little worthy of serious refutation. But the case of Joan of Arc presents so many inexplicable prodigies attested beyond question that nobody has ever attempted to account for all of them as the result of natural agencies. Most writers assume that it is sufficient to demonstrate the possibility that what Joan believed to be a mysterious voice urging her to raise the siege of Orleans was nothing more than imagination. As Saint-Beuve points out, imagining that thoughts born from within are external or superior suggestions is a well verified fact of science, very rare, very exceptional, but by no means a miracle; rather an hallucination. This is De Quincey's and also Andrew Lang's idea. Indeed it is the idea of all writers who have too much faith in science to have any in religion: the idea, to be more explicit, of auto-suggestion which is believed to have been especially plausible with respect to Joan of Arc because she was exceedingly pious, because she lived in an age and in a country and amid scenes propitious to a credulous leaning toward the supernatural. Besides in her case there was her natural sympathy with France whose wounds were reopened at the battle of Agincourt in Joan's childhood. The calamities of her country must have lain with a great weight on her mind, giving rise to the thoughts which produced the hallucination of external suggestion. Plausible enough is this theory in the case of Joan of Arc, but hardly so in the case of Saul of Tarsus, for when that young Roman was on his way to Damascus his mind was not preoccupied with thoughts of the sufferings of the early Christians. His sympathies were not with those whom he had been persecuting. Admitting however that it was auto-suggestion that started Joan of Arc on the road to Chinon to see the Dauphin, how are we to account for the acknowledgment and approval of her by the king? Did he have a touch of auto-suggestion, too? And on what scientific principle are we to account for Joan's ability to stand the tests to which she was subjected by the learned doctors? For tests the ignorant girl was subjected to as we learn not from legend but from well-authenticated history. Then, again, how are we to account for the raising of the siege which had been holding all hearts in suspense, for the liberation of a city beleagured by an elaborate application of engineering skill unprecedented in Europe? These are perplexities which some writers have attempted to solve, but it may well be doubted whether they believe in their own solutions. The fact is that the mysterious voice which Joan heard is the easiest of all things to explain; is easier than the dove in the last scene which De Quincey mentions and without the slightest suggestion of incredulity. An English soldier who had sworn to throw a faggot on Joan's scaffold as his tribute of abhorrence, did so, and then suddenly turned away, a penitent for life, saying everywhere that he had seen a dove rising upon wings to heaven from the ashes where she had stood. Certainly if this was auto-suggestion it is not of the same principle discussed by Saint-Beuve; for the man who so abhorred the girl by whom his country's armies had been conquered that he contributed fuel to the flames that devoured her cannot have had such tender thoughts regarding the tragedy as must have been pre-requisite, according to the Saint-Beuve idea, to a mere hallucination.

The Herdsman

O herdsman driving your slow twilight flock
By darkening meadow and hedge and grassy rath;
The trees stand shuddering as you pass by;
The suddenly falling silence is your path.

Over my heart too, the shadows are creeping;
But on my heart for ever they will lie;
O happy meadows and trees and rath and hedges,
The twilight and all its flock will pass you by.

—Seumas O'Sullivan.

Correspondence

The Bandit and the Reporter

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: From reading Town Talk I have received the impression that you attribute the vices of American journalism to the demoralizing influence of the rich men who have gone into the newspaper business for the power that it gives them. I would suggest that there is some reason for believing that some of the vices may be traced to the peculiar educational system of this country which, as you have pointed out, has brutalizing tendencies. I am told that the editorial staffs of the big dailies are recruited principally from the graduating classes of the universities; that most of our reporters are college-bred men. Now there is much to be found in the news columns of the dailies to justify the charge that reporters have never had their sensibilities refined. It was because I have just run across a specimen of reporterial callousness that I write this letter. In the Chronicle's account of the capture of the boy bandit I find that he was once in love with a young woman in Los Angeles whose picture was found in his possession, "but he absolutely refused to divulge her name." This seems to imply that the reporter wanted to know her name. Why? To involve in scandal a young woman, who, for all the reporter knows, is the respectable daughter of respectable people. Now this is typical of reporters. Their curiosity is insatiable. They will not spare anybody or anything. They are absolutely ruthless, and apparently their editors cannot perceive that by the light which they are constantly reflecting on their instincts they excite disgust and bring discredit on their profession. Even the boy bandit, hardened criminal though he is, deprived of the "advantages" of higher education but schooled in the penitentiary, impresses me, in the light in which he has been presented, as a person made of better stuff than the reporter who wanted to know the name of the woman whom he was in love with.

Yours truly,

—Francis L. Banks.

The Suffrage Question

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I have read with much interest the quotations from several authors touching the capacity of the skirted sex, and still I have not made up my mind as to how I shall vote on the suffrage question. The question that I must solve for myself is not whether it is good politics to allow a women to vote but whether for certain other reasons it is desirable that women should vote. The question of capacity doesn't, or at least ought not, enter into the matter at all. It is not to be disputed that women are as well able to qualify for citizenship as man. Indeed it is hardly to be doubted that taken in the mass there is much greater intelligence, much less ignorance and illiteracy among the women of this country than among the men. But in view of the fact that ignorance (excepting the profoundest) is not a bar to citizenship why consider at all the mental capacity of the skirted sex? The only logical objection that may be made to the proposal to give the franchise to women is that by so doing we shall increase the preponderance of emotionalism as a factor in the determining of elections. But there is nothing in the principles of our government that argues the desirability of reducing the volume of emotionalism. As a matter of fact the emotions play a greater part than the intellect in our government, and if the perfection of government depends on the growth of democracy as our progressive statesmen are now asserting then it must also depend on the increase of the influence of the emotions, so why not let them vote? Were it not for other considerations I should not hesitate to be logical. Perhaps it is a sign of effeminacy and weakness and lack of patriotism in me that I am more concerned for the welfare of the sex than for the government itself. I feel that we are more indebted to women than to government for making life worth living, and therefore I think that the conservation of the sex is of paramount importance. By conserving them I mean keeping them as they are, uncertain, coy, hard to please, "variable as the shade by the light quivering aspen made." I fear that as voters and politicians they would cease to make playthings of us, quit reigning over our passions. Like Goldsmith I might find it as hard to pardon a fair one for endeavoring to wield the club of Hercules as a man for endeavoring to twirl a distaff. I appreciate the fair ones most when they persuade without argument. I cannot think of women in politics without being at once confronted by an awful looking person wearing the badge of the W. C. T. U.

Sincerely yours,

—A Bachelor

Bombastes Furioso

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Strong assertions without proof, declamation without argument, violent censures without dignity, have been heard in the land and we know that Francis J. Heney is with us again. Again the public attention has been attracted to a character which will only pass without censure when it passes without observation. The address or diatribe of Heney to the Commonwealth Club contradicted even the plainest dictates of reason. Said he of a venerable and distinguished jurist: "He is crazy. He goes into clubs loudly, noisily and boisterously proclaiming his belief in the innocence of indicted men." The gentleman thus referred to for a generation has presided with dignity, fairness and ability over the highest court of this State. A judge considered by lawyers and laymen alike as having the integrity and mental equipment to sit upon the bench adorned by a John Marshall—and yet even that man is placed in pawn to win the plaudits of the Heney claquer. "He believes indicted men are innocent." A state of mind, it seems to us, essential to the proper performance of the duty of a just judge. "He believes indicted men are innocent." Yes, Mr. Heney, perhaps he had in mind the Brobeck case, reported in volume 152, page 289 of the California Reports—to which you will note is subjoined a very interesting footnote which reads: "The indictment referred to in this opinion was subsequently dismissed by the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco upon motion of the District Attorney on the ground that there is no evidence sufficient to put said W. I. Brobeck on his defense to said charge and that in the interest and furtherance of justice the said indictment as to said W. I. Brobeck should be dismissed and discharged."—The Court. "He goes into clubs," says Heney referring to this judge, "boisterously and loudly proclaiming his belief in the innocence of indicted men—he is crazy." This is rather a benign form of mental malady when compared with the attitude of mind of a man who on the street, in the home, at the club, through the press and upon the platform, "noisily, boisterously and loudly proclaims his belief in the guilt of indicted men. We all seem to remember how Heney in his semi-judicial capacity of district attorney "roped and tied" a defendant "like a Spanish bull" on a public platform. And perhaps some of us will reflect that the man who was recently so offensive in a local club that he had to be disciplined with physical force is hardly qualified to censure another for resenting the insult of a boor. Indeed perhaps some of us may reflect that a man betrays a curious state of mind who, while violating the amenities of debate in a club, sets himself up as a critic of the conduct of another.

Respectfully,

—Junius.

XXVII—RICHARD BURKE

By Edward F. O'Day

"Of all comparisons, those instituted between cities are most likely to be odious. And yet there are many points in which Dublin and San Francisco may be compared and contrasted."

It was Richard Burke who said it, and he ought to know. For Richard Burke is a man of two cities, the same being Dublin and San Francisco. It would be difficult to say which city he knows better. For years he has been swinging from one side of the world to the other at measured intervals, a very active sort of human pendulum. Alike in Golden Gate Park and Stephens Green he is a familiar figure. As many friends hail him in the court of the Palace as grasp his hand in the Gresham on O'Connell street. In the very new Pacific-Union and in the very old United Service his advent is not distinguished as that of a traveler but celebrated as that of an old friend.

It would be invidious to inquire which city Richard Burke likes better. Dublin he loves as only an Irishman can love his country's ancient capital. For San Francisco he has a deep and abiding affection. And why not? It was here that the romance of a happy marriage came into his life when he wooed and won a daughter of the prominent Donohoe family. It was here too that his son courted and married beautiful Genevieve Walker. And he has valuable holdings here. He is, for instance, one of the owners of the lot where the Occidental Hotel used to be. His present trip to San Francisco was not unconnected with the plans for a new building on that site. While rather diffident about discussing the future of the property, he lets it be known that he would like to see a grander Occidental rise where the famous old hostelry went down to ashes.

"Wherever I travel," he says, "the old Occidental is lovingly remembered. It was a landmark of the city. When I arrived here five weeks after the fire my judgment was that it should be rebuilt on lines which would restore its old character but of course with all uptodate improvements. Since that time complications have arisen to delay action, but I am of the same opinion still."

Readers of the papers may guess, as one complication, that the owners are divided in opinion as between constructing a hotel and an office building. On sentimental grounds disinterested San Franciscans would probably cast a unanimous vote for a hotel.

Speaking of hotels, Burke prefers the American to the English and Irish system.

"When you engage a room in an American hotel," he points out, "you pay a fixed price which covers everything, but in England and Ireland you receive a bill which carries itemized amounts for your rooms, for attendance, for your lights, for fires and so on. The bill is probably smaller than your bill would be in America, but the aggregation of small items is irritating. It is much more satisfactory to pay so much a day."

Our restaurants, he admits, cannot be equalled by anything in Dublin.

"If you want a good luncheon or a good dinner in Dublin," he explains, "you must go to a hotel or a club. There are no places there like the fine establishments in San Francisco."

To our clubs also he pays high compliment.

"They are second to none in the world. And there are features of club life such as you find at the Bohemian and Olympic, that are not attempted in Dublin."

But he does not underrate the attractions of the United Service and the Stephens Green and other clubs which Irishmen have a right to compare with some of the best of those in London.

In the matter of theaters he throws up his hands.

"You are far more of a theater-going people than we are in Dublin," he says. "There are only two good theaters in Dublin. The reason of course is that we are so near London that most people go there to see the big plays.

"London," he continues, "is really the capital of Ireland. That is why the glories of the Dublin that flourished before the Union may not be restored when we get Home Rule. Before the Union Dublin had the best of society. Everybody had a good time. Art and literature flourished. All things beautiful were sought. The city had beautiful houses, beautiful pictures and the finest wines in the world, especially claret which was the favorite drink. But these things will not revive with Home Rule. London was very far away in those old days and few Dubliners went there. But steam has made a great difference. London is so easy to reach that it is the metropolis of Irishmen as well as of Englishmen."

Yes, Richard Burke believes that Home Rule is coming, as you have inferred from the foregoing. His views on Irish politics are not those of the enthusiast but of the thinker and observer who has studied events by the light of experience and under the guidance of a quiet sense of humor. Thirty years ago, when he was a young barrister in Clonmel, he thought of trying for a seat in Parliament. It was at the time of Gladstone's great land act and he probably handled more cases under the rent-fixing provisions of that act than any other man in Ireland. But he was Master of the Tipperary Hunt, the best hunt in the kingdom, and on the advice of his friend T. P. O'Connor, he decided not to try to combine the two positions. He stayed with the sport for twenty-four years and now his thoughts may be turning once more toward Parliament.

"Under a Home Rule Parliament which is imminent," he says, "I shall probably renew my early ambition."

A Home Rule Parliament! To many expatriated Irishmen it sounds too good to be true and yet there has been a wonderful renascence in every department of Irish life.

"Until recently," says Burke, "there were lots of people who had never heard of Daniel O'Connell and Robert Emmet. Many Irishmen were under the impression that Ireland had no history to boast of. They were told so and they believed it. It was the settled policy of England to wipe out the faith, the literature and the customs of the country. Why, the Duke of Wellington once expressed regret that he was an Irishman. If he were living today he'd wear a green hat. I can remember when people were prosecuted for playing 'The Wearin' of the Green,' but now it is given by the military bands all over the country.

"All things Irish are much sought after. In the public market Irish publications of earlier date fetch a great deal of money. The love of art has been stimulated by the opening of the Municipal Gallery which has a splendid collection of modern masters. The literary movement is growing stronger and stronger all the time. There is a great demand for old Irish silver and Irish glassware and no wonder, as the specimens extant are very beautiful. The best period for Irish silver was from the end of the seventeenth to the middle of the eighteenth century. Glass factories too were numerous, the most famous being at Waterford. It is now nearly one hundred years since glass was made there and what remains is exceedingly valuable. No modern makers have succeeded in imitating it. And we had more than our share of the best engravers. Just to mention three names, there were Thomas Burke, John Jones and J. R. Smith, masters of the art whose prints used to sell in Grafton street, Dublin, or in Bond street, London, for two and six. Now they fetch several hundred pounds."

In this matter of antiquity of course we cannot hope to rival things Irish for many generations. But in more modern things? Well, Richard Burke, good Dubliner that he is, is not prepared to admit that our street cars are as good as the trams of the older city. He points out too that Dublin has its municipal water supply and that the city has a plant for electric-lighting the public buildings. Certainly we are behind there. And what have we, he asks, to rival the Dublin Museum, the Royal Irish Academy and the great library of Trinity College. And as for railway depots, there are six fine depots in Dublin, while San Francisco—but that is a sore subject with us.

Not that Burke is aggressive in these comparisons. He made them very unwillingly. I had to draw them out of him. He is entirely satisfied with San Francisco and does not come here as a critic but as one of us. And yet, if he had to make his choice between the two towns as a place of fixed abode, I think I know which one he would choose. Down deep in his heart, I think, the situation is formulated thus:

"Not that I love San Francisco less but Dublin more."

Can you blame him? I leave the answer to any Irishman.

Summer Love

By Richard Skowronnek (From the German)

Immediately on receipt of her letter, he hastened to the railway station, took the first express train to the Austrian frontier, and traveled the whole night. At Orderberg he was obliged to change cars and board an agonizingly slow local, as no other trains stopped at his destination.

Zdarnow, Galicia!

This was the place named in her letter, but no railway guide consulted by him mentioned a station of that name. The railway officials in Berlin advised him to buy a ticket to the Austrian frontier and to inquire further there. Luckily, a few miles beyond Breslau, he chanced to obtain the desired information from a traveling companion. Zdarnow was a little Polish country town inhabited mostly by Jews, about an hour's ride this side of Cracow.

And now he stood shivering and yawning outside the little depot which the Austrian State Administration in its inscrutable wisdom had placed several miles away from the town to which it naturally belonged.

A drizzling rain had succeeded the impenetrable fog, and he could now see a stretch of the country road, flanked by two rows of melancholy willows. It resembled a sluggish stream of viscous mire, dotted here and there with large boulders that rose out of the mud like islands. An antediluvian vehicle was stationed near the depot, but its appearance was more depressing, if anything, than the stream of mire. The body of the cart was made of wicker work, and it was supported by four rickety wheels. A miserable nag, looking like a huge bag of bones, was harnessed to it by a rope.

Yankel Abramek, the owner of the outfit, had in the meanwhile coolly gathered up the luggage of the traveler, and motioned him with an inviting gesture to get in.

"This road wasn't made for Excellency's patent leather shoes," he remarked. "You may just as well get in. What's the odds?"

To the somewhat dubious inquiry whether the cart might get stuck in the mud, the Galician Jehu replied with a contemptuous shrug of his shoulders:

"Stuck in the mud? The wagon is solid enough to take you to America. And the horse? When he gets started, he goes as fast as a locomotive."

While the speed developed by the beast failed to come up to Abramek's promises, the traveler, by watching the trees along the road, was soon able to observe a certain rate of progress, and beneath the mire there was evidently a stratum of stones and little ravines, which made a sort of pavement, and preserved the vehicle from sinking bodily into the mud.

Abramek was dressed in a long Galician kaftan reaching down to his heels and charitably concealing the rest of his attire. His intimate knowledge of the road helped him to avoid to some extent the consequences of the vehicle's contact with the treacherous shoals in the miry sea, which jerked the passenger almost from his seat.

By and by the driver respectfully inquired where the "baron" came from.

"From Berlin."

"From Berlin? Blessed be the name of the God of Israel!" Greatly impressed by the reply vouchsafed him, Abramek raised his bushy eyebrows, and attempted to goad his horse by a few blows of the whip to an increased tempo.

After a few minutes' silence the driver continued:

"Excuse me, Herr Baron, but if you are from Berlin, what can you be looking for in Zdarnow?"

Herr Eekensteen smiled involuntarily. The inquiry betrayed a boundless astonishment that any inhabitant of the great city of Berlin should voluntarily undertake a special journey to so forsaken a spot as Zdarnow, and the contemptuous tone with which Abramek pronounced the name of his native town was inimitable.

What was he seeking in Zdarnow?

The story was done with long ago. It was all over. A sequel or a different ending at this time seemed so foolish.

Two years had passed since the day when he had seen her last, and the memory of that scene was now so dim that he could hardly recall her features with clearness. Only the sound of her voice remained in his ears: the silvery cadence of her laugh, and a certain peculiar intonation with which she would commence to speak if startled out of a reverie—tremulously clear, like the sudden ringing of a bell in the distance.

Two short years ago they would have sworn that eternity would not part them. She had clung to his neck, and vowed again and again that she would break the fetters that bound her to another. And how earnestly they had built their castles in the air!

As the little steamboat bore him away the next morning from the narrow island in the Quenaro, he ground his teeth in an endeavor to stifle a sob. She was standing on a rock, her white dress fluttering in the wind. His eyes were fixed avidly on the slender figure; he leaned against the railing and watched her until nothing was left of her form save a tiny white speck outlined against the black rock.

Then they corresponded. He wrote her of his hopes and dreams, of his efforts to prepare a home worthy of the pampered child of fortune. Her letters were full of droll notions. She gossiped about the silly women in the hotel, and complained of her cousin, an Austrian cavalry officer, who suddenly made his appearance in the resort and pursued her with his attentions. She assured him of her constancy, and like a shout of triumph there rang in her letters the confident hope of a speedy reunion that should know no parting. One of these epistles impressed itself upon his memory with special force, for it reflected her personality more truly than most of the others.

I am sitting alone in the little chapel on Monte Giovanni, whither I have fled for refuge from the intolerable gossip of the colonel's wife. At times I listen to her with pleasure—that is, when she speaks of you. My cousin, Ladislas, has just left me in a towering rage, for when he asked me to whom I was writing, I answered: "To my sweet lord and master." He is jealous, poor fellow, and does not know his rival. But I must be careful, for though he has no scruples against starting a flirtation with the wife of his cousin, he would be the first to betray me to my husband. Sometimes I have a suspicion that he is here to spy on me. What else could have brought him to Lussin? He is surely no invalid. Well, here I am sitting all alone, and all sorts of absurd notions are running through my brain. At times I shudder when I think of my homecoming, of the moment when I shall meet him and tell him: "I love another, we must part." I believe he will kill me. And the colonel's wife, with whom I discussed the affair (academically, of course) told me a perfectly horrid story of a husband coolly cutting his wife's throat in a similar situation. Do you think he would do a thing like that? How silly, when you do not even know him! I forgot that. Very odd, dearest, is it not, that you two have never met? (I was about to say something, but will suppress it as being too risque). And the colonel's wife says that divorces are no longer fashionable. I find that idea, however, too absurd, especially as a menage a trois in our case would be utterly impracticable. We both have a far higher conception of our love. Besides, you desire me to obtain a divorce, and your desire is to me a law, my beloved master. Tell me, dearest, you really do not mind the nonsense I am writing, do you? I must stop now, for it is growing dark and the air is chilly. But within me all is rosy bright, like the glow of the sunset yonder on the summits of Velebit. All is glowing and happy within me as I think of our future. Farewell. I embrace you and kiss you in my thoughts and I love you madly.

And then, after an interval of four weeks, her last letter:

My dearest, I am but a wretched beggar, for I have lost the costliest of my possessions, my hope for the future. I have wallowed in the dust at his feet, but he will not set me free; and as I persisted, he threatened to shut me up in a madhouse unless I returned to reason. For more than a week I have struggled with him daily for my freedom, but my strength is gone, and I have given up the fight. I lack courage to take that last step—to leave him and the child; for though I am sure of your loyalty, beloved, I doubt myself. I am not sure that some day I might not long for that which I shall have lost forever. Perhaps if the path were clear for me to become your wife—! As it is, I am afraid.

Let us then part, and be not angry. I embrace you for the last time, and shall never forget you.

Two years had passed since he received that letter. At first, he felt that he would never be able to master his sorrow, and even many months later, when the wounds of his heart had seemingly healed, he would drain anew the bitter cup of his loss whenever he chanced to see some woman who resembled her in feature or in manner. Then he passed days of dull despair and dark brooding. He might never have pulled himself together had not his first successful paintings plucked him out of the nameless crowds at that critical moment and placed him alongside of the foremost living masters of his art.

In the days that followed the farewell on the Lussin, he had commenced a picture in which he sought to reproduce her form as she appeared to him on the rock at Lussin Grande, waving her tender farewell. He left it uncompleted, and when, after a lapse of time, he had picked it up, he obeyed a sudden impulse to finish it. He thought that he might thus rid his soul of the burden that oppressed it. When he stood face to face with his completed work, he realized that he had put into it something entirely

Trouble for Turkey

There is a well defined belief in Europe that Russia and England have reached an agreement which, if carried out, will end in the driving of Turkey from Europe. They have adopted the policy which they agreed on in the summer of 1908 when King Edward met the Czar at Reval, a policy that was the immediate cause of the Turkish revolution in that its interference in the internal affairs of the Ottoman Empire offended enough politico-military sentiment in Turkey to enable the committee to overthrow Abdul Hamid. That policy was left in abeyance until time should show whether the Young Turks and their constitutional parliamentary system could produce a decent administration. The verdict of the Russian and apparently of the British Government is hostile. England, according to the view taken in Europe, has completely reversed her old time policy toward the Turkish Empire. Toward the end of his career the late Lord Salisbury said that in the Russo-Turkish problem England had put her money on the wrong horse. Now she has stopped even hedging on her stake and gone over to the Russian and the original Gladstonian policy that the Turk as a political administrator must get out of Europe bag and baggage. Presented graphically, the process now being applied resembles the upper and nether millstone at work and Constantinople being ground between them. Russia in the Macedonian north and England in the Arabian south are regarded as engaged deliberately in destroying the authority of the Turkish central Government at Constantinople. The motive for the present inflexible hostility of the two Governments to the new Turkish regime is by no means based on altruistic sympathy with oppressed Christian nationalities nor even on treaty rights. It springs from the conviction held by Russia and England that Turkey is not to be trusted. Moreover they think that she is not to be feared. Her sole strength in the way of prestige is the German organization of her army, and since the present year began this newly modelled army has been subjected north and south to continuous humiliation. Many Russians go so far as to hold that the present movement will finish the Ottoman Empire and the Sublime Porte, that the Turkish administrative system as it exists at present will be relegated to Asia Minor with its capital at Bagdad, and that it will rank approximately with Persia among the political powers.

Absinthe Consumption in France

Statistics recently published show that France drinks annually more absinthe than all the rest of the world put together. The consumption in 1910 amounted to 36,000,000 litres, compared with 700,000 in 1874; while the total quantity of alcohol drunk reached the enormous figure of 129,000,000 litres, or three and a third litres per head. The amount has been gradually rising since 1840, when each inhabitant accounted for only one litre on the average. It is believed that even the huge figure falls short of the truth, owing to fraudulent returns. To combat this state of things, which is feared by many to be sapping the strength of the country, a temperance movement has been afoot for some years past, but has met with very little success. Now the government has arranged to give special courses of lessons to children, teaching the evils, direct and indirect, of alcoholism; and a textbook has been written by the director of a hospital and a headmaster, showing the ravages made by habitual drinking on the human body and giving examples of the gradual degeneration of the nation from this cause.

Record Sentry Duty

A Russian private soldier named Mednikoff owes his sudden promotion to the rank of a non-commissioned officer to the fact that he stood on sentry duty for thirty-two hours on end. Mednikoff belonged to the Twenty-first Regiment of Sappers at Gitomir, a garrison town in western Russia, and was detailed to guard a powder magazine situated about two miles distance from the town. At 1 o'clock in the morning he took up his post, expecting to be relieved at 6 o'clock, but no one came. There he stood, foodless and exposed to inclement weather, all the next day and the whole of the following night, until 9 o'clock a. m. on the second day, when through sheer exhaustion he fell down in a faint. The explanation was that the regimental commander had committed suicide and in the ensuing confusion the sentry had been forgotten. The case was reported to the Czar, who forthwith made Mednikoff a non-commissioned officer and sent him a present of $12.50.

The Thunder Cure

Another case has been added to the long list of those who are said to have been cured of deafness and dumbness by a sudden shock. This time the story comes from Amiens, France, where a woman is said to have recovered her speech after a particularly loud clap of thunder. There have been heavy storms in the region for the last few days, accompanied with hail, rain, thunder, and lightning, and trees in some places have been pulled up by the roots. At others lightning struck houses and barns and horses and cattle have been killed. A woman 48 years of age, the wife of a workman, had completely lost her speech since 1905. She was still able to hear, but the only way she had of communicating with anyone was by writing. She was subjected to various treatments, among others that of electricity; but they seemed to have no effect. During the recent thunderstorms she was seized with a terrible nervous attack, and suddenly she recovered her speech, and is now able to converse as easily as before. Several physicians have gone to question here, and her cure is talked of as almost miraculous.

Teddy's Secretary Naturalized

Through the application for his naturalization papers in the naturalization bureau of the United States Circuit Court last week, it became known that Colonel Theodore Roosevelt's new secretary, Frank Harper, is not an American citizen. The young man apologized for not making his application sooner, and explained to the officials in charge that he would have done so but for the fact that the former President has been keeping him so busy that he has not had time to make the journey to the courthouse. He is 27 years of age and was born in Birmingham, England. When he appeared at the naturalization bureau he got into line with a nondescript horde of Russians, Poles and Italians, prepared to wait his turn with the rest of them. Someone in the building recognized him and had him brought into one of the inner offices, where his papers were issued without delay so that he could return to his duties. Colonel Roosevelt was waiting for him when he got back, and proceeded to dictate a trunk full of correspondence to him that made amends for the time he lost. But some mean persons are asking, Were there no native born voters fit to handle the Colonel's mail?

"Straining at a Hair"

Under this heading the San Bernardino Sun takes "a fall out of" the progressive railroad commission, as follows:

With some astonishment, The Sun confesses that it had looked for bigger and better things from the reconstituted railroad commission in California than to have it land on school children as among its first trophies. But the latest news is that "special rates made to school children by transportation companies have been declared discriminatory, by the State Railroad Commission." An order has been issued by the commission calling upon the transportation companies to either do away with the school rate or allow all other children up to the age of 18 years the same rate of fare when such children are traveling under similar conditions. In other words if a child makes a trip between certain points during what are considered school hours, that child will be entitled to the same rate as a student even though the child does not attend school. Just what action the electric and steam roads will take because of the commission's ruling is not known, but it is believed the school rate, which is about 60 per cent of the regular full fare, will be abolished entirely. We'll confess that jars us a bit. In all cities it has been customary for the street car lines to make a special rate applicable to school children really a half rate, so that those residing at some distance from their schools might use the cars. But the wise men of the railroad commission say that's "discriminatory." It is. But if the commission wipes out all the more serious discriminations, it will have its hands full for a long time to come, and let the school children alone.

Revising the Vulgate

Dom Gasquet, the great Biblical scholar, from his cell in the great Benedictine stronghold in Rome, is quietly directing the stupendous undertaking of revising the Vulgate version of the Bible. Since the first report of the work was issued two years have passed, and much progress has been made, but the careful and systematic collation of all the most important codices will take more time and money than was expected. One of the methods is to obtain copies of as many texts as possible through photography. An indication of the enormous work which this one item means is seen in the trial volume, which has the variants of Exodus alone, and consists of thirty MS. readings. Spain, Austria, and a part of Germany have already been searched. The manuscripts of Munich were so numerous that nothing after the thirteenth century was looked at. America has had her share in helping the work, as J. Pierpont Morgan is the possessor of part of what are known as the Golden Gospels, the rest of them being in the Musee Germanique, Nuremberg.

The Spectator

The Fair Site

We shall soon know whether it is to be put in the Park, at Harbor View or at Lake Merced. Perhaps the scrap will have been brought to a close before this page comes off the press. It has been a pretty lively scrap, and the partisans of each of the sites have displayed a good deal of feeling, but I think they may be depended upon to get together when it is all over and agree that the site selected is the best. For any of the three sites will serve the purpose, and as there has been very little wholly distinterested partisanship the partisans that lose will hardly be justified in making faces at the victors. The most popular of all the sites—the Park—is undoubtedly the one that has been backed by the greatest amount of selfishness. "Put it in the Park" has been the slogan chiefly of dealers in sand lots and small property owners in Richmond and Sunset. But there are many people in favor of the Park site whose judgment was influenced by no selfish interest, just as there are many who opposed the selection of the Park on civic considerations alone. Among the supporters of Harbor View are many persons who believe it to be best suited to the purpose because of the facilities it affords for marine effects and because its selection would necessitate many important public improvements, such, for example, as a tunnel the effect of which would be to bring a now remote and populous district into the heart of the city. The same argument applies to Lake Merced. So we see that whatever be the judgment of the committee there will be no substantial reason for public disappointment, for each site has its advantages.

The Psychological Teredo

Some harrowing pictures of imminent catastrophe have been drawn for us by the most veracious of all our contemporaries, pictures that have started gooseflesh on many a timid commuter and caused that credulous person, the average citizen, to stare pop-eyed at the tower of the ferry building, his emotions keyed to the highest pitch by the expectation of seeing it suddenly collapse or topple into the bay. The story of the piles honeycombed with decay, by voracious teredos made like unto sieves, far worse at any rate than Swiss cheese, has filled us all with horror and alarm. Doubtless some of us have also been filled with indignation while reflecting on the criminal negligence of the bad politicians who formerly mismanaged affairs on the water front. And doubtless, too, some of us have felictated ourselves on our wisdom in voting for that grand young man Hiram Johnson who swept the bad politicians out of office and thus sweetened the public service and saved the ferry building. If I have not been moved by the harrowing pictures and the startling story of the prospect of appalling catastrophe, it is not because I am less emotional than the average citizen. The truth is, I fear, that when I read of the diver who came up from below, his pale face telling the story of terror that transfixed him when he saw the state of the piles, I might have experienced a sensation of horror had I not been accosted at that moment by my antique friend the sceptic philosopher who winds the ferry clock.

The Real Dope

The clock man gave me some inside information. "This teredo pile-feeding stunt," he said, "is a continuous performance. Every little while it is necessary to put in new piles, and sometimes they are put in oftener than necessary. I have yet to know a commission that was so economical with the people's money as to be reluctant to spend it for piles."

"How about the building," I asked; "is it safe?"

"As safe," he replied, "as it was the morning of the earthquake, and its stability seemed conclusive on that occasion."

"Well, what's all this noise about," I asked.

The man that winds the ferry clock seemed amused to find me so unsophisticated. "You appear to have forgotten about the ten million bond issue," he said. "The commissioners have ten million dollars to spend on the water front in the next two years, and naturally they want the people to be prepared to appreciate the spending of it. Don't be alarmed about the building. There's never a tremor in it save when Hale and Dwyer with a full cargo of dignity appear on the job simultaneously. Then it vibrates and the clock loses a minute. But don't worry."

Having thus kindly admonished me my grizzled friend took up his key and walked.

Our Progressive Governor

Why all this pother about the discovery that Governor Johnson's railroad commission amendment is designed to give His Excellency power over the railroads for six years after the expiration of his term of office? Governor Johnson has done nothing to weaken our confidence in his integrity or our faith in his uncompromising devotion to the plain people. We elected Hiram Johnson to the gubernatorial office that he might regulate our railroads, and if in his judgment it will take him till 1921 to get them well in hand we should vindicate our confidence in him by voting for his pet amendment. From this amendment it is to be inferred that Governor Johnson has no intention of abandoning the work of reformation at the end of his term. It is to be inferred that he purposes even as a private citizen to continue the good work which he is now prosecuting with the assistance of patriotic attorneys of the Western Pacific. I hold no brief for Governor Johnson, but I am in favor of giving him as much rope as he wants and letting him go as far as he likes. If Senator Lee Gates is opposed to the amendment then he must be classed as a reactionary and a friend of the Octopus.

The City of Delight

Chief of Police White, though he never wore a locust or grinned behind a star, appears to have a sense of the first duty of the head of a police department. He told the reporters the other day that he had no intention of taking them into his confidence, preferring to let the public discover his policy from his acts rather than from his talk. Not since Pat Crowley's day have we had a chief who considered it unnecessary to employ a brass-band to signalize his performances. And tradition tells us that Pat was an effective policeman. He never talked about the lid or the morals of the tenderloin, but when things went wrong he mended them without any fuss, and though Kearny street and Grant avenue were spotted with dives as far south as Market the old town was reckoned a pretty good place to live in. And there are some folks who still have a good word to say about this thriving metropolis notwithstanding that it is never, but always about to be, as virtuous as the newspapers would have it. Of course there is much dissatisfaction with the existing order of things. But the memory of the oldest inhabitant runs not to the time when everybody was happy and the goose was hanging high. Nor was there ever perhaps less dissatisfaction than there is at this moment. The fact is there are some people whose hearts are always throbbing with moral indignation. And as to the press, the conscience of it is worn to the bone by its continuous solicitude for the morals of its neighbors. There are editors whose souls are forever steeped in moral wrath. They are of the type that hates gambling in Chinatown and shares with the white lottery dealers the profits of their enormous business. Their faculties are benumbed from fighting evil all the time and never thinking of the good things of life. If they should quit bruising the serpent they wouldn't know what to do. Jeremiahing is their vocation and they must stick to it. On their horizon they can see nothing but Circe's palace where men are being transformed to swine to wallow in congenial mud. There is really more need of a rescue expedition in their behalf than in the interest of the votaries of the turkey-trot. Something ought to be done to persuade them to enjoy a little relaxation from reform and look about them and be frankly pleased with this beautiful city which is now so good that it is entertaining a Sunday School Convention and extending its hospitality to the platitudes of ministers from everywhere. There is really a lot to enjoy in San Francisco. Of local color there is no end, of atmosphere there are forty-seven varieties and when the sun is out we have beautiful sunsets, and when the refreshing fog wraps us our park with its illusions that abound in the misty distance is paradise to any man who possesses the luxury of an imagination.

Once More the Turkey Trot

The turkey trot is to become a dance of national fame. Word comes that the "Follies of 1911" will contain a scene in which the "Anna Held girls" will execute its entrancing measures with strict fidelity, their studies having been made right here in San Francisco. And so Broadway is to have a chance to decide whether Mary Garden had a right to be shocked, provided always that she was really and truly shocked, a thing which some of the knowing ones persist in denying. The turkey trot apparently will not down, though it is being soundly berated. It was introduced at Santa Cruz by the blithe spirits who hied them thither to celebrate the opening of Fred Swanton's big beach hotel, but the Santa Cruz editors immediately repudiated it with virtuous heat. In Sacramento the Union has swatted it unmercifully, having found tender girls dancing it at Oak Park Pavilion. But here in the "Paris of America" its pagan sinuosities continue to hold men and women in thrall. Even money is being wagered that it will be danced at the smart affairs this winter, but of course this is a sporting proposition and we all know that gambling is a greater evil than dancing. Even the police frown on gambling while the dance goes merrily on. The popularity of the turkey trot may be inferred from the fact that the knowing Menippus who writes from San Francisco to the Stockton Mail has been trying to formulate rules for it. "To hug the lady with the peroxide hair and gold teeth as closely as possible constitutes rule one," says this pseudo-authority. "Walking backward in step then develops a peculiar sidewise swaying motion which the lady never fails to perform with great gusto. Then they rub up against the bar and the steam-slinger hands the fair (chemically speaking) partner a blue ticket, redeemable at two bits. Beer costs fifty cents a pint at Cowboy Mag's." Which of course is an intolerable libel on the latest eccentricity of frolicsome Terpsichore.

Mary Garden's Vindication

Mary Garden left San Francisco under a cloud. That is, her reputation for good-fellowship was under a cloud. The dailies reported that the turkey-trot had shocked her just as the tame and jejune waltz shocked the prudes in Byron's day, and the news of Mary's objection to a mildly libidinous dance of fashionable as well as vulgar vogue was as painful to many of her admirers as the news of a clergyman's fall from grace is to the pious members of his congregation. But from recent advices it appears that Mary was done a grievous injustice. It has been explained that she objected to our barnyard dance only when it was danced by a gentleman for whom she had a very tender regard with a woman to whom he had not received an introduction. There are certain proprieties for which Mary is a stickler on peculiarly personal grounds. That she is no prude she publicly demonstrated when she started for Europe on the Kaiser Whilhelm der Grosse. In their description of her spectacular departure the newspapers might have given her ample vindication, but they were more or less disingenuous leaving much to the imagination. The New York Sun, for example, employed as a headline these words, "Ice, Give Mary Garden Ice," but the reporter neglected to say whether she wanted the ice to sit on or to eat. She told the reporter that she had forty-five pairs of American shoes and exhibited a pair she had about her person and when she rushed up the gangplank "her American shoes were entirely visible." Furthermore "as the ship moved out somebody's shoes were hanging over the rail." Now this is all very indefinite. And no matter how many papers you read you cannot get all the facts. Apparently all the reporters were under restraint. But by compounding the accounts of Mary's departure and thus forming a coherent, composite picture one is able to glimpse a lady doing the turkey-trot, the Texas-tommy and the old-fashioned can-can all at the same time and with variations.

Our "Potes"—an Addition

Let us add Dunk McPherson, editor of the Santa Cruz Sentinel and newly chosen Commissioner of the city by the pounding surf, to our list of California bards. Dunk, at whom Ambrose Bierce hasn't frowned for many years, offers this gem of purest ray serene:

Better Be Careful

A Mentor they call the Recall
Is watching you councilmen all;
Says: "Look ere you leap;
Still waters run deep;
Pride ever precedeth a fall."

Dunk doesn't seem to know that the limerick has been recalled and the daffydil elected in its place.

Some Daggett Stories

Editor Goodwin of Salt Lake City has been reminiscing about the big men with whom he was associated during his earlier years on the Pacific Coast and has just delivered himself of a delightful paper on Rollin M. Daggett. This is a fruitful topic, for Daggett, as founder of the old Golden Era of this city and afterwards as co-worker with Mark Twain, J. T. Goodman and Dan DeQuille on the Territorial Enterprise of Virginia City, was an ever bubbling fountain of wit and humor. And the personal magnetism of the man disarmed those who had every reason to feel unfriendly towards him. For instance: After the Civil War when General Sheridan was in command of the Department of the South, he sent word to Washington that the legislature of Louisiana was made up of banditti and asked permission to dissolve it. The request caused a great sensation everywhere, especially among the Democrats. There was a Democratic editor in Virginia City whom Editor Goodwin disguises in the name of Snyder. Snyder editorialized to the effect that Sheridan's demand was sufficient to justify another rebellion. Daggett resolved to silence this inflammatory talk, so he wrote: "Mr. Snyder paid his respects to Lieutenant General Sheridan in last evening's Chronicle. It was good of him thus to remember an old companion in arms. Both were in the service. When Sheridan was planning a raid on the Shenandoah Valley, Snyder was planning a raid on a government safe. Both succeeded. Sheridan cleaned out the valley; Snyder cleaned out the safe." Goodwin told Daggett that Snyder would kill him for that editorial. "The article appeared in the next morning's paper," says Goodwin. "I saw no more of Dagget until after dinner the next evening, when he and Snyder came in, each a little mellow. They had been dining together."

Muckraking a Dairy

Here is another typical Daggett yarn: Daggett and myself were quietly at work one afternoon when a man, unannounced, came in, walked straight to Daggett, and presenting a folded Enterprise to him said: "Daggett, that is a shame. My cows are as well fed as any man's and the milk I sell is rich and sweet." Daggett took the paper, glanced at the heading, "Swill Milk," swiftly read it over and knew that one of the reporters had been writing up the man's dairy in not very complimentary terms; then turning upon the man an indignant face, said: "You are a pretty man to come to me. I was down by your corral night before last," (he had not been there in three years) "and as I walked along the high-board fence, I heard your cows gnawing bones, and when I turned the corner they looked up at me and growled like dogs." The man dropped his hands, exclaimed, "Well, by—," turned and left the office.

Citing an Authority

This also is worth repeating: General Thomas H. Williams was one of Virginia City's great lawyers. He carried through successfully a difficult law suit, and his client gave him a small fee and 1,800 old shares of Con. Virginia stock. Williams tried to sell it, but the mine was in borasca then and on the stock board was rated at only a few cents a share. But after a while whispers began to be circulated that there was something in Con. Virginia, and the stock began to creep up. Then the shares were multiplied by five; but they continued to creep up; then to jump; then to soar and Williams woke up one morning to find himself worth $12,000,000. It was not long until it began to be told that General Williams was a candidate for the U. S. Senate. Hearing of this Dagget wrote and published an article, giving some data in Williams' record, calculated to depress Mr. Williams' hopes of success. The General met Daggett next morning and trembling with anger, through white lips demanded to know Daggett's authority for what he had said to him. Daggett named a not very brilliant lawyer who was a half pensioner on Williams. Williams bowed and walked out. An hour later this man whom Daggett had named burst into the editorial rooms and demanded in almost uncontrollable anger, if he had given General Williams him as authority for the infamous article he had written. Daggett turned in his chair, seemed to be thinking for an instant and then said: "I believe I did." "Well, on what grounds?" was the next demand. "It was this way," said Daggett: "Williams came on me sudden-like, and you were the first son of a gun that came into my mind."

Ruef, Philosopher, Socialist

According to recent report in one of the dailies Abe Ruef is behaving at San Quentin like a man whose mental faculties are breaking down. This was the impression he made on an acquaintance who saw him a few weeks ago. Nothing like this impression has been received by the prison officials from whom I hear that Ruef is the most popular man in the village. Like a true philosopher, they say, he has adapted himself to his environment and is taking a sympathetic interest in the affairs of his fellow prisoners, many of whom are grateful to him for acts of kindness. At present he is the most active of all the members of the Fourth of July Committee of San Quentin, and it is said that he will make the celebration the finest, the most elaborate that was ever witnessed in the penitentiary. There is to be a big vaudeville performance in the evening and Ruef is to be the impresario. He has rented a piano in this city for the occasion, and it has been shipped over to the prison. He commissioned a friend to buy wigs and other essential accessories of a theatrical performance, and he has also written a vaudeville sketch. I am told that the ex-boss has become something of a socialist and that he has done a good deal of uplifting. My informant tells me that prisoners who are eligible to parole and who are without money and without friends beyond the prison walls are nearly always "staked" by long-termers who have saved a little money; that indeed there is never any difficulty in having a purse made up out of the savings of prisoners. But since Ruef arrived at San Quentin he has done all the purse-making.

What Does He Mean?

The heat of the daffydil season seems to have affected the Sunday School reporter of the Examiner in more ways than one. Thus we find him warning the assembled hosts of Bible teachers against the "allurements of this greatest of world's fair cities" among which he counts "the strong call of the sea and the beckoning voice of the mountains." Just how a voice can beckon he fails to explain, but that is aside from the question. He goes on: "San Francisco and California never have held themselves responsible for their attractions, and they want to give notice to the International Sunday School Association that if any delegate should be found asleep at the edge of the ocean or a-daze in a bed of poppies, we and ours will plead not guilty and demand a jury trial." "Asleep at the edge of the ocean or a-daze in a bed of poppies!" Does the writer infer that the Sunday School teachers may get drunk at the beach resorts or "hit the pipe" in Chinatown? If not, just what does he mean?

Speaking of Daffydils

Speaking of daffydils, there are other indications that the silly season is upon us. The heat is affecting the editors. They think not neither do they care what webs of words they spin so long as the column is filled up. Thus we have Editor Milnes of the San Jose Times penning the editorial theological. His subject is the Gospel of St. John. "It is beautiful reading," he hazards. "The mystic introduction, anticipating much of the Gnostic doctrines of the Logos, cannot fail to interest those who think." The Gnostic doctrines of the Logos! Has Editor Milnes bought him the new Britannica that he waxes so learned? To get even Editor "Black" Hayes will have to discourse on "Homoousion and Homoiousion." Further to the southward, where the heat blisters the prunes, Editor Rowell gives us the editorial satirico-classical. To his perfervid vision William Randolph Hearst becomes an Atlas supporting the world and to vindicate his book learning he quotes:

Atlas en ipse laborat,
Vixque suis umeris candentem sustinet axem.

How many Republican subscribers in the maritime city of Fresno know the difference between this Atlas and the school geography?

A Disgusted Statesman

"Billy" Kent, the rollicking, spendthrift millionaire of Marin has dropped out of sight in Washington. So I am informed by the special Washington correspondent of Sacramento's leading journal, the Union. "He is very much disgusted with the way Congress transacts business," says the correspondent, but instead of staying on the job and trying to set things right he "shows his disgust by remaining away. He sometimes responds to the roll-calls but not always." From the same source I learn that "Billy" is still insurging against the President being sore "because of prosecutions instituted against his cattle company for illegal fencing of public lands in Nevada and because he has not been allowed to settle on his own terms." He is expected to show his resentment by rounding up the California delegation for La Follette. If "Billy" sticks to "Battle Bob" President Taft may have some difficulty in getting California's votes in the convention, for the man from the second district is no piker in politics. He and "Rebate" Earl of Los Angeles are the only prodigal angels of the Progressives in California, and whenever either signifies his intention of broaching a barrel all the leading patriots of journalism and politics stand ready to concur in the golden sentiments of the moment. At this moment, however, the insurgents in Washington are falling over one another in their mad rush for the President's band-wagon, and the La Follette boom is fast petering to extinction.

Wails from Alameda

Since the Southern Pacific converted its Alameda steam road into an electric system there has been a great deal of sorrow among commuters who make their homes in the soporific town. It seems that the tooting of the locomotives used to serve the commuter in several useful ways. By one toot he would arise and prepare himself for the day's work and by the toot-ing of a later locomotive he would measure the time he had to wipe the egg off his chin, kiss his wife and run to the station. But now there are no more toots in Alameda. The locomotive disturbs no more the slumberous calm of that interesting community. The electric cars come and go and make no noise and the commuter is frequently late at the office. Many commuters are purchasing alarm clocks and preparing to keep abreast of the march of progress.

A Delicate Distinction

The newspapermen who are writing politics for the morning dailies are far from being impressed by the astuteness of the men who are kindly devoting their valuable time to the task of picking out the right men for the dear people to elect. I was talking to one of the political writers about the efforts of these disinterested gentlemen and he let me know that he and his associates had a way of distinguishing them. "The members of the Municipal Conference," he told me, "are known as the boobs while the members of the Republican county committee are known as the bums."

A Gordon in Los Angeles

Los Angeles harbors a relative of Byron and this relative harbors ideas of his own about the poet. Some of these ideas he has communicated to a correspondent of the New York Times Review of Books. They are interesting, if not all equally convincing. Colonel Hanford Lennox Gordon is the man in question and he is a relative of the "heiress of Gight" who was Byron's mother. I learn that this Los Angeles Gordon used to be a Republican orator and "a fire-eater generally" and that he is "a poet of more than local celebrity." The last statement will bear investigation. Was he ever kissed by Mary Garden? Be that as it may, Colonel Gordon is to the fore with an explanation of Byron's lameness. "I find," he says, "on looking over old, musty memoranda and documents that it was the personal abuse and brutal conduct of her dissolute and profligate husband, while Lord Byron's mother was carrying her unborn boy, that crippled the poet's feet and doubtless seriously affected his nervous system and disposition. His mother herself had a fitful and violent temper (especially after her marriage to Capt. Byron), and in her tantrums sometimes beat and threw cudgels at her son when he was a child; but his feet were crippled before he was born." It is up to Colonel Gordon to place those old, musty memoranda and documents at the disposal of the next writer of Byron's life.

Knocking His Lordship

"Being myself a descendant of the Clan Gordon of Aberdeenshire," continues Colonel Gordon, "in my boyhood I heard and read much of Lord Byron and his mother. I was fascinated by his poetry and read it all with avidity, but I fear with little moral profit. At any rate, in my mature years I interdicted Byron to my own children, and on their account banished his works from my open library." One cannot but feel a little sorry for Colonel Gordon's children. No doubt, like their father, they were fascinated by Lord Byron's poetry and it was pretty hard for them to be denied access to the volumes which contained "Childe Harold," the "Hebrew Melodies," the "Prisoner of Chillon," "Mazeppa," the "Siege of Corinth" and other poems that stir the youthful blood and fill the juvenile mind with aspirations that are not altogether devoid of moral profit. I wonder, without desiring to be impertinent, whether Colonel Gordon's children, if given their choice, would prefer their father's poetry to their distinguished kinsman's.

"I can tell you," said he, "how much water runs over Niagara Falls to a quart."

"How much?" asked she.

"Two pints."

man named Walter Greaves who has been exhibiting paintings so much like those of James McNeill Whistler that some critics believe he was Whistler's tutor. It is known that he worked with Whistler and that he did some work on some of Whistler's better known pictures. Some of Whistler's warmest admirers among the critics say they cannot tell Whistler's work from Greaves' and they believe that Whistler worked on some of the pictures which Greaves has exhibited and which have created no small sensation in London. Greaves professes deeply to reverence Whistler, but gives the impression that during his association with the eccentric artist he was under something in the nature of an hypnotic spell and was required to suppress himself that his work might not dim the glory of his contemporary. From what I hear of the pictures that are said to be copies of Keith's landscapes there is no likelihood of their causing the slightest confusion.

Dick Havey Going Blind

One of the best known of race track men in this part of the world is threatened with the loss of his eyesight. Dick Havey who began life as a jockey and who has seen a great deal of history made on the American turf, has been told by his physician that it is only a question of time when he will be totally blind. Fortune has not smiled on "Dick" in these latter years which have been parlous years for most followers of the track, so he must make a sacrifice to secure the medical attention and the comforts which his unfortunate condition demand. Years ago he rode the winner in the American Derby and the owner of the horse had a picture of the animal painted at a cost of $1,000. Experts in horse pictures have declared this one of the best in America. The picture is now the property of Havey and he is going to raffle it.

A Hardy "Pome"

Thomas Hardy's verse is becoming eccentric. His most recent lucubrations, called "Satires of Circumstances," includes a little thing that trills as follows:

In the Room of the Bride-Elect

"Would it had been the man of our wish!"
Sighs her mother. To whom with vehemence she:
"Then why were you so mollyish
As not to insist on him for me!"
The mother amazed: "Why, dearest one,
Because you pleaded for this or none!"

"But father and you should have stood out strong!
Since then, to my cost, I have lived to find
That you were right and that I was wrong;
This man is a dolt to the one declined.
Ah!—here he comes. Well—'tis too late now,
And I must marry him anyhow!"

This is parodied in a recent issue of Punch:

At the Mother-in-Law's

"Your son deserts me on Tuesday next,"
Remarks the wife in a wailing croon;
"I cannot disguise I am greatly vext
That he should be at it again so soon;
He only eloped with me last year,
And the anniversary's not yet here."

"I warned you once," says the mother-in law;
'Tis in his blood; he is not to blame;
His heritage had this fatal flaw,
For his poor dear father was just the same;
From the first time out, when he ran with me,
He was always eloping with somebody."

Too Much Verbiage

It was Sunday evening, and likewise his first call. The Harlem flat was, to say the least, stuffy, for he was used to the breezes wafted across the river to Hoboken, where nestled his ancestral home. Have you ever noticed that an ancestral home always nestles? Other domiciles may be built, but according to the canons of fiction an ancestral home must always nestle.

However, that has nothing to do with the Harlem flat, where she had invited him to call on Sunday evening. It is sufficient to say that he was there, and to add to his discomfort she was entertaining him at the piano, and he was not fond of music. Of course she couldn't be expected to know that, poor girl.

She was not particularly accomplished, but she didn't know what else to do, and he hadn't suggested anything. So she played on and on, occasionally skipping a few bars that she didn't remember and trusting to luck. Finally, from sheer weariness and to make conversation she turned to him and said:

"Papa thinks it is wicked for me to play on the piano on Sunday."

"Papa is certainly right," he replied wearily, "but why does he—er—specify Sunday?"

It is needless to record that he was never again invited to that little Harlem flat.

Kitchener, Sceptic

There is a good story of Lord Kitchener going the rounds. Talking at a London dinner over his schemes for the Gordon College, at Khartoum, he expressed very great doubts as to whether the money needed could be raised. He was told his name would be enough. Still, he hesitated. At last, one of the company said: "Well, Lord Kitchener, if you had doubted about your campaign as much as you do about this, you would never have got to Khartoum." "Perhaps not," said K. of K., his face hardening; "but then I had myself to depend on, now I have got the British public."

Their Engagement Broken

Once again Cupid has aimed wrong and his victims are called upon to correct his errors. The engagement of Miss Florence Musto of Stockton and Lieutenant Gaylord Church of the navy has been broken, the young couple believing they are not suited to each other and wisely deciding to recognize their incompatibility before marriage. Lieutenant Church is at San Diego where his betrothed has been visiting her sister Mrs. John Lewis, wife of Ensign Lewis who was Leonore Musto. The Mustos are prominent in Stockton society and are relatives of the Musto family of this city. Lieutenant Gaylord has just been placed in command of the torpedo boat flotilla at San Diego. The engagement was announced last Christmas on the return of Miss Musto from San Diego. A second visit a few weeks ago resulted in its being discontinued. When she reached home Miss Musto wrote formal notes to her friends stating that her engagement was broken.

Society at the Columbia

As might have been expected, many representatives of our haughtiest society were on hand Monday night to welcome Ethel Barrymore. The fact that she had become a wife and mother since her last visit stimulated curiosity. There was little interest in the Barrie dialogue until Ethel appeared and then a sort of suppressed babble was heard throughout the theater. "My, how stout she has grown" was the burden of feminine twitter. The women simply couldn't get over it. They gazed and kept on gazing, much more interested in Ethel's adipose than in the plot of "Alice-Sit-by-the-Fire." Some regarded her with satisfaction—those, namely, who have watched with alarm their own progress toward stoutness in the last two or three years. They seemed to feel that if Ethel Barrymore couldn't stop the unpleasant process, it was useless for them to try. Others who have preserved their slenderness had a triumphant glitter in their eyes. They sort of patronized Ethel, which is the way of the svelte with the stout woman everywhere. And yet Mrs. Colt is not so stout. She is not the slender girl who used to kick and prance in "Captain Jinks" by any means, but she still has a most attractive figure, matronly though it may be. She hasn't put on enough flesh to justify the amount of chatter which has been devoted to the subject. And, as I have said, on that first night the women chattered about nothing else. I am referring of course to the women in society. The unknowns in the audience seemed to care more about the play than about the star's avoirdupois. By their indifference to the all-absorbing topic they showed themselves beyond the pale of smart society. It is only the bourgeoisie that can subordinate adipose to Barrie, thereby exhibiting anything but the aristocratic sense of comparative values.

Billie Burke's Squire

Many are the young men of our provincial aristocracy who have been striving to leave the impress of their devotion upon the heart of pretty Billie Burke. If Miss Burke were so situated that every hour of the day was hers to frivol in masculine company, there would still be more cavaliers than enough to squire her. But Miss Burke is a very busy woman, what with her evening performances and matinees and the hours for amusement must of necessity be those when the hand of the clock is circling about the midnight hours. So she has not been able to accept all the invitations which have been extended to her. Many of those which she has accepted have been for jolly little parties at the beach and it has been unusual when Mr. Thornwell Mullally was not along. Mr. Mullally is one of our eligible bachelors and, unlike so many others of that tribe, he possesses much personal pulchritude. No wonder then that he seemed to find special favor with Miss Burke, or that he has been the envy of less favored beaux.

Mrs. Alexander's Plans

Mrs. Alexander and her daughter Harriet have returned from their tour abroad and are occupying apartments in one of the fashionable apartment houses in Pacific Avenue. While Miss Alexander is meeting her old chums, narrating her European experiences and showing her Pommeranian pup, her mother is revolving plans which have to do with the winter campaign. Mrs. Alexander has returned to San Francisco more determined than ever to assert her social leadership, so we may look for an interesting season. She is a woman of great force of character, is Mrs. Alexander, and is not to be deterred from prosecuting her designs by obstacles, no matter how formidable they may appear. During her tour abroad she spent a good deal of time in Paris where she had the invaluable advice of Mrs. Frank Carolan touching her social projects. She returns to the fray, therefore, reinforced at every point for a social battle of prime importance. Whether Mrs. Carolan gave Mrs. Alexander anything besides advice will not be known for some time. It is possible that she may have given the aspirant to the social throne a promise of help from those matrons with whom Mrs. Carolan's word is law. If that be so, there will be exciting developments. However, I am only speculating. Mrs. Alexander has not informed me of her plans. If she sees fit to do so I shall be an attentive listener. In the meantime there seems to be nothing to indicate that the mind of Czar Greenway is robbed of its customary serenity.

How Miss Cluff Disclosed Her Secret

Miss Florence Cluff chose an original way of announcing her engagement to Dr. Edwin Janss.

MRS. JAMES HENRY LAVENSON
Formerly Miss Harriet Alexander of Oakland. She was wedded last week in Oakland and will make her home in this city.

She invited a number of young people to share her hospitality at the theater Monday night in honor of her bosom friend Miss Amalia Simpson, and her betrothed "Billy" Hough. Not until the party gathered at supper in one of the down town cafes was there any intimation of the real reason for the occasion. When the guests were seated they found at each place a roll of parchment, tied with ribbons and sealed. The official looking documents were unrolled and amid exclamations of surprise and much merriment the smiling young couple were deluged with congratulations. The document read, "To whom it may concern: Be it known that Florence Cluff and Edwin Janss have plighted their troth on this nineteenth day of June, in the year of grace, nineteen hundred and eleven." It was a complete surprise and the congratulations to Dr. Janss on winning one of the belles of debutante row are not unmixed with envy from local beaux. "Flossie" Cluff is a winsome miss who is pretty and dainty and has been much sought since her debut. She resembles her handsome sister Mrs. J. C. Wilson. The Cluffs are all noted for their good looks, Mrs. Cluff being a very pretty woman and her second daughter Mrs. John Breuner being another of society's handsome young matrons. I am told the next announcement will be of the betrothal of her intimate friend Miss Marguerite Doe, rumors of which come from Santa Barbara.

They Shared Honors with Ethel

The Keeney-Talbot wedding party divided attention with the performance at the Columbia Monday night. It occupied two stage boxes and the fair bride-elect was much admired. There is all told a particular degree of beauty in the several bridesmaids for next week's wedding. Miss Keeney herself is frequently rated the most beautiful belle in society. She is a brunette with clear coloring and regular features, and her large dark eyes are one of her chief attractions. Miss Florence Hopkins is of lighter complexion, having a major share of the family pulchritude. Mrs. Fred McNear who is her sister and youngest of the dashing trio of matrons, looked as stunning as any of the bridesmaids she chaperoned. She had on a frock of black and silver and a hat covered with shaded pink plumes and the long earrings she affects. Miss Jeanne Gallois who was the hostess of the evening is handsome and vivacious. Small wonder the party attracted attention between acts with so much beauty on view.

Where Are the Grahams Lodged?

In many ways the accounts of the coronation festivities in London have been disappointing. For instance, we are left in the dark as to just what great house Mr. and Mrs. William Miller Graham have been occupying. This is no small matter. During the better part of a year we have been regaled at intervals with cable dispatches about negotiations on behalf of the Miller Grahams for this, that and the other historic residence. For quite a while we held our breath with excitement, watching the race between Mrs. Graham and Mrs. William B. Leeds for the famous Keppel home in Grosvenor Square. The Atlantic cable sizzled with messages anent that struggle and when Mrs. Leeds won there was general mourning among the Graham faction. But now, through some amazing oversight on the part of the London correspondents, we are compelled to guess where the Grahams are lodging. I traced them across the Channel to Chantilly where they witnessed the races on that vexatious day when the Paris taxicab drivers went on a strike, and thence back to London. There, I learn, they are near neighbors of Mrs. Will Crocker who has Lord Ingestre's house in Grosvenor Square. But we are entitled to more definite information on a subject of such transcendent importance.

Miles Baird's Bride

The fact that Miles Baird brought a wife home from Manila was given publicity when he got into difficulty over a worthless check last week. Mrs. Baird sought him out in jail and disclosed her identity, stating that they had been married in the tropics. She had not always lived in the Orient for at one time she was a familiar figure in this city. Mrs. Veronica Baird who controls the millions left by her late husband is in Europe and has not yet had opportunity of welcoming her new daughter-in-law into the family. I hear she made good by cable the amount of the check her son had given in payment for automobile hire.

Mrs. Coryell's Picture Taken

William G. Irwin set a new fashion when he imported a photographer from the East to take the pictures of his daughter Helene and her bridal party just before her marriage to Templeton Crocker. The fashion has been followed in a modified form by Mrs. Joseph B. Coryell who is destined to be famous in California literature as the mistress of the House of Orchids which inspired the muse of George Sterling. Mrs. Coryell whose beautiful home is at Fair Oaks, down the peninsula, desired a few days ago to have the pictures of herself and children taken. There has been a recent addition to the Coryell nursery and as the baby's picture must needs be taken, Mrs. Coryell resolved to have the operation performed on the whole family. But everybody knows how bothersome it is to bring children and nurses to San Francisco in order to visit a photographer, so Mrs. Coryell simply sent her limousine to the city and transported the picture-man with all his paraphernalia to Fair Oaks. With wealth, you see, one can summon the mountain to Mahomet.

An Interesting Engagement

An engagement just made public is that of Miss Gertrude McMillan of Claremont and Mr. Henry Dakin of Salinas. Miss McMillan is the daughter of Anthony McMillan, a prominent business man, by his first wife. She is an unusually attractive and cultivated young woman and is well known on both sides of the bay. Her husband-to-be is one of the managers of the Hearst Estate and has a large fruit ranch in Salinas whither he will take his bride after the wedding which will be quietly celebrated on June 27 with only the immediate relatives present.

Clarence Got Cold Feet

Clarence Walker and his bride eliminated one item from the schedule of their aviation honeymoon, according to advices which have just reached me from Honolulu. The millionaire birdman, as the islanders like to call Clarence, thought that a flight in his biplane over the volcano of Kilauea would win him international renown. The flights around the Eiffel Tower and the Statue of Liberty and the landing on a battleship were to be eclipsed by this spectacular performance. But when Clarence took a look at the burning pit of Halemaumau he quickly changed his mind. "How deep did you say that Holy-mama hole was?" inquired Clarence. He was told that the lava was within two hundred feet of the top. "And it's real hot and boiling, is it?" he faltered. Clarence was assured that it was as hot as Tophet. So he decided that while boiling lava might be as soft as a feather bed it was not a good thing to alight in. The officially promulgated reason for the change of plans was that so much burning lava underneath the biplane would disturb the atmospheric conditions and that the smoke-deadened air would affect the engine disastrously. Which translated means that Clarence had cold feet.

A Captain on Crutches

Captain Henry Casey, U. S. A., is recovering from a broken ankle and is getting around to his duties on crutches. He is one of two U. S. military instructors of the national guard in this country appointed to instruct the State's militia in regular military tactics, the other being Captain Mitchell stationed in New York. Captain Casey has been under treatment at the Presidio hospital. He fell recently when stepping from a California street car and sustained the injury that crippled him and will prevent his participating in the army post dances for some time to come.

The Trembly Flower Girl

Commenting on the marriage in St. Louis of Miss Marie Garneau and Theodore Murphy of this city, an eastern correspondent says that the tenderest incident of the affair was the extreme trembliness of the bride's sister, little Frances Garneau. Frances, although eighteen years old, is just out of a convent and it was the ordeal of her life to face the crowded cathedral chapel as her sister's attendant. She shook so visibly that the flowers which she carried never ceased quivering and the more each flower danced the prettier she looked in her extreme modesty. The bride was adjudged one of the most charming of the season. The wedding pleased the Archbishop of St. Louis who officiated very much and he remarked happily on the union of "a daughter of St. Louis with a son of St. Francis."

Ethel Barrymore In Barrie Plays

By Edward F. O'Day

Ethel Barrymore is like Maude Adams in that she has a large personal following of playgoers. To these devoted admirers the Ethel Barrymore of private life is well nigh as interesting as the Ethel Barrymore of the theater. This unusually intimate relation between the actress and the public must have been apparent to all observers at the time of Ethel Barrymore's marriage. Many people who had never been within a hundred feet of her discussed her chances of connubial happiness with as much seriousness and personal interest as they would have bestowed upon their next door neighbors in similar circumstances. But the interest which was aroused when Ethel Barrymore became Mrs. Colt was as nothing to the excitement which was displayed when Mrs. Colt became a mother. Ethel Barrymore with a baby! It was a distinct sensation. I'll wager that many of her admirers didn't believe it till they saw that famous picture of the mother and child which has been published broadcast in American newspapers. Today there are plenty of people about you who can tell you all sorts of interesting things about that youngster. For instance, it is of the utmost importance to know that his mother calls him "Sammy," but that his real name is Samuel Pomeroy Colt, II. which Jack Barrymore has shortened to "Pommery Sec". Now it is well known that hundreds of American actresses are wives and mothers, but of how many are such little intimate details narrated and treasured? I cannot name another actress who stands beside Ethel Barrymore in this matter. It is strange too, because America has had many other young actresses of greater ability than Ethel Barrymore. I suppose we must set it down to her charm, that peculiar feminine quality which, as Barrie told us in "What Every Woman Knows," is too elusive for accurate definition. Certainly Ethel Barrymore has always been very charming. She has always walked the boards like a young goddess, or, if you please, like a young hereditary princess conscious of her rank. She could do no wrong. Her very crudities were metamorphosed to graces by the magic of her manner. She hypnotised all who showed the least sign of succumbing to her influence and in their trance state they would hear no ill of her. Perhaps she typified for many young American womanhood with all its attractions and its privileges. And then she married. Naturally her followers knew all about her marriage. Her followers in San Francisco—and she undoubtedly has as many here in proportion to population as in New York or any other large city—were eager to discover whether the Ethel Barrymore of maidenhood had been transformed into a Mrs. Colt of quite different attractiveness. When they saw her this week at the Columbia their opinions varied. Certainly the Ethel Barrymore of other days is not the Ethel Barrymore of today. She has gained many pounds. She looks as matronly as many much older women. There is a look of settled content on her face which is very different from the restless peering look which was so characteristic of the other Ethel Barrymore. As to these physical facts there can be no difference of opinion. But is the new Ethel Barrymore a better actress? On this point there are bound to be arguments.

MARGUERITE KEELER

Who will appear this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum.

On the one hand we shall be told that youth is a prerogative for which the gods can supply no substitute and that the time when Ethel Barrymore was gloriously young has gone by. We shall be told that youth is not altogether a matter of years; that Maude Adams, for instance, is still nearly as young as Peter Pan, but that Ethel Barrymore has consciously surrendered her former privilege and now rests content to be numbered among those who are not afraid of the scales or the calendar. We shall be told that Ethel Barrymore has put youth and the things of youth behind her as definitely as Alice Grey does at the end of Barrie's play. Nay, we shall be assured that the poignancy of that last beautiful scene consists in the close personal application to Ethel Barrymore of everything that Alice Grey says. To those who so regard the matter Ethel Barrymore's principal attraction as an actress resided in her ebullient youthfulness and with the passing of that youthfulness her attraction as an actress has been impaired. But there are others who think that with the advent of more serious things in the life of Ethel Barrymore has come a real development of her artistic capabilities; that now she is equal to more complex roles, to big roles that are charged with stuff for meditation and mental and moral profit. These very serious folks think that Ethel Barrymore is done with being Ethel Barrymore on the stage and is now able to be the character depicted by the playwright; that she is no longer winning plaudits on the strength of her individuality, but is giving mature characterizations of important types. To these persons the theater is almost a temple of religion. They are the persons who write letters to the newspapers on theatrical matters and usually they are quite competent to make their points seem plausible, if not to convince. Personally I cannot but think that their position in regard to Miss Barrymore would be more easily held if the plays in which she is appearing were plays which exhibited women of complex natures, women who made strong intellectual demands on the actress. But this is not the case with either "Alice-Sit-by-the-Fire" or "The Twelve Pound Look." Alice Grey is not a difficult woman to play; neither is Kate, the typist of "The Twelve Pound Look." These parts are singularly free from difficulties. There is very little range in them. Few emotions are depicted and those not hard for any actress of experience to make interesting. If Ethel Barrymore were playing the woman that Maude Adams played in "What Every Woman Knows," we should have an opportunity to say whether Ethel Barrymore, in losing the distinctive grace of youthfulness, had won the larger attributes that come to women in her profession only with the joys and pangs of maturity. Perhaps if we saw her in Pinero's "Mid-Channel" which she has played in the East, we should be able to pass judgment on this interesting point. So we must wait until we have a better opportunity to appraise her powers. Ethel Barrymore, to give an individual opinion, has lost that glowing, irrepressible youthfulness which won her a position almost unique on the American stage, but owing to the character of the plays she is presenting, has not yet been able to show San Franciscans that she has gained more important qualities to compensate her and her devoted followers.

Gossip of the Theatre

Mrs. Fiske Coming

Ethel Barrymore is enjoying one of the most successful engagements she has known for many seasons. The second and last week of her stay will begin Monday night, June 26. Matinees during the Ethel Barrymore engagement will be on Wednesday and Saturday. Mrs. Fiske will make her appearance in a comedy July 3, when she will offer "Mrs. Bumpstead-Leigh." Mrs. Fiske's New York engagement in this play proved one of remarkable success, and after appearing in it for ten weeks, she was forced to discontinue in order to make the tour of the Pacific Coast. Her engagement at the Columbia will be for one week.

"Sans-Gene" at the Alcazar

Florence Roberts will satisfy a long-harbored ambition when she appears in the title role of "Madame Sans-Gene" (Madame Devil-May-Care) next Monday evening at the Alcazar, and there is assurance that the audience will share her satisfaction, for she has devoted much study to the character and is physically and temperamently qualified to give it admirable interpretation. Besides, in the cast with her are Thurlow Bergen, Theodore Roberts and the cream of the Alcazar's regular acting corps in well-fitting parts, and extra rehearsals have been held to effect smooth ensemble work. Victorien Sardou and Adrien Moreau collaborated in the construction of "Madame Sans-Gene" and Charles Henry Meltzer adapted it for the English stage. So great was its success in Paris that translations into almost every civilized language were made, and within the last twenty years it has been presented to every community of any importance in Christendom. For the universal popularity of the play its historic interest is no less responsible than its dramatic strength. Among the characters are Napoleon Bonaparte, Marshal Lefebre, Marie Louise of Austria and other celebrities of France immediately preceding and during the Corsican's phenomenal rise from obscurity to world-fame.

Two Brothers Meet at the Orpheum

The headline feature of next week's Orpheum bill will be an episode by Porter Emerson Browne entitled "In and Out." It will be acted by Homer B. Mason and Marguerite Keeler who will have the support of a quartette of genuine comedians. Mr. Mason will be favorably remembered by theatergoers as the star of "A Stubborn Cinderella" in which Miss Keeler also distinguished herself. "In and Out" proves an excellent vehicle for Mr. Mason as a comedian and Miss Keeler as the coquettish little sister is very bewitching. A decided novelty will be Rousby's scenic review of "London by Day and Night." The performance is divided into three parts showing Leicester Square, a panoramic view of the celebrated "Star and Garter" Hotel in Richmond, and evening festivals during Exhibition time at the Court of Honors. Mr. Rousby is a brother of E. M. Rosner, the popular leader of the Orpheum orchestra. In 1887 the two brothers appeared on the opening program of the old Orpheum Theater with the Electric Hungarin Orchestra and created quite a furore. Shortly afterwards their ways parted and the brothers now meet after an interval of twenty-four years. The difference in the surnames is accounted for by the statement that Rousby is said to be the English of Rosner. Melville Ellis, an exceptionally smart entertainer, will be a special feature of the coming program. It is several years since he last appeared in this city and he left it with a splendid reputation to join the Shubert forces. Mr. Ellis has become probably the most noted authority on stage costuming in the country. He is now playing a few weeks in vaudeville prior to taking charge of the costuming of the Shubert productions in the fall. He will introduce a new budget of songs that he recently brought from Europe. A clever and amusing act will be Lydell & Butterworth's "The Light Brown Girl and the Funny Dancer." Next week will be the last of Raymond and Caverly, Albert Hole, the English boy soprano, the Bellclair Brothers and also of Edward Abeles and Charlotte Landers in "He Tried to Be Nice."

William Archer on Our Stage

Mr. William Archer who is much more felicitous when speaking of the drama than when defending Francisco Ferrer has just paid one of his periodical visits to New York and has been telling Britishers about the state of the theater on this side of the pond. He is not unduly enthusiastic but finds some things to admire. "Get Rich Quick Wallingford" on which George Randolph Chester and George Cohan collaborated was the most entertaining play he saw. Wilson Mizner's "The Deep Purple" he calls an adroit melodrama." The most promising of our playwrights, he thinks, is Edward Sheldon, author of "Salvation Nell" and "The Nigger." Of Gus Thomas' latest play, "As a Man Thinks," he expresses a tempered admiration. But he cannot forbear poking a little fun at it, thus: "The chief character is a very wise and very sententious Jewish physician, who no longer practices the religion of his people; yet he will not let his daughter marry a Gentile, because in doing so she will somehow derogate from the monotheistic principle which has been the heirloom of Israel throughout the ages. I confess that the force of his argument escapes me. The difficulty might be met, one would think, by a stipulation that the children of the marriage should be brought up as Unitarians. I may add that the daughter is equally unconvinced by the paternal logic, and proves, by eloping, that love has its own monotheism, more potent than that of the synagogues."

Tne Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Last week the stock market fluctuated within a narrow range. On the average the industrial stocks did not show a net move of over a point, while less than three-quarters of one per cent would not cover the extreme range of the railroad stocks. The latter tended to work higher, as they have done since the average crossed the previous high figure of February 7. The volume of business was slight and movement of more than a point or so was for the most part in specialties. It must be confessed that the public interest in the market is inconsiderable and trade in consequence is to a large extent professional. It has been pointed out many times that too much importance is attached to merely ostensible causes of dullness. Everything was to change by kaleidoscope, with the Standard Oil and American Tobacco decisions out of the way. The decisions have come and gone and the market is as dull as ever. No experience can foretell what particular inducement can stimulate public interest. We are now beginning to talk about activity and confidence, with the crops out of the way, and a forecast is worth as much or as little as those which preceded the Supreme Court decisions.

Wheat—There was a nervous trade in wheat the past week with prices up one day and down the next. News has been conflicting but principally on the side of the short seller. Weather conditions were generally favorable, although at times there were quite a number of claims from the southwest of a poor yield and a poor quality of wheat owing to the excessive heat. The farmers were said to be offering new wheat quite freely and new wheat for July shipment was freely offered at July price. The northwest on the whole sent favorable crop reports with the possible exception of South Dakota where it is said dry weather with excessive heat had caused some deterioration. Still, at the close of the week rain was falling in that section. Supplies of old wheat are ample for this time of the year and there is said to be considerable old wheat left on the farm. The cash demand for wheat the past week has been flat and sales were limited to car lot arrivals. The flour demand was reported poor from all sections and a further reduction of 20 cents per hundred was reported in the Spring varieties. Foreign news was against the price. India reports harvesting the largest crop on record; Russian news was more favorable and shipments from these countries were large. We are still out of line for export and it looks as if there would be very little on the long side of the market at these prices.

Corn—Receipts have been large and the cash demand only fair which has resulted in quite an accumulation of corn at primary points. Farmers have been holding out for 50 cents and whenever shippers bid this price they seem to get all they want. However, the market from now on will be a weather market and will be governed by climatic condition rather than by supply and demand. At present the crop is said to be in good shape in the big corn states but is in need of rain. The southwest has been suffering from lack of rain and excessive heat and should this extend to the big corn states it would cause a quick change in sentiment and prices would advance rapidly as the plant is in no condition to stand excessive heat without abundant moisture. The strength in oats as well as the poor outlook for the hay crop will have a tendency to check anything more than a slight reaction.

Cotton—As a result of the continuation of hot and dry weather in the central and western belt the early part of the week, new high levels were established in new crop deliveries. The temperatures were excessively high, generally around 100, in the Mississippi Valley and at an average of 104 and over in Oklahoma, and there was no rain west of the Mississippi River. However, toward the end of the week, reports of rain in Texas, while not general, seemed to take the edge off the market and there was heavy selling in all futures with the old crop futures leading in the decline. While the statistical position of cotton remains very strong, as far as the supply of old cotton is concerned, there does not seem to be much of a demand for old cotton at this level. Mills are only in the market for a limited supply and no doubt will continue on a hand to mouth basis. A prominent crop expert was out with a report up to June 15 which showed an improvement in the condition of the plant, and was a surprise to the bulls, inasmuch as a deterioration due to the hot weather was expected. Above 13 cents for the new crop futures cotton looks big and should we get a more favorable turn in the weather it will be hard to maintain present prices.

The Governor's Double

The Chicago Tribune sugests that the remarkable resemblance between Governor Woodrow Wilson and George Ade might be turned into account if the overworked official were to make the author his assistant. When he "let George do it" no one would ever suspect the substitution. Not to suggest that George Ade would be apt to make a mess of things, one is reminded of that first literary venture of the late Edward Everett Hale, "My Double and How He Undid Me" in which an overworked clergyman conceived the scheme of looking up a physical double to relieve him of all the perfunctory and unnecessary services which devour the time and sap the energy of ministers, and how, by the aid of four stereotyped sentences, he was able to carry out the deception until that unlucky day when one of the cogs slipped and the machine was stalled in its tracks.

Summer Love

foreign to his original idea. The subdued tones of approaching autumn had mellowed the landscape that was bright with the glory of the summer sun; the right hand in which the young woman held the white handkerchief had dropped to her side after the first salute, and her face betrayed the consciousness that she might never again see the man for whom her salute was intended. He called his picture "Summer Love"—a love that was done with when the first leaves of autumn lay faded on the ground.

And this picture was his first great success. It brought him recognition when first exhibited, and wandered then from salon to salon until in Frankfort it found a buyer whose identity, to his sorrow, he could never learn. His inquiries brought out the fact that it had been purchased by an elderly foreigner who had paid the high price demanded for it without haggling, taking his purchase with him. His pleasure at the sale of his work was marred by this mystery. He fondly hoped that she might have bought it to show him that she still remembered him. Other triumphs followed in quick succession. The "promising artist" became "our great painter Eekensteen," and finally the government placed the seal of its official approval upon his career by appointing him to a professorship at the Royal Academy

Now ensued for him a period of restless activity. He found it hard to keep up with his rapidly increasing commissions and his official duties at the Academy, and the result was that the memory of his summer love gradually grew fainter and fainter, and one day he was surprised to note that the memory was no longer accompanied by rebellious bitterness, but merely by that soft, sweet melancholy longing, with which one thinks of happy moments that have fled past recall. And a time came, too, when he could tell himself that he had fully recovered. A new love entered into his life, not the mad passion of the past which had fallen into his heart like a firebrand, but a still, calm affection which he thought sufficiently strong to build his future upon.

Had he not acted like a sentimental fool the day before, when immediately on receipt of her letter he had rushed to the railway, to shiver for twelve hours in an unheated compartment and be drawn and quartered on a Galician country road? Yet, when he had opened and read the letter, it moved him with wonderful power and compelled his obedience.

Dearest, you once promised me that you would come to me if I called you. I remind you now of your word, for I cannot die without seeing you again. I know that you have long since forgotten your "Summer Love," but I pray God to let you come. Kara.

Kara, Countess Pal-Wedembergh! He recalled the moment when he first noticed that odd, semi-Magyar, semi-Teutonic name in the register of the Lussin Grande health resort, and learned to his surprise that the jolly young lady he had met during the pleasant voyage from Trieste to Lussin was the bearer of a proud and aristocratic name; and when she, a scion of the exclusive Austrian aristocracy, cordially recognized him at the table-d'hote, he felt that it was quite a distinction for a young and absolutely unknown painter.

Yankel Abramek's curiosity aroused the artist from his reveries. Could he be of service to the Herr Baron in his business? He surely had some kind of business or he would not have come to Zdarnow? If he expected to buy horses from Haim Wiener, he felt constraint to warn his excellency against that desperate cutthroat and horsethief, who was unworthy to be called a son of Israel. The village was teeming with unscrupulous cheats, and a stranger would do well to have an honest counselor and guide to advise him.

Hans Eekensteen shook his head.

"My dear fellow, you cannot be of any assistance to me in the business which I have on hand."

"May be you are right, your excellency, may be; but perhaps you will find the way to Yankel Abramek after all if you are in a difficulty."

"Well, can you help me to blot out two long years, every trace of them, so that none can see them, or to join together a broken thread as if the ends had never parted?"

Abramek thought for a moment, and slowly replied:

"When a man talks like that, it's a love affair with a lady. The district attorney's wife is too old, the major's wife has grown up children. Well, I will tell you, Herr Baron, you have come to Zdarnow to see once more her ladyship, the Countess of Pal-Wedembergh, the wife of the rich and noble captain who was transferred last year to the Zdarnow dragoons!"

Hans Eekensteen was about to protest, but Abramek shook his head deprecatingly.

"Why deny it, excellency? May be you will do me the honor to give me a commission? I will carry it out and forget what it was. Is it my business to remember? Are you, perhaps, a relative of the countess?"

Eekensteen's searching glance rested for a moment upon the face of the rugged driver. He had not thought how he could arrange to see Kara. Perhaps, after all, the Hebrew could be of assistance to him.

"Well, my friend, can you deliver a letter to the countess?"

Abramek opened his eyes, and with an inimitable gesture shifted his great kaftan from one shoulder to another. He seemed to want something to say and lacked words to say it. After a moment's interval, during which the painter fancied that the driver was regarding him with an almost pitying glance, Abramek inquired:

"Did the countess write you to come?"

"Yes."

"Well, let me see. May be her ladyship wrote you another letter?"

Through the rain laden air came the sound of the tolling of bells from the mountain beyond the village, first faint, then gradually swelling louder and louder.

"Why are these bells ringing?" inquired Hans.

"How do I know? It may be a wedding, or again it may be a funeral."

Abramek turned his attention to his nag, and assiduously belabored the animal's back with his whip, though without producing any appreciable effect.

A sudden fear gripped the painter's heart.

"Has the countess been sick?"

Abramek answered in the affirmative without turning around.

"And is she well now?"

Bowing his grizzled head, the old Jew sat a while in silence; and when he commenced to speak, his words came from his lips like a wail for the dead.

"She was a good soul, a kindly soul, and God grant her eternal rest. All the Jews in Zdarnow are weeping for her.

"When she rode in her carriage with the four horses—I bought them for her ladyship from Abraham Eisenberg of Cracow—she looked like a queen, and when she came to see the poor and the sick in their houses, she looked like an angel of God. But she did not seem happy, and we called her 'The Great Heart Sorrow,' for no one ever saw her smile. And God stretched out His hand and He sent the Angel of Death for her. May be she was too good for this world."

Yankel Abramek stopped and turned to his passenger. The latter had collapsed completely as if stricken by a powerful blow. He was staring into the distance while his teeth were tightly clenched as if in an endeavor to hold back the onrush of tears.

They had called her "The Great Heart Sorrow," for no one ever saw her smile! She had been mourning for him all this while, and he, like a coward, had given way to an idle and unmanly grief; he had painted little pictures, striving to regain his "inner peace," instead of hurrying to help her while there was yet time, instead of facing the man who held her captive, and saying: "Release her, for she is mine!" And now it was too late, and he could never again see her for whose sake alone it was worth while to suffer toil and want. Fool, to have thought that he could ever forget her! He had imagined that he could blot out the past as he would brush a speck of carbon from a canvas, without leaving a trace; he had fancied that he was well again, while the fever had steadily crept from vein to vein to break out now with renewed force. How she must have longed for him during those six long days, while her letter was following him from one old studio to another! He mentally cursed the post-office red tape which prescribed such a procedure, when any city directory, or, as he imagined, any schoolboy, might have told the stupid officials that Professor Eekensteen could be found at the Royal Academy.

Six days she had waited and hoped in vain, and she died with the thought in her heart that he had forgotten her.

Abramek's vehicle wormed its way through a maze of narrow streets to the market square, and pulled up before an inn which bore the pretentious name "Hotel de l'Europe." A crowd of ragged and barefoot children surrounded the cart. Eekensteen having alighted from the cart, mechanically divided some coins among the youthful mendicants, and was shown by the obsequious landlord to his room. A few moments later he was alone in the fairly tidy apartment. Standing at the window, he looked across the market place over to the little church, and listened to the uninterrupted monotonous tolling of the death knell. His clothes were wet through and his teeth chattered, but his head burned feverishly and one thought constantly tortured his brain: If he had received the letter in time, he might have seen her!

And as he stood there pressing his burning forehead against the window-pane, the gloomy market square receded from his view, the tumbling houses and the ragged urchins vanished, and he saw again the sunny coast of Adria. A swelling sail glistened in the distance, myrtles bloomed on the mountain side. They were walking along the road to Lussin Piccolo, a road which followed the strand in devious turnings, and neither spoke a word. They had known for some days that they belonged to each other, their glances had revealed the sweet secret a hundred times, but their lips had not yet confessed it. And right there where the road sharply turned up the hillside, near the Valle Oscuro, she suddenly stopped. She leaned against the wall, and with her face upturned, softly called to him: "Come, kiss me!"

And now he recalled with distinct clearness every feature of her sweet face, the memory of which heretofore had come to him as if shrouded in a hazy veil. The white forehead, with a stray dark curl, the large eyes, now half closed, the pretty nose with a hardly noticeable strip of freckles, and the sweet full lips, behind which glistened two rows of matchless teeth.

Then they walked about for days and weeks like a pair of happy dreamers, and each hour they could not spend together seemed like a [illegible] her loss, he had treated her love like a fleeting favor bestowed on him by chance, instead of grasping with a strong hand and retaining what Fate had offered to him. Now it was too late, now the lustre of her eyes was dimmed forever and her lips were faded and cold.

A motley crowd had gathered outside the gates leading to the little park which surrounded the church: Polish peasants in their white greencoats, Jewish women, and many children. Suddenly the doors of the church swung open, and the mournful tones of the organ mingled with the laments of the crowd as the dark coffin was slowly borne through the doorway. Christian and Jew bowed before one who had been their sympathizer in their cares and sorrows.

At the head of the procession, between two acolytes dressed in white cottas, marched a crucifer bearing aloft the image of the crucified Saviour. At the side of the priest, whose hand was raised in benediction, walked a tall officer in the uniform of the Austrian dragoons. His bearded face was held forward and his glance [illegible] followed by the mourners, consisting of a few officers and some relatives dressed in black. Finally, the entire multitude, which had been waiting outside, joined the cortege on the way to the cemetery. Hans Eckensteen mingled with the last of the procession. No one paid any attention to him, but looking up suddenly he found Abramek at his elbow. The Jew had hunted him up, and they walked side by side like companions in sorrow.

At the little cemetery just beyond the town limits, near an open grave, the grave digger was already waiting to complete his task. The six pall bearers set down their burden, the priest uttered a few brief prayers, and the coffin slowly slid into the grave.

Eckensteen stood outside the gate, surrounded by a crowd of weeping Jewesses, and stared at the blackgowned people who approached the grave one by one to throw their threefold tribute of dust as a parting salute to his sweetheart. He thought of nothing, and he felt nothing, but when the first spadeful of earth fell on the coffin with a dull thud, he felt impelled to stop the arm of the digger who plied the spade so assiduously, and a loud groan was wrung from his heart. Then the face of the man near the grave turned in his direction, a searching glance mastered the crowd of mourners and finally rested on the stranger outside. And that glance had a strange expression, almost like a welcome to someone who might have been expected as a guest.

Having finally persuaded his charge to change his clothes and swallow some wine, Abramek [illegible] later to take him to the depot. Hans Eckensteen protested against such high-handed disposition of his doings, but at length acquiesced. He did not care whether he went or remained.

An infinite weariness overcame him, but his [illegible] waited for some fitting consummation of the day's events. And it came at last. There was a [illegible] and they stood face to face.

The count [illegible] His [illegible] was deep, and the pronounced Austrian accent lent it somewhat peculiar gentleness.

"[illegible] I should have hunted you up two years ago, but I did not then know your name. I learned it only when my wife ordered your picture to be purchased for her. You remember the one with the white dress and the dark rock behind? To take you to task now would be futile, and besides I gave her a promise on her deathbed that I would not harm you."

Hans Eckensteen raised his head and frigidly [illegible]

"Count, I am at your disposal."

Count Pal replied with a weary motion of his hand.

"What good would it do me to shoot you? Would it bring my wife back to me? Ah, when she returned from Lussin and I first noticed that she had become a stranger to me, if I had met you then, you should not have lived! But today, who knows but that I would be doing you both a favor to send you to the beyond as soon as possible!" In an agony of pain, he grasped the artist's shoulder. "Sir, you do not know of what you robbed me!"

His voice broke and he stepped to the window. The painter sank into a chair, and the silence which ensued was so profound that one could hear the falling of the rain drops on the window ledge. After a while Count Pal spoke again, and his voice was calm.

"Sir, I ought to loathe you, loathe you like—I cannot find a fitting expression. But when I saw you there at the cemetery, my hatred vanished, and something moved me to come to you. I do not know what to say to you. Perhaps I came because I cannot speak of this to anyone else, and it may help me to get over it, for she died with you name on her lips, and I read in her eye the accusation: 'I would have lived had you let me go.' If I had known that it would be her death, I would have released her. I ridiculed her at first, thinking it was merely a passing whim, but when I realized that she meant it, I was overcome with rage"—his voice sank to a [illegible] not betray your name."

Hans Eckensteen ground his teeth.

"[illegible]"

The count retreated and involuntarily grasped his sword. An instant later he dropped his hand.

"Calm yourself. I said that I cannot touch you. Which of us is the more guilty? I who clung to my own, or you who broke into my [illegible] like a robber?"

The painter's hand sank, and he looked at the [illegible]

"We could not help ourselves, neither I nor——" he was about to say Kara, but could not utter her name in the presence of his visitor. "It came over us as a matter of course, and when [illegible] we felt that we were destined for each other for all eternity."

Count Pal broke in with a contemptuous gesture.

"There was this slight difference in your feelings: My wife died over it, you have comforted [illegible]"

"You think so, count?" Eckensteen rose and drew himself to his full height. His eyes glowed with inextinguishable hatred. "Then let me tell you that I do not intend to share the memory of her who was once mine with anyone else in this world."

Count Pal's cheek blanched. "Sir, I have given my word!" he cried.

"But when you gave it, you did not know all, and I take the right to release you from your oath."

The next day the evening edition of the Vienna "Neue Freie Presse" contained the following telegram:

Zdarnow, Galicia: The famous German painter, Hans Eckensteen, who was visiting this little town, was killed today in a duel which was fought under very mysterious circumstances. His opponent was Count Pal-Wedembergh, Captain of the Zdarnow Dragoons, whose wife had been laid to rest on the morning of the encounter, the funeral being attended by almost the entire community. The most conflicting rumors are afloat concerning the cause of the duel. Those who are supposed to know best maintain absolute silence. Professor Eckensteen fell after the first exchange of bullets.

Yankel Abramek read the despatch a few days later in the "Hotel de l'Europe," and shrugged his shoulders. He might have given the correspondent of the Neue Freie Presse some authentic information, but he was a poor man who found it hard to make both ends meet, and he could not afford to incur the enmity of the officers of the garrison.

Auto Notes

Four years ago the Pierce Arrow Motor Car Company of Buffalo, in seeking to extend the variety of upholstery materials to be used in its cars, adopted hand tooled Cordovan leather. The first instance in which this leather was used was in an enclosed car shown at Madison Square Garden at the exhibition held in November, 1907.

Dr. W. T. Burks, the well-known automobile enthusiast of Fresno, arrived in San Francisco the other day and described a miraculous escape he and his chauffeur had last Saturday when driving in the mountains by suddenly coming to an open ditch in Squaw Valley and having to jump it in order to avoid being dashed down the mountains. The car he was driving was a 1911 Chalmers "30" touring car which he has driven over 3200 miles since March 19. Dr. Burks' son is the possessor of a Chalmers "30" Pony. Both the doctor and his son have owned several cars of other makes, but they now state that the Chalmers will serve the Burks family for a long time.

The Lozier is one of the latest of the big makers to enter the commercial truck field and about September 1 the Lozier trucks will be placed on sale with the various agencies throughout the country. This announcement was foreshadowed by the form of contracts which were sent out to dealers who are selling 1912 Lozier pleasure vehicles, these contracts expressly stipulating that the "privilege of selling Lozier commercial vehicles is not granted by this contract." The principal Lozier agencies in the larger cities, however, are arranging to take care of this part of the Lozier business next fall and of course the Lozier branch houses will all handle the truck line in connection with Lozier automobiles.

The Henderson Motor Car Co., national distributor for the Cole "30," advises the Pacific Motor Car Co. that a large percentage of that car's 1912 output will find a market in foreign fields. Extensive allotments have already been contracted for South America, the West Indies, Australia, Austria-Hungary, the Philippines and the East Indies.

On June 1 the Fisk Rubber Company of Chicopee Falls, Mass., opened a new branch at 1310-1312 K street, Sacramento. This makes thirty direct factory service branches now operated by the Fisk Company in different parts of the country Each branch is equipped with a repair department of unusual excellence and in charge of experienced tire workmen. In dealing with the branches a user of Fisk tires is getting direct factory service. Besides this direct representation, the Fisk Company has agencies for its products everywhere.

Every man, woman and child in the United States interested in motor cars has read of the recent remarkable time trials in Florida in which Bob Burman, the newly crowned speed king, lowered the world's records for the kilometre, mile and two miles. Only a few weeks before the same fearless driver had pulled down fifty miles with the Buick "Bug." Just the other day a 30 horsepower Buick won in the 230 and 300 cubic inch class in the famous Redlands Mile High Hillclimb in this State. This latter performance has at once become the talk of the coast in automobile circles. This Redlands course leads from the center of the town over two mountain ranges to an altitude of one mile, the course being 16 miles in length. At this time of the year this road is very rough and most of it narrow and full of sharp turns. This is the third consecutive year that the Buick has won this event in its class. The time was 21 minutes, 4 seconds.

MASTICK & PARTRIDGE, Attys. for Plaintiff. 6-24-10

spoliation of their love. She had been his, the glorious one, and he had consoled himself over her loss, he had treated her love like a fleeting favor bestowed on him by chance, instead of grasping with a strong hand and retaining what Fate had offered to him. Now it was too late, now the lustre of her eyes was dimmed forever and her lips were faded and cold.

A motley crowd had gathered outside the gates leading to the little park which surrounded the church; Polish peasants in their white greencoats, Jewish women, and many children. Suddenly the doors of the church swung open, and the mournful tones of the organ mingled with the laments of the crowd as the dark coffin was slowly borne through the doorway. Christian and Jew bowed before one who had been their sympathizer in their cares and sorrows.

At the head of the procession, between two acolytes dressed in white cottas, marched a crucifer bearing aloft the image of the crucified Saviour. At the side of the priest, whose hand was raised in benediction, walked a tall officer in the uniform of the Austrian dragoons. His bearded face was held forward and his glance was fixed to the ground. He was followed by the mourners, consisting of a few officers and some relatives dressed in black. Finally, the entire multitude, which had been waiting outside, joined the cortege on the way to the cemetery. Hans Eekensteen mingled with the last of the procession. No one paid any attention to him, but looking up suddenly he found Abramek at his elbow. The Jew had hunted him up, and they walked side by side like companions in sorrow.

At the little cemetery just beyond the town limits, near an open grave, the grave digger was already waiting to complete his task. The six pall bearers set down their burden, the priest uttered a few brief prayers, and the coffin slowly slid into the grave.

Eekensteen stood outside the gate, surrounded by a crowd of weeping Jewesses, and stared at the blackgowned people who approached the grave one by one to throw their threefold tribute of dust as a parting salute to his sweetheart. He thought of nothing, and he felt nothing, but when the first spadeful of earth fell on the coffin with a dull thud, he felt impelled to stop the arm of the digger who plied the spade so assiduously, and a loud groan was wrung from his heart. Then the face of the man near the grave turned in his direction, a searching glance mastered the crowd of mourners and finally rested on the stranger outside. And that glance had a strange expression, almost like a welcome to someone who might have been expected as a guest.

Having finally persauded his charge to change his clothes and swallow some wine, Abramek went his way. He was to call for him an hour later to take him to the depot. Hans Eekensteen protested against such high-handed disposition of his doings, but at length acquiesced. He did not care whether he went or remained.

An infinite weariness overcame him, but his soul was possessed of a strange unrest, as if it waited for some fitting consummation of the day's events. And it came at last. There was a sound of footsteps and clanking spurs on the stairway, a stentorian knock, and they stood face to face.

The count was the first to speak. His voice was deep, and the pronounced Austrian accent lent it somewhat peculiar gentleness.

"You will be surprised, sir, to see me here. I should have hunted you up two years ago, but I did not then know your name. I learned it only when my wife ordered your picture to be purchased for her. You remember the one with the white dress and the dark rock behind? To take you to task now would be futile, and besides I gave her a promise on her deathbed that I would not harm you."

Hans Eekensteen raised his head and frigidly replied:

"Count, I am at your disposal."

Count Pal replied with a weary motion of his hand.

"What good would it do me to shoot you? Would it bring my wife back to me? Ah, when she returned from Lussin and I first noticed that she had become a stranger to me, if I had met you then, you should not have lived! But today, who knows but that I would be doing you both a favor to send you to the beyond as soon as possible!" In an agony of pain, he grasped the artist's shoulder. "Sir, you do not know of what you robbed me!"

His voice broke and he stepped to the window. The painter sank into a chair, and the silence which ensued was so profound that one could hear the falling of the rain drops on the window ledge. After a while Count Pal spoke again, and his voice was calm.

"Sir, I ought to loathe you, loathe you like—I cannot find a fitting expression. But when I saw you there at the cemetery, my hatred vanished, and something moved me to come to you. If I had known that it would be her death, I would have released her. I ridiculed her at first, thinking it was merely a passing whim, but when I realized that she meant it, I was overcome with rage"—his voice sank to a whisper—"and I ill-treated her because she would not betray your name."

Hans Eekensteen ground his teeth.

"Stop, for God's sake, or I will——"

The count retreated and involuntarily grasped his sword. An instant later he dropped his hand.

"Calm yourself. I said that I cannot touch you. Which of us is the more guilty? I who clung to my own, or you who broke into my happiness like a robber?"

The painter's hand sank, and he looked at the ground

"We could not help ourselves, neither I nor——" he was about to say Kara, but could not utter her name in the presence of his visitor. "It came over us as a matter of course, and when we had met twice, we felt that we were destined for each other for all eternity."

Count Pal broke in with a contemptuous gesture.

"There was this slight difference in your feelings: My wife died over it, you have comforted yourself."

"You think so, count?" Eekensteen rose and drew himself to his full height. His eyes glowed with inextinguishable hatred. "Then let me tell you that I do not intend to share the memory of her who was once mine with anyone else in this world."

Count Pal's cheek blanched. "Sir, I have given my word!" he cried.

"But when you gave it, you did not know all, and I have the right to release you from your oath"

The next day the evening edition of the Vienna Neue Freie Presse contained the following telegram:

Auto Notes

Four years ago the Pierce Arrow Motor Car Company of Buffalo, in seeking to extend the variety of upholstery materials to be used in its cars, adopted hand tooled Cordovan leather. The first instance in which this leather was used was in an enclosed car shown at Madison Square Garden at the exhibition held in November, 1907.

Dr. W. T. Burks, the well-known automobile enthusiast of Fresno, arrived in San Francisco the other day and described a miraculous escape he and his chauffeur had last Saturday when driving in the mountains by suddenly coming to an open ditch in Squaw Valley and having to jump it in order to avoid being dashed down the mountains. The car he was driving was a 1911 Chalmers "30" touring car which he has driven over 3200 miles since March 19. Dr. Burks' son is the possessor of a Chalmers "30" Pony. Both the doctor and his son have owned several cars of other makes, but they now state that the Chalmers will serve the Burks family for a long time.

The Lozier is one of the latest of the big makers to enter the commercial truck field and about September 1 the Lozier trucks will be placed on sale with the various agencies throughout the country. This announcement was foreshadowed by the form of contracts which were sent out to dealers who are selling 1912 Lozier pleasure vehicles, these contracts expressly stipulating that the "privilege of selling Lozier commercial vehicles is not granted by this contract." The principal Lozier agencies in the larger cities, however, are arranging to take care of this part of the Lozier business next fall and of course the Lozier branch houses will all handle the truck line in connection with Lozier automobiles.

The Henderson Motor Car Co., national distributor for the Cole "30," advises the Pacific Motor Car Co. that a large percentage of that car's 1912 output will find a market in foreign fields. Extensive allotments have already been contracted for South America, the West Indies, Australia, Austria-Hungary, the Philippines and the East Indies.

On June 1 the Fisk Rubber Company of Chicopee Falls, Mass., opened a new branch at 1310-1312 K street, Sacramento. This makes thirty direct factory service branches now operated by the Fisk Company in different parts of the country Each branch is equipped with a repair department of unusual excellence and in charge of experienced tire workmen. In dealing with the branches a user of Fisk tires is getting direct factory service. Besides this direct representation, the Fisk Company has agencies for its products everywhere.

Every man, woman and child in the United States interested in motor cars has read of the recent remarkable time trials in Florida in which Bob Burman, the newly crowned speed king, lowered the world's records for the kilometre, mile and two miles. Only a few weeks before the same fearless driver had pulled down fifty miles with the Buick "Bug." Just the other day a 30 horsepower Buick won in the 230 and 300 cubic inch class in the famous Redlands Mile High Hillclimb in this State. This latter performance has at once become the talk of the coast in automobile circles. This Redlands course leads from the center of the town over two mountain ranges to an altitude of one mile, the course being 16 miles in length. At this time of the year this road is very rough and most of it narrow and full of sharp turns. This is the third consecutive year that the Buick has won this event in its class. The time was 21 minutes, 4 seconds.

Remarks on Books for the Young

Some one has kindly compiled a list of a dozen books made up from the reports of librarians and has put it forth as the "best" books for boys, the judgment being based apparently on the choice of boys themselves. The list includes: "Toby Tyler," "Treasure Island," "Tom Sawyer," "The Fast Mail," "The Aztec Treasure House," "Derrick Sterling," "Master of the Strong Hearths," "The Red Mustang," "The Young Section Hand," "Little Smoke," "Fighting a Fire," and "The Young Ranchman," and appears to be a fair selection from the usual type of books put within easy reach of the young. However, at best, boys and girls have but little determining hand in the matter of book selection. They can but choose more or less wisely from selections already made for them and if one may judge from the attitude of the parents and elders who are encountered in the book stores, the ultimate choice is that of the salespeople who have no real interest in the matter save in disposing of their wares. A number of volumes are segregated, placed on a table or on shelves and labeled and the purchasers are attracted by the guiding signs. One often encounters well-meaning elders buying "Rollo" books, in blissful unconsciousness that the scheme of travel has been changed and even the map of Europe made over since the days when the series was almost the only one suitable for young children and the didactic, statistical style in which the youthful traveler was crammed with information really a pleasant path to learning in comparison with anything else to be had. The reviews of children's books are written by generations one or two removes from that for which the tales are composed, and very often out of touch with it. Elderly folk have lost the point of view and decide a story is admirable because they think they would have found it so in their own youth. The juvenile sections of the libraries are supplied with the volumes which the elders think boys and girls like, and the young make the best of a bad bargain. Meanwhile, being fed on the water gruel of literature and the predigested and peptonized adaptations, whatever natural taste they may have been endowed with is stunted and vitiated or else they cease to read at all because they derive neither pleasure nor profit from what is within reach Can any one imagine a real live boy sitting down to Alger or Optic or Stratemeyer, if he had a chance at Stewart Edward White's "The Mountains," "The Pass," "The Forest," "The River Man," "The Rules of the Game?" A new edition of the "Life and Adventures of James Capen Adams" has recently been issued, but it will be hidden away amongst the biographies and memoirs instead of going into the juvenile division. Eleanor Gates' "Biography of a Prairie Girl" ought to be amongst the girls' book whether the adults are supplied or not. Bailey Millard's "Lure of Gold" belongs to the boys, too, and Alvah Milton Kerr's "Diamond Key" It would be an easy matter to make up a list of twenty-five good books that would take the place of the juvenile trash which the children themselves complain of as being "all read up the first time." The children of today have their literary judgmen blunted by extremes. In school they are dosed with the predigested classics, distorted Scott and Dickens chewed over by prudes who have changed plots and relationships and remodeled the language lest some precocious one may become sophisticated, and in the libraries they are supplied with cheap chewing gum because it saves trouble. It is the exceptional child who sees a book at home at all and even in the odd cases it is too apt to be something from the department store selected on the recommendation of a sales girl who has little knowledge and no interest in the recipient. Precisely the opposite extreme has been reached in Russia where there is no restriction on the inclinations of the very young, with the result that they gorge themselves on Nietzsche, Schopenhauer, Gorky and everything else indiscriminately, and suffer acutely from mental and moral indigestion for which their remedy is too frequently suicide. As an indication of what boys really like when they have a free choice in the matter and a knowledge and opportunity for indulging it, there is an interesting group of youngsters yet in knickerbockers who frequent the reading room of one of the public libraries and seize upon "Popular Mechanics" and "The Scientific American," poring over new and old copies, studying out diagrams and calling each other's attention to articles of special interest to them. In appearance they are just average boys of twelve years or so but by some good fortune they have been turned from the treadmill. It would be of no loss and probably a considerable gain if the whole volume of girls' and boys' books were swept out of existence along with nine-tenths of all the fiction. In theory the inability to read is a dire misfortune for which nothing can compensate. In fact a large part of the population would be gainers if they could not read anything rather than as now, wasting their time on sensational newspapers and trashy books.

Pierre Loti, the eccentric French novelist and essayist, claims that he is a reincarnation of the Egyption King Sesostris, and by way of proof he had postal cards printed showing the profile of the Sesostris mummy side by side with his own. The likeness is said to be striking, both profiles showing the same receding forehead, hawk-like nose and identical chin. Below the picture is the inscription: "Sesostris, deincarnated B. C. 1250;" "Pierre Loti, not yet deincarnated, A. D. 1911."

Rose Elizabeth Cleveland who took time by the forelock and launched a volume of school-girly essays when she was mistress of the White House has just brought out a new translation of the "Soliloquies of St. Augustine."
